It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

Bill. The honorable member for Riverina made the astounding assertion that there were 30,000 unemployed in New South Wales at present. This is remarkable, considering that at the time of the imposition of the Federal Tariff we were told that high duties were required in order to encourage Australian industries and provide employment for our workers in reproductive industries.

Mr. TUDOR. — We did not make the Tariff high enough.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Is that the trouble now? We have evidence that in those countries which enjoy the highest protection labour is paid the lowest wages.

Mr. SPEAKER. — The question the honorable member is now discussing does not come properly within the limits of the debate.

Mr. JOHNSON. — There is a Tariff question involved in the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. — But the honorable member is discussing generally the question of high or low Tariff.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not wish to proceed on those lines except by way of passing reference. There is no denying the fact that there are large numbers of unemployed in New South Wales, as also in Victoria and other States. These unemployed exist notwithstanding that measures such as that now before us have been passed specially for the purpose of obviating such a state of affairs. Such measures have absolutely failed to achieve the purpose for which they were supposed to be designed. The honorable member for Riverina referred to a contract which was entered into by the right honorable member for East Sydney, when he was Premier of New South Wales, with the firm of Mitchell and Co., of Sydney, under which the firm were to receive certain Government work.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The contract related merely to the placing of a Government order.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable member for Riverina led honorable members to believe that the concession made to the firm mentioned was equivalent to a duty of 10 per cent.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—So it was.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It was nothing of the kind. The firm was offered a certain order at a price based on the f.o.b. price in London, plus ordinary charges of transit and landing in Sydney. The concession was estimated to amount to 12½ per cent., but not one penny of duty was to be imposed.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In reality, the concession amounted to 14 per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Even supposing that it amounted to 20 or 30 per cent., not one penny of additional duty was to be imposed on the people. These charges would have been included in the cost of the imported article, so that the consumers would have had to pay whatever they amounted to in paying the market price of the article locally. We might as well say that the difference between the cost of imported pig iron and that of the locally-produced article should afford sufficient protection to the local industry, and that such difference would be equivalent to a certain percentage of duty. And, if that view were taken, it would be the correct one, and would prove that there is no need for any other additional protection. The present proposal would involve handing a large sum of money out of the public Treasury to a certain group of capitalists, who will give us absolutely nothing in return. It is urged that such an industry will afford a large amount of employment. Nobody denies that, but the industry will afford a large amount of employment, whether it be started under a bonus system, a system of protective duties, or any other. Not one more man will be employed by reason of the granting of the bonus. It has also been urged that this is a national industry. It is only a national industry in the same sense as are many others, which are not propped up by means of bonuses. The fruit industry, for instance, might as well be termed a national industry, and the same with coal mining, wool producing, gold mining, the timber industry, and many others. These are all just as much national industries and are equally entitled to be spoon-fed by means of bonuses or protective duties. Further, it is urged that the bonuses are required to protect the workers in the iron industry against the competition of continental countries where low wages are paid. There is no question of protecting this industry against the cheap labour of the European Continent, because, as a matter of fact, that element was taken into full consideration by Mr. Sandford in arriving at his estimate. Notwithstanding the higher rate of wages which obtains here, he found that he could produce pig iron at very much less per ton than it could be imported. I think that the importance of this subject is such that we ought to have a larger attendance of honorable members. [Quorum formed.] In support of my statement that the difference between the wages paid in connexion with English and American productions and those of Australia was fully taken into consideration by Mr. Sandford, I propose to read a few extracts from the evidence taken before the Iron Bonus Commission. Upon page 59, beginning with question 1192, will be found the following:—

By Mr. McCay.—Supposing that for five years after your works were started you had a guarantee, either in the form of a duty or a satisfactory bonus, could you stand without the duty or the bonus when you had been five years working up the market?—I may just explain that, so long as our minimum wage is kept up at its present standard, you make the conditions here difficult for people going into the enterprise.

That raises another very big question?—It is the very essence of it. It all depends upon the cost of production, and when I take Government contracts I have to sign an agreement to pay a certain rate of wages.

Are the wages per man higher at Eskbank than they are at Pittsburg, or as high?—They may be as high at Pittsburg, but the wages here are higher than in England or the Continent.

I wish to impress that point upon honorable members, in order that they may see its bearing upon the succeeding questions, which read—

You are allowing for all this in your estimate of 35s. per ton, and I ask you whether, if your markets were guaranteed for five years, either by a bonus or a duty, you could, at the end of the five years, stand the abolition of the guarantee, and fight on open terms with the rest of the world for Australian contracts?—I shall answer that in this way: we are willing to take the risk of what may be done at the end of the five years. Give us the bonus for the five years, and we will put down the plant. You need not think that we are likely to keep that plant idle at the end of the five years. I think you will find that Mr. Jamieson and some other people, as well as myself, are willing to take the risk.

From the foregoing it will be seen that Mr. Sandford admits that in preparing his estimate, he took into consideration the difference between the Continental and the Australian rate of wages. Yet he declares that he can produce pig iron here at a cost of 35s. per ton.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—His manager says that it cannot be manufactured under 55s. per ton.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Mr. Sandford is a man of large experience in this matter—much larger experience than others who gave evidence upon the same point.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—His manager ought to know something about the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I take it that the principal knows quite as much as does his manager. I claim, however, that the payment of this bonus will not permanently establish the industry. That fact is admitted in evidence given before the Commission. Mr. Sandford, on page 59, question 1196, was asked—

You want a chance to establish yourself, and having been given that opportunity, you are prepared to take a fair business risk?—You have already passed division VI. of the Tariff, under which certain duties are to come into operation as soon as the Minister is satisfied.

That is not an answer to my question. You do not think the duties will be abolished. What I want to know is whether, if the duty or bounty, in which ever form the guarantee is given, does disappear, you think you would then be able to continue operations?—I do not think we should continue operations.

Then Mr. Jamieson, in giving evidence upon the same point, is reported on page 52, question 1074, as follows:—

By Mr. Winter Cooke.—I understand that you do not think the company could live without a protective duty?—I do not think so.

Here we have the evidence of experts that, if this £250,000 be expended by way of bonus, unless the guarantee is continued in some form or other, the industry will not be able to carry on operations. In the face of such evidence, even if there were no other grounds, it is clear that we should oppose the passing of this Bill. The expenditure for which it provides constitutes only an instalment of what we shall ultimately be called upon to pay. Does not the history of bonuses teach us that when once a bonus has been granted those who receive it are never satisfied? Certainly there is a limit of time fixed in the Bill for the bonus to exist. But we know perfectly well what will happen. As soon as the time limit is about to expire, we shall be met with a plea for the continuation of the bonus, on the ground that if that is not done the industry will perish. We shall find all kinds of excuses manufactured for imposing further drains on the public exchequer to bolster up the industry. In the case of the sugar bounty, we have an instance of what we may expect to occur in this case. We had a declaration from the Treasurer to-day that the Ministry propose to continue the bounty to the sugar industry. It was only granted for a certain period, and what will happen in that case will happen in this and every other case. At this stage, as I have a considerable quantity of matter to deal with yet, I would again ask the Minister if he does not think it a fair thing to adjourn, especially as it is Tuesday. If he has no objection, I shall ask leave to continue my speech to-morrow.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—I know that many honorable members have travelled a long way since yesterday, and I do not think there will be any objection to the honorable member having leave to continue his speech to-morrow. I hope that my honorable friends opposite will give me a little assistance to-morrow to bring this debate to a close. If the Bill be read a second time to-morrow, I shall postpone its consideration until the following week.

Leave granted; debate adjourned.

PAPERS.

MINISTERS laid upon the table the following papers:—

Papers prepared by the Treasurer in connexion with his Budget speech.

Minute by the Honorable Sydney Smith when Postmaster-General upon the mail contract with the Orient Steam Navigation Company Limited.

ADJOURNMENT.

MAIL CONTRACT: GARRISON FORCE: ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—I desire to ask the Postmaster-General whether he will lay upon the table the minute of his predecessor in connexion with the tender of the Orient Steam-ship Company? I am informed that it is a very important minute, and I think, for the benefit of the House and the country, it ought to be produced.

Mr. THOMAS (Barrier).—I desire to ask the Postmaster-General if he can state when the motion dealing with the question of the mail contract is likely to be brought on? I read in the press that the honorable gentleman has given notice to the Orient Steam-ship Company about the termination of the contract, but, in answering a question to-day, he stated that he had not done so.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is not time yet to give notice.

Mr. THOMAS.—I had hoped that it had been given.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We cannot give an effective notice before a certain time.

Mr. THOMAS.—I think it is very necessary for the House to discuss the whole question of this mail contract as soon as possible. I observe that the Postmaster-General has given notice of a motion on the subject, and I should like to know if the discussion will be taken shortly, and if not, when?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—I have laid upon the table the paper asked for by the honorable member for Dalley, and I hope, either to-morrow or the next day, to be able to go on with the motion.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—This afternoon I tried to elicit from the Treasurer, when he was delivering his Budget, an indication as to whether the Government, in dealing with defence matters, proposed to deal with an important branch of defence which the Prime Minister has admitted is grievously undermanned. But the right honorable gentleman either did not see, or did not care to see, the relevancy of my question, and told me that he was not the Minister of Defence. And, indeed, sir, I am very glad that the right honorable gentleman is not Minister of Defence, for it was under his régime that the Defence Estimates were so disastrously reduced to enable him to go to England. The Prime Minister has stated in the House, and the replies of the Minister representing the Minister of Defence have shown, that the first line of our local defence—the garrison force—is undermanned. By inference, also, the former has shown that the guns are not good enough for the work they would have to do, and that there is no ammunition available for practice, or, if it were necessary, action. I only wish to know this evening whether the Government propose to put these matters right, or to do something in that direction during the present financial year?

Mr. EWING (Richmond—Vice-President of the Executive Council).—Every branch of the Defence Force of the Commonwealth is now under review. The Government is dealing with a scheme, which will be found to be satisfactory. The subject will be dealt with in a comprehensive way.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I desire to ask the Prime Minister if it may be taken that the statement just made by the Postmaster-General is an indication that the question of the mail contract will take precedence of all other business to-morrow.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—The first business to-morrow will be to pass a Supply Bill. Afterwards the debate on the second reading of the Manufactures Encouragement Bill will be resumed, and if we dispose of that measure by tea-time, as we hope, my honorable colleague, the Postmaster-General, will move his motion relative to the mail contract.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.38 p.m.

Senate.

Wednesday, 23 August, 1905.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PUBLIC SERVICE CLASSIFICATION.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I desire to give notice that on Friday next, after the disposal of non-contentious business, I intend to move the adjournment of the Senate for the purpose of affording an opportunity to those honorable senators who desire to discuss the Public Service classification scheme, and submit any views they wish to the Senate.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—On a motion for adjournment?

Senator KEATING.—Yes.

Senator MILLEN.—Suppose that we were to carry the motion?

Senator KEATING.—I should not mind.

Senator DOBSON.—Following upon that announcement, I wish to ask Senator Keating, without notice, the following questions :—

1. Are Ministers aware that No. 43 of the regulations issued under the Commonwealth Public Service Act 1902 prohibits officers from seeking the influence or interest of any person in order to obtain promotion, removal, or other advantage?

2. Is it not a fact that numbers of the officers have disobeyed such regulation, and that some Members of Parliament have encouraged their doing so?

3. Have Ministers read the report of the Public Service Commissioner, dated 6th June, 1904, stating that he considers the most solemn obligation of his office to be the endeavour to carry out the "will of Parliament," and get rid of "political and other influence" in managing and regulating the Public Service?

4. Is it the intention of Ministers to support the Commissioner in this respect, and do they intend to take any, and what steps, to enforce obedience by all officers to the 43rd regulation?

5. Are Ministers prepared to enforce section 46 of the said Act if the steps they may take to enforce the said regulation are not effectual?

Senator MATHESON.—I desire to know, sir, whether the questions are in order?

The PRESIDENT.—It is difficult for the Chair to say whether a question is in order without seeing its terms. It seems to me that the honorable and learned senator has been arguing the point.

Senator DOBSON.—I was only following the practice which you, sir, have allowed, and which I thought was an unwise one.

The PRESIDENT.—If the honorable and learned senator gives notice of a question which is not in accordance with the standing order it will be altered.

Senator DOBSON.—I am perfectly willing, sir, to bow to your ruling, and I only wish to point out that I have been following a practice which you have laid down.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable and learned senator has not been following a practice I have laid down. He has been arguing the subject-matter of the questions when the standing order provides that no argument may be introduced.

Senator PEARCE.—I desire, sir, to call your attention to the fact that in these questions the honorable and learned senator reflects upon honorable senators, because he says that public servants have broken the regulation, and that members of the Senate have encouraged them to do so.

The PRESIDENT.—I shall see that the questions are in order before they appear on the notice-paper.

Senator DOBSON.—Do I understand you, sir, to rule that I am not at liberty to read questions which I am asking without notice?

The PRESIDENT.—If the honorable and learned senator will refer to standing order 94 he will see that—

In putting any such question, no argument or opinion shall be offered, nor inference nor imputation made.

Whether the questions are in accordance with the standing order I am not prepared to say, because I have not seen them, but if they are not it will be my duty to alter them.

Senator DOBSON.—I beg pardon, sir, I thought that you were objecting to my reading the questions.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable and learned senator is quite in order in reading any question which he is asking without notice.

Senator KEATING.—I must ask the honorable senator to give notice of the questions.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Motion (by Senator PLAYFORD) agreed to—

That the Senate at its rising adjourn until half-past 3 p.m. to-morrow.

JURY EXEMPTION BILL.

Assent reported.

NAVAL AND MILITARY STAFF CLERKS.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. Are Naval Staff Clerks in the service of the Commonwealth under the provisions of the Public Service Act?

2. Are clerks in the Defence Department (Civil Branch), in the District Pay Offices, in the Ordnance Department, and Rifle Clubs Department, under the provisions of the Public Service Act?

3. Is it a fact that clerks who are under the Public Service Act work with Military Staff Clerks, performing similar duties?

4. Why have not the Military Staff Clerks been brought under the provisions of the Public Service Act?

5. How many Military Staff Clerks are there in the Commonwealth Service?

6. From how many of the States have applications been made by the Military Staff Clerks to be brought under the provisions of the Public Service Act?

7. From how many of the District Commandants have recommendations been received for the bringing of the Military Staff Clerks under the provisions of the Public Service Act?

8. Has Major-General Finn, Inspector-General, recommended the adoption of this course, either before or since appointment to his present office?

9. Are not Military Staff Clerks eligible under section 33 of the Public Service Act to be brought thereunder?

10. Is it intended to take early action to bring the Military Staff Clerks under the provisions of the Public Service Act?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2. Yes, with one exception.

3. There are only two clerks under the Public Service Act engaged on duties ordinarily allotted to military clerks.

4. Such was not recommended by the late General Officer Commanding, who stated that he had arrived at the conclusion "that it is highly inexpedient for employes of the Military Forces to be serving under the Public Service Act."

5. Thirty-seven.

6. Three—from the States of New South Wales, Victoria, and Tasmania.

7. Three—from the States of New South Wales, Victoria, and Tasmania.

8. Yes.

9. The question of eligibility or otherwise of military clerks to be brought under the Public Service Act is at present under the consideration of the Attorney-General.

10. The position of the military clerks is at present being inquired into, with a view to full consideration being given to the matter.

I might add that by section 3 military staff clerks are exempted from the operation of the Public Service Act.

MAIL CONTRACT: WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

Senator PEARCE asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is it not a fact that the mail contract between Albany, Western Australia, and Esperance and other ports along the coast to the eastward expire in December next?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to continue the service?

3. If so, will the Government take early action to invite tenders so as to give time to invite full competition for the services required?

Senator KEATING.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2. No decision has yet been arrived at as to the continuance of the service; but the following report has been received:—

"A postal inspector has gone into the matter very fully, and his report shows clearly that the existing expensive service, although chargeable to the votes of this Department, is not necessary for postal purposes, and that the coastal schooner which was employed up to the end of 1904, at a cost of £400 per annum, served our requirements almost as well, while the small progress made in the development of this portion of the State during the past decade (with the aid of a subsidized steamer), and the consequent smallness of the cargo to be carried to and from the various ports, will no doubt preclude the Department from securing a renewal of the steam service at any figure commensurate with its requirements. In the circumstances it would appear desirable that the State Government should be approached with a view to ascertain their views, as to the continuation of so expensive a service, which, it is presumed, would not be maintained were it not for the Phillips River Gold-fields, and as the necessities of these could perhaps be equally well, if not better, served by the inauguration of an overland service between Broome Hill and Ravensthorpe (the centre of the fields referred to), supplemented by the sailing boat from Albany, which still maintains a regular service, notwithstanding the steamer, and by which all coastal mails could be despatched, it is considered that a very substantial saving could be effected. As regards Esperance, the second town of any importance on this coast, an extension of the existing service between Norseman and that township would certainly provide all that is necessary, more particularly as the Government are now contemplating an early extension of the railway from Coolgardie to Norseman."

The matter will be considered when the alternative tenders, which are to be invited, have been received.

3. Action is being taken to invite tenders, and a notification will probably be inserted in this week's Gazette.

Senator PEARCE.—Arising out of that answer, I desire to ask the Minister what steps, if any, have been taken to adopt the recommendation of the inspector, and to approach the State Government?

Senator KEATING.—I would ask the honorable senator to give notice of the question.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator cannot give notice of a question now, as the time for giving notices has expired.

Senator KEATING.—I am not in a position to answer the question. If the honorable senator desires the information privately, I shall endeavour to get it for him.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Senator MILLEN asked the Minister representing the Treasurer, upon notice—

1. If the daily allowance will be paid to members of Parliament who are members of the Tariff Commission when that Commission sits in other States while Parliament is also sitting in Victoria?

2. If the daily allowance will be paid when the Commission sits in Melbourne while Parliament also is sitting?

3. If the daily allowance will be paid if the Commission sits in Melbourne while Parliament is not sitting?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes, to members who do not reside in such other State in which the Commission is sitting.

2. No.

3. Yes, to members who do not reside in Melbourne.

COMMONWEALTH PRESS WRITER.

Senator HIGGS asked the Minister representing the Minister of External Affairs, upon notice—

1. Will the Government cause to be laid on the table of the Senate a copy of the conditions of the contract entered into by the Government with Mr. John Plummer, of New South Wales, in which the latter agreed to write and distribute in Britain certain articles concerning Australia?

2. Is it true that Mr. Plummer's services have been dispensed with, and that an arrangement has been made by the Federal Government to distribute in the United Kingdom a monthly business journal?

3. On what terms, and by whom, has this distribution been undertaken?

1. Yes.

2. Mr. Plummer was informed on 20th June last that the existing arrangement will terminate on 20th December, 1905. No consideration has yet been given to the proposed distribution in the United Kingdom of a monthly business journal.

3. Answered by number 2.

STATE DEFENCE DEPARTMENTS.

Senator MATHESON asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. Has any valuation yet been made of the armaments and equipment in each State which became vested in the Commonwealth when the State Defence Departments were transferred to the Commonwealth?

2. If so, has any value been attached to the obsolete muzzle-loading artillery in the forts at Sydney?

3. Has any value been attached to the obsolete muzzle-loading field artillery handed over by certain of the States?

4. Has any value been attached to obsolete ammunition and other military stores handed over by all the States?

5. What was the net result of the unreserved sale of unserviceable military stores held in Sydney on the 30th August, 1904?

6. Has any value been attached to these stores; and, if so, what? or was the sale made for and on account of the State of New South Wales?

7. Have any similar sales taken place in any other States by instructions of the various Ministers of Defence?

8. Is it the intention of the Government to furnish Parliament with a valuation and inventory of the property of the States proposed to be acquired, or already acquired by the Commonwealth Defence Department?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. No; the preliminary work is now proceeding in each State.

2. No.

3. No.

4. No.

5. £684 8s. 1d.

6. No. The stores sold were without reserve. The sale was on account of the Commonwealth to make room for more stores.

7. Yes.

8. All necessary information will be given to Parliament.

WHITE LABOUR ON MAIL STEAMERS.

Senator DE LARGIE asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Did the Hobart Postal Conference of 1895 carry a resolution re the manning of mail boats by white men?

2. What were the Colonies represented at the Conference?

3. Who were the representatives at the Conference?

4. What was the exact wording of the resolution?

5. Was it carried unanimously?

Senator KEATING.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows:—

1. The Hobart Postal and Telegraphic Conference held in Hobart in 1895 did carry such a resolution.

2. New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, Western Australia, and New Zealand.

3. The Ministerial representatives in the order mentioned, in reply to question number 2, were:—The Honorable Joseph Cook, M.P., Postmaster-General; The Honorable John Gavan Duffy, M.L.A., Postmaster-General; The Honorable J. A. Cockburn, M.P., Minister for Education, &c., &c.; The Hon. A. J. Thynne, M.L.C., Postmaster-General; The Honorable P. O. Fysh, M.H.A., Treasurer and Postmaster-General; Sir John Forrest, Premier; The Honorable J. G. Ward, M.H.R., Treasurer, Postmaster-General, and Electric Telegraph Commissioner.

4. The Honorable Joseph Cook moved—"That it be made a condition in any future contract that mail boats be manned by white labour only." The Honorable J. G. Ward seconded the motion, which was carried.

5. The records of the Conference do not show that there was any division, or that the motion was not carried unanimously.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I wish to ask another question arising out of the answer given by the Minister. I wish to know whether the Mr. Joseph Cook referred to as representing New South Wales was the Postmaster-General in the Reid Administration in that State; and, if so, has Mr. Reid ever publicly repudiated or signified his disagreement with the action of Mr. Cook?

Senator KEATING.—The answer to question No. 3 states that Mr. Joseph Cook was Postmaster-General in New South Wales.

Senator GUTHRIE.—In the Reid Government?

Senator KEATING.—The Conference took place in 1895. Therefore the question is one that honorable senators can decide for themselves. The question as to whether Mr. Reid has ever repudiated the action of Mr. Cook is one with which this Government has nothing whatever to do.

SERVICE AND EXECUTION OF PROCESS BILL.

Bill read a third time.

KALGOORLIE TO PORT AUGUSTA RAILWAY SURVEY BILL.

Debate resumed from 17th August (vide page 1103), on motion by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Upon which Senator GIVENS had moved by way of amendment—

That all the words after the word "be" be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "not further considered until evidence that the Parliament of South Australia has formally consented to the Commonwealth constructing that portion of the proposed railway which would be in South Australian territory has been laid on the table of the Senate."

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—In addressing oneself to the question that this Bill be read a second time, the thing that strikes one most strongly is the extent to which the Bill itself has been ignored by almost every speaker on the subject. There has been a deliberate conspiracy on the part of its opponents to talk about everything except the Bill itself.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I rise to a point of order. The honorable senator said that there has been a "deliberate conspiracy" on the part of the opponents of the Bill.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think that remark is in order.

Senator MATHESON.—I withdraw the term "deliberate conspiracy," and say that there has been an unanimous desire. I think that is equally good. I did not mean the word "conspiracy" in an offensive sense, and the phrase which I have substituted for it will equally well suit my purpose. The Bill is an extremely simple one. It is very short, and is for the purpose of the authorization of a survey. Its opponents with one consent have discussed at length the cost of a railway which the Federal Government may think fit to advocate years hence. They have discussed at nauseous length the possible loss. They have drawn freely on their imagination. They have ignored all facts and all statistics which have been placed before them by their paid representatives, the experts who were employed to consider this question. When they had nothing else to say, they enlarged on the iniquity of the Commonwealth dreaming of the construction of such a railway as this which, as they said, could benefit only Western Australia and South Australia. What I wish to ask the Senate, first of all, is why the opponents of the Bill have, almost with one accord, come to the conclusion that the expert evidence before them is unreliable; because that has been the basis of nearly everything that has been said so far. The railway experts who have made their report to the Federal Government, are, as I understand it, men who are at the head of their profession in each State. I will mention their names in order that their evidence may be challenged if honorable senators choose to do so. They are Mr. H. Deane, New South Wales, Mr. William Pagan, Queensland, Mr. Alex. B. Moncrieff, South Australia, Mr. Maurice E. Kernot, Victoria, and Mr. C. S. R. Palmer, Western Australia. These gentlemen, if not engineers-in-chief, are at any rate at the head of the engineering departments in each State. They are gentlemen upon whom their States must absolutely rely for the conduct of railway business. They are paid large salaries, and apart from their report, I have been absolutely unable to find a single objection taken to their professional capacity.

Senator MULCAHY.—No one would do that.

Senator MATHESON. — Yet nearly every speaker who opposes the Bill has condemned the statements made by the experts over their signatures.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Either their capacity or their honesty has been challenged.

Senator MATHESON.—Undoubtedly.

Senator GIVENS.—They admit that they put forward their reports on insufficient evidence.

Senator MATHESON.—It is inconceivable that honorable senators should really imagine that professional men, whose professional reputation might be destroyed by their making false estimates in connexion with a Commonwealth project, would do such a thing.

Senator GIVENS.—They said themselves that they had not sufficient evidence.

Senator MATHESON.—The only thing about which they said they had not sufficient evidence was the water question, and they added, "If we had the fuller information which we desired to have, we have every reason to believe that our estimate might be largely reduced." In fact, these gentlemen were so careful of their reputation that they gave an unduly high estimate of the cost of finding water for the construction of the railway. So much for Senator Givens' suggestion that their reports were made on insufficient evidence. If the evidence was insufficient, it was used to the detriment of the project, and not for bolstering it up. The fact that this is a mere survey Bill has been left out of consideration altogether, and when, by way of interjection, I have endeavoured to call the attention of honorable senators to that fact, I have been accused of lack of intelligence. One honorable senator deliberately accused me and Senator Playford of a lack of ordinary intelligence, and of endeavouring to hoodwink the Senate. I want, at any rate, to commence by dealing strictly with the Bill that is now before us. The motion is that this Bill be read a second time, to which Senator Givens has moved an amendment to the effect that the Bill be not further considered until evidence is laid upon the table of the Senate that the Parliament of South Australia has formally consented to the construction of that portion of the railway which would be in South Australian territory. That amendment is an extremely ingenious form of direct negative. It seems to have been left out of sight that this is a Federal project, and that we should be stultifying ourselves absolutely by going to a State and asking it in advance to allow the Federal Government to take steps for the construction of the railway.

Senator GIVENS.—We have not the constitutional right to build the railway without the consent of South Australia.

Senator MATHESON. — We have to make a survey before we can be convinced that the railway should be built, and the State of South Australia will naturally wait until that survey is made before granting its consent. Only one who was absolutely prejudiced against this scheme would dream of looking at the matter in the way that Senator Givens asks us to regard it. The position is this: The Federal Government brings forward this Bill for the purpose of obtaining a survey by its experts. That survey having been procured, and full information having been placed in our hands, it will then be for the Federal Government to go to the Government of South Australia and say, "This is our project."

Senator GIVENS.—And perhaps get a refusal.

Senator MATHESON.—What rubbish it is for honorable senators to prejudge this question! What evidence is there that we should get a refusal?

Senator GIVENS.—What evidence is there that we should get the consent of South Australia?

Senator MATHESON.—The evidence of common sense. Here we should have the Federal Government approaching the Government of South Australia with a project which, as every honorable senator has pointed out, is undoubtedly to the advantage of South Australia; and yet Senator Givens would have us believe that the South Australian Government would decline to authorize the Federal Government to embark on such a scheme.

Senator GIVENS.—They have so far declined.

Senator MATHESON.—Obviously, because the scheme could not be properly put before them. This is not a case in which a railway is being planned in the interest of one State alone, or of two States. This is the case of a Federal project which is essential to the completion of the unity of Australia. On those lines we ought to discuss the question, and not on the petty parochial lines followed by Senator Dobson and others; and it is on those lines I hope the Senate will eventually vote. A question has been raised in connexion with the reservation of a belt of land on each side of the proposed railway. I do not deny that it would be undoubtedly to the advantage of the Commonwealth of Australia that such a belt of land should be reserved, because a stipulation of the kind would be made by any private promoter of a similar work. Projects were placed before the Western Australian Government, prior to Federation, in connexion with the transcontinental line, and a subsidy of land was then asked for. What is the position? The Government of Western Australia have deliberately reserved from selection a belt of twenty-five miles on either side of the proposed line.

Senator HIGGS.—For what purpose?

Senator MATHESON.—For the purpose of facilitating the construction of the line by the Federal Government. It will be perfectly possible for the Federal Government, when they deal with the Railway Construction Bill at some future date, to stipulate that this belt of country, or some similar belt, shall be transferred.

Senator HIGGS.—Will the line be so crooked that a reservation of twenty-five miles on either side will be necessary?

Senator MATHESON.—I do not know what the honorable senator means by "crooked." What I am dealing with is the question, as I understand it, of a bonus in land. Senator Styles, and others, for instance, have advocated that a strip of land should be reserved as a bonus to the Federal Government.

Senator HIGGS.—I never understood that before.

Senator MATHESON.—If the honorable senator had paid the attention I have to the debates, or had read Hansard, he would have seen that the suggestion for a strip of land has been repeatedly made in a negative sense. Senator Millen complained that the Western Australian Government had not reserved an area of land on either side of the line, and a similar statement was made by Senator Styles, as will be found on reference to Hansard for 1904. Western Australia has made such a reservation; and it will be extremely simple for the Federal Government, when they introduce the Railway Construction Bill, to stipulate that this land shall be transferred. It is quite open to the Western Australian Government to refuse to comply with such a condition, as it would be for the South Australian Government, as Senator Givens has pointed out, to refuse to allow a line to be constructed on the route adopted by the survey. But I appeal to honorable senators, whether it is reasonable to expect that the South Australian Government or the Western Australian Government would so refuse? To assert that a refusal is probable, is forcing the most impossible arguments against the construction of the line.

Senator GIVENS.—We shall not have to wait long for consent, if the South Australian Government are ready to give it.

Senator MATHESON.—I can assure the honorable senator we should have a very short time to wait for the consent; but it is impossible to obtain that consent until we have placed some tangible project before the States concerned.

Senator MULCAHY.—Why should the Commonwealth be called upon to propose a tangible project?

Senator MATHESON.—This is a Federal project.

Senator MULCAHY.—It will be when it has passed both Houses, but at present it is merely a Ministerial project.

Senator MATHESON.—It is a Ministerial project placed before us by the Federal Government, and yet Senator Mulcahy asks why it should be introduced by us. To show the prejudice with which this matter is approached by all its adversaries on the eastern side of the continent, one has only to turn to the Melbourne Age of Saturday last, the 19th inst.

Senator MULCAHY.—Do not make us responsible for the sins of the Age?

Senator MATHESON.—I have no desire to make any one responsible for the sins of the Age. I merely wish to quote the article as an example of the inveterate prejudice with which this question is treated. The Age in that issue had a leading article descanting on desert railways generally, and this is what was written—

There is a perpetually recurrent legend in Australia that, as far as the great interior is concerned, it must all be classed as desert. It is the hardest thing in the world to persuade Australian State Legislatures that the pushing of railway lines into the interior would prove a paying investment.

The leading article goes on to speak of possible gold-mines, suitable sheep areas, fine cattle country, and the cultivation of semi-tropical products in Central Australia, all of which, the article points out, are languishing on account of the existing terrible drawback of dear transport. The article concludes—

The construction of 300 miles of railway to open up Central Australia is one of the most important duties which now lie before the people of the Commonwealth. There ought no longer to be any narrow provincial feeling among the various States.

One would have supposed from reading that article, that the Age, at any rate, would be found supporting the scheme for a railway to Western Australia.

Senator STYLES.—It is a coastal line with which this Bill deals, whereas the Age article refers to a line to the interior of Australia.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator knows nothing about the matter—this is not a coastal line. As the honorable senator very well knows, there can be no line prior to a survey being made—no project, even, of a line. When that survey comes before us, we can discuss where the line shall go. I do not wish to elaborate that point, further than to say that two days later, on the 22nd August, the Age devoted itself specifically to the question of the railway contemplated by this Bill, and, after condemning it in no measured terms, and speaking with the most buttery flattery of the hostility of Senator Dobson—

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator must not quote newspaper articles commenting on the debates of the Senate.

Senator MATHESON.—I do not propose to quote the article, but merely to state its effect in general terms.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator must not refer to newspaper articles, or give the opinions of newspaper editors, on debates in this Senate.

Senator MATHESON.—The remarks of the newspaper were on Senator Dobson's attitude, and I fancy that reference to the debate was particularly left out. Everything said in the course of the debate in favour of the line was omitted, but Senator Dobson's remarks—

The PRESIDENT.—We do not wish the Parliament of the Commonwealth to be governed by newspapers.

Senator MATHESON.—I shall not proceed to give the comments of the Age on the remarks of Senator Dobson, but only in general terms indicate the views of the newspaper. After saying that there should be no longer any provincial feeling amongst the various States, this newspaper, in connexion with the transcontinental railway, asks—

Why should Tasmanian and Victorian money go to pay for it?

I think I may fairly quote that without any breach of the rules of this House or of debate. I wish to emphasize the fact that this is the way in which the opponents of the line invariably deal with the question. Any other line or project for spending Federal money, is approved, whether one, three, or six States are interested; but once we approach this railway, which is essential for the defence of the whole of Australia, we find the narrow provincial view instantly coming to the front, and we are asked the question I have just quoted. A great deal has been said on the question of the cost of this proposed railway. I do not propose to go into the figures which have been vouched for by the experts. It would be folly for me to pretend to criticise them, seeing that I have not before me the data on which those estimates were formed. But I wish to most solemnly protest against the gross exaggeration we have heard in connexion with the cost. Senator Dobson, for instance—and I shall quote Hansard, and not the Age—says—

There is nothing, from the defence point of view, which could possibly justify the expenditure of the seven millions or eight millions of money which this line must inevitably cost.

Senator HIGGS. — Has not Western Australia spent about £8,000,000 in the construction and equipment of about 1,500 miles of railway?

Senator MATHESON.—What Western Australia has done in the past is as immaterial as what Queensland has done, or may do in the future. What we have before us is an estimate of the cost by the experts, who, according to Senator Higgs, are so unreliable that he is prepared to dismiss their views with contumely. I should like to ask Senator Higgs about Mr. Pagan, the Queensland engineer employed to report on this matter. I should be quite prepared now to hear from Senator Higgs that Mr. Pagan has been dismissed from his position as incompetent or incapable; but Senator Higgs is dumb. I have made inquiries, and I find that Mr. Pagan is extremely respected in his profession. He is at the head of the branch in which he is employed in Queensland, and in that State nobody would sooner accept his estimates than would Senator Higgs. But just because this railway is connected with Western Australia, not a word that the unfortunate Mr. Pagan has put his name to in the report is to be taken as reliable; and the estimate which he gave of £4,500,000 is swelled and exaggerated by honorable senators into £7,000,000 or £8,000,000.

Senator STYLES.—Is the honorable senator discussing a Bill for a survey or a Bill for the construction of the line?

Senator MATHESON.—I am rebutting statements made in connexion with the cost of the railway, as I am fairly entitled to do, quite outside this Bill. Honorable senators have endeavoured to prejudice this Bill by introducing those extraneous questions, and I am entitled to traverse and deal with their arguments in the fullest way possible.

Senator DE LARGIE.—What was Senator Styles' estimate of the cost?

Senator MATHESON.—Senator Styles has had no data placed before him, and I dismiss his estimate as valueless. And of what value is the opinion of Senator Dobson or Senator Millen?

None of those honorable senators are in possession of the data necessary to enable them to form an opinion, and yet speak after speaker has gone into calculations to prove that right must be wrong. The net point on which various honorable senators have dwelt at length is that of the loss which may fall on the Commonwealth when the railway is constructed. In this connexion, the experts are equally explicit. They point out that the loss on the working of the first year may amount to £68,000, but that at the end of ten years the profit arising from the line will probably amount to £18,000.

Senator DOBSON.—Is that profit after interest has been paid, or only after working expenses have been paid?

Senator MATHESON.—If the honorable and learned senator had read the report—and it is again obvious that he has not done so—he would find that  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. is allowed as interest on cost of construction. In fact, every provision has been made which any reasonable engineer would make in dealing with these estimates of cost.

Senator DOBSON.—Then the rate of interest, as well as the cost of construction, has been grossly under-estimated.

Senator MATHESON.—That is again in the opinion of the honorable and learned senator.

Senator DOBSON.—I know something about that as well as any engineer.

Senator MATHESON.—I quite admit that the honorable and learned senator may give a valuable opinion on the point, but his use of the word "gross" again shows his inveterate tendency to exaggerate. On the very outside, there could only be a difference of one-quarter per cent., and that what the honorable and learned senator refers to as a "gross" difference. To call the difference between  $3\frac{1}{2}$  and  $3\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. a gross discrepancy is characteristic of Senator Dobson.

Senator DOBSON.—Some engineers have put it at only 3 per cent.

Senator MATHESON.—As a matter of fact, the total loss which these engineers estimate could possibly arise during the first ten years would amount to only £250,000.

Senator DOBSON.—Does the honorable senator think that estimate reliable?

Senator MATHESON.—I think it perfectly reliable.

Senator DOBSON.—I should say it was impossible to make any estimate of the traffic on that line. A man might as well guess at it.

Senator MATHESON.—On that question I have an interesting statement from Mr. Palmer, who was one of the five engineers whose report on the subject of the line has been so scathingly dealt with by certain honorable senators.

Senator STYLES.—He was a Western Australian engineer.

Senator MATHESON.—Yes, he was the Western Australian representative on the Commission. Writing on the 19th April, 1905, only two or three months ago, Mr. Palmer said—

Having been the Western Australian member of the Commission, I can testify to the efficiency of the engineers' figures, and to the fact that had the views of the Commissioner of Railways of South Australia prevailed—and he cannot be held as prejudiced in favour of the railway—the probable net results would have been even more satisfactory than those adopted by the Commission.

That is a very valuable piece of evidence. He goes on to say—

Moreover, and I think this should not be forgotten—

though Senator Dobson will probably say it is ridiculous—the figures are those of professional men who are accustomed to consider and advise on such matters, who hold no political brief for either side, and who have reputations to lose should their figures be proved incorrect ultimately.

That is a point I wish to lay stress on. In the Senate, no doubt, we are all more or less influenced by the political brief which we must hold for our constituents. One is prepared to make very large allowances for differences of opinion arising from that cause. But the gentlemen who made this report had nothing of that kind to influence them. The sole thing they had to consider, especially in a report made to the Federal Government, was, as Mr. Palmer has said, their reputation which they would lose if their figures were proved to be incorrect ultimately. If some honorable senators who have spoken on the question had given a little reflection to this point they would have hesitated before they said some of the things which they have said about these estimates. To show the way in which Senator Dobson treats this matter, I point out that the honorable and learned senator at the close of his speech does not even remember what he said at the beginning of it. I must make some allowance for the fact that some few months elapsed between the commencement and the conclusion of the honorable and learned senator's speech. This is what he said last year in reference to the South Australian Government—

They had approved of getting the line inspected, the route inspected, and the survey made at the expense of the Commonwealth.

The honorable and learned senator's point was that the Commonwealth was to be saddled with the expense, and he made a very great grievance of it. I shall not quote his remarks on that occasion at length.

Senator GIVENS.—The honorable and learned senator was talking against time then.

Senator MATHESON.—Later on, during the present session, Senator Dobson said something about the survey and the impossibility of passing this Bill until South Australia had consented to the survey. As I had read the honorable and learned senator's previous speech, and knew what I thought he knew, I interjected immediately. "I thought South Australia had consented to the survey being made." At page 966 of Hansard for this year it will be found that Senator Dobson replied—

South Australia has not consented in any way of which we can take notice. When the present South Australian Government was a few hours or a few days old the Premier of that State sent a telegram to the Prime Minister to the effect that the State Government consented to the passing of the present Bill, and Mr. Deakin replied in a very fulsome message that he was delighted to receive the assurance. Are we to be put off with such stuff as that?

Senator DOBSON.—Hear, hear. What we require is an Act of Parliament.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable and learned senator now says that we require an Act of Parliament. He was so disappointed to find that the South Australian Government had consented that he instantly raised his figures, and wanted to make it more difficult still.

Senator DOBSON.—I have never varied in my opinion about the necessity for an Act of Parliament.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable and learned senator could not have been listening when I quoted from his speech of last year to show that he was then perfectly satisfied that we had the consent of the South Australian Government, and made a grievance of it. The honorable and learned senator now speaks as though that consent had never been given. I now come to deal with Senator Styles and his arguments. What could be more illogical than the position in which that honorable senator finds himself to-day. He interjected during the debate the other day that there was a loss of £1,000,000 a year on the railways of the States, and when I said "What?" the honorable senator repeated the statement.

Senator STYLES.—On the railways of the other five States.

Senator MATHESON.—That is quite right. I should have said that the honorable senator's statement was that there was a loss of £1,000,000 a year on the railways of the five eastern States. Yet Senator Styles has actually a motion on the notice-paper to the effect that, in the opinion of the Senate, these particular railways should be "transferred to the Commonwealth with as little delay as possible."

Senator STYLES.—In order to relieve the taxpayers of a part of that loss.

Senator MATHESON.—To relieve the taxpayers of the eastern States by throwing a portion of the burden on to the taxpayers of the western State! Could selfishness or want of logic be more emphasized? In the speech which Senator Styles made last year, the honorable senator was horrified at the idea that South Australia, Tasmania, New South Wales, Victoria, and Queensland with deficits in their revenues should be asked to contribute to this necessary defence work. The honorable senator said—

This wealthy State, with a surplus, asks Queensland, with a huge deficit, to assist in building an Inter-State railway.

The honorable senator now thinks nothing of moving, as he proposes to do later on, that Western Australia should shoulder a portion of the burden of these non-paying railways in the eastern States.

Senator STYLES.—The honorable senator has not heard what I have to say about that.

Senator MULCAHY.—The honorable senator must not anticipate a debate.

Senator MATHESON.—I have no desire to do so, but Senator Styles proposes to move that these railways should be transferred to the Commonwealth with as little delay as possible.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Including the Western Australian line.

Senator MATHESON.—These railways have cost £119,000,000, according to figures furnished by Senator O'Keefe, on whom I place the whole responsibility for their accuracy, because I have not checked them.

Senator O'KEEFE.—They are sure to be absolutely correct if I used them.

Senator MATHESON.—I assume them to be absolutely correct for the purposes of the argument. These railways are incurring the following losses:—The New South Wales railways, 1'15 per cent.; Victorian, 1'39 per cent.; Queensland, 1'48 per cent.; South Australian, '66 per cent.; Northern Territory, 4'50 per cent.; and Tasmania, 2'20 per cent. The only railway system in Australia that is earning a profit to-day is that of Western Australia.

Senator STYLES.—The South Australian and Victorian railways have both shown surpluses in the last year.

Senator TRENWITH.—The honorable senator is not up to date.

Senator MATHESON.—I am sorry if that should be so, but I quote the latest figures which were available to me. The profit on the Western Australian railways was .27 per cent.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I used that as an argument why Western Australia should make this survey herself.

Senator MATHESON.—I am quite aware of that, but that is owing to the honorable senator's inveterate parochial attitude. He was arguing quite apart from the merits of the railway, and contended that simply because Western Australia showed a profit on its railway system, that State should go to this undue expense in order to relieve the Commonwealth of its bounden duty.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I argued that because the other States had built their railways, and they were not paying, Western Australia should build her railways, especially in view of the fact that her present lines were paying.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator now corrects his argument, and says that because the other States had built their railways, and they are not paying, Western Australia should build a defence railway for the Commonwealth.

Senator O'KEEFE.—No, no.

Senator MATHESON.—A defence railway, as has been most properly pointed out by Senator Playford—a railway whose chief justification is its necessity for the defence of Western Australia.

Senator STYLES.—The other States have built their own defence railways.

Senator MATHESON.—The other States have spent money on fortifications, and they have now to be paid for by the Commonwealth. They have been taken over, and will be valued, and Western Australia will have to bear her per capita proportion of the cost of these fortifications.

Senator HIGGS. — What did Major-General Hutton say about the defence view of this railway?

Senator MATHESON. — I shall give the honorable senator that information in a few minutes. I am again obliged, unfortunately, to come back to Senator Dobson. The honorable and learned senator has spoken so voluminously on this subject that it is impossible to deal with it without dealing at the same time with the views he has expressed. He takes objection to any connexion between this railway and defence. The honorable and learned senator said that this Bill really was not for the purpose of building a line which would be of benefit to the Federation for defence purposes. I asked—

Does the honorable and learned senator deny that the railway is wanted for defence purposes?

And the honorable and learned senator replied—

I think that Major-General Hutton did what perhaps would have been done by any big-wig who was asked by his Minister to furnish a report on the subject. His report bears, on the face of it, evidence of having been written a little bit to order when he states that this railway might be required for defence.

That, I submit, was a most disgraceful thing to say of an absent man, and it was most characteristic of Senator Dobson.

Senator TRENWITH.—That is a most disgraceful thing to say.

Senator DE LARGIE. — Major-General Hutton was about the last man to take any orders.

Senator MATHESON.—I was going to lay stress on that fact. What do we know of Major-General Hutton? He was, I suppose, the most pig-headed, obstinate man in this Department, whom we have had the pleasure of paying for.

Senator MULCAHY.—The honorable senator has just characterized a similar statement as being disgraceful.

Senator MATHESON.—No. Major-General Hutton took his own view and stuck to it. At any rate, if there was an honest man in Australia who stuck to his own views, and whom nobody could move, he was Major-General Hutton.

Senator STYLES.—Did Sir John Forrest bring before Major-General Hutton a minute on this railway?

Senator MATHESON.—I do not know that the opinion of Sir John Forrest is of much value in this matter. He has expressed many opinions, and I would rather leave him out of the argument, because, if ever I say anything about him, it is supposed to be prejudiced. He did make several minutes, and Major-General Hutton absolutely refused to budge an inch, so much so, that it lends particular stress to the cowardice of Senator Dobson's attack.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Is that remark in order, sir?

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think the honorable senator ought to use such language.

Senator MATHESON.—I withdraw the word, sir, and say that it was an unjustifiable unprovoked assault on an absent man who could not defend himself.

Senator MULCAHY.—Senator Dobson is absent now.

Senator MATHESON.—Senator Styles has pointed out that Major-General Hutton's report bears on its face evidence that Sir John Forrest could not move him an inch. Going beyond that, on the 7th April, 1902—that is, anterior to the question of the railway cropping up—Major-General Hutton made his first report on the question of defence. On page 2 he said—

It is, however, necessary to deny access to all cities, towns, and harbors of commercial importance, and to make it impossible for a hostile expedition to establish itself upon Australian soil. To this end careful arrangements must be made to concentrate on any threatened point as many available field troops as circumstances may render necessary. It is hoped that the contemplated extension of railway communication between South Australia and Western Australia may be accomplished at an early stage, as without such extension Western Australia is always liable to isolation in time of war.

Again, he said—

It follows, as a matter of vital importance, that the security of Australia should be placed beyond doubt, and that the security to capital in this country should be assured in the event of any warlike complications.

Senator HIGGS.—Is that all he said about it?

Senator MATHESON.—In reply to a request from Sir John Forrest he made a specific report on the railway question as it concerns Western Australia. He said—

The contemplated extension of railway communication between Kalgoorlie in Western Australia and Port Augusta in South Australia is, from a strategical and military point of view, of unquestionable value.

Again, he made this statement, which is most interesting and valuable, as coming from him—

The potential wealth of the gold-fields, and the vast extent of valuable and unoccupied land in the territories of Western Australia render the acquisition of that portion of the Australian Continent a most valuable prize to foreign nations.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator does not say that a portion of that potential value might be used to build 480 miles of railway line?

Senator MATHESON.—There, again, we have a parochial view expressed. Why, because Western Australia has these advantages, should she go outside the lines of the Constitution, which says distinctly that these expenses are to be borne per capita? The honorable senator is dumb for the second time in this debate. Major-General Hutton went on to say—

The strategical situation, moreover, of Western Australia, dominating as it does the southern side of the Indian Ocean, and the converging trade routes from the West, must be considered as of the greatest importance to British and Australian interests.

What could be more conclusive as to the absolute necessity of this line than these remarks by Major-General Hutton? I know what honorable senators will say—that he went on to state that until the equipment and armament of the eastern States were completed, the railway would be of no value for defence purposes. That, of course, is equally sound; but do honorable senators suggest that because we have not yet quite completed our equipment and armament on the eastern side we should delay this very necessary survey? Surely that argument would be a most ridiculous one to advance. Knowing that the survey must take several years to complete, are we to wait until our military equipment is complete before we enter upon that work?

Senator STYLES. — Spend some of the money on defence works in Western Australia, and not on this railway.

Senator MATHESON.—I shall deal with that point directly. The honorable senator is honest in his objections, but he fails to see that it is the isolation which is the difficulty. That is the point on which Major-General Hutton laid stress time after time. You may have your defence works there, but if you are isolated, unless the works are equal to the expedition which is to be brought against them—

Senator STYLES.—That is what they should be.

Senator DOBSON.—That remark can be applied to every part of the Commonwealth. Where is the isolation if Great Britain has the command of the sea?

Senator MATHESON. — If the honorable senator had studied the subject, he would know that it is now universally admitted that the Colonies will have to defend themselves in time of war. All the battleships are, very properly and naturally, to be concentrated round the British Isles, and we are to be left to take care of ourselves.

Senator DOBSON.—Fortify every port and build a railway to it, then.

Senator MATHESON.—Undoubtedly, let us fortify every important port. The honorable senator has never heard, and will never hear, me cavil at the defence of Hobart.

Senator DOBSON.—We had reports written about Hobart twenty years ago, and still not a pound has ever been spent in this direction.

Senator MATHESON.—Does the honorable senator think that because we have slept for twenty years, we are to sleep on for twenty-five years more?

Senator DOBSON.—It is better to sleep over some things.

Senator MATHESON.—This idea of Major-General Hutton's is not a new one. The memorandum circulated by Sir John Forrest shows that, in 1889, Major-General Edwards expressed exactly similar views. He said—

No general defence of Australia can be undertaken unless its distant parts are connected with the more populous Colonies in the south and east of the Continent. If an enemy was established in either Western Australia or at Port Darwin, you would be powerless to act against him. Their isolation is, therefore, a menace to the rest of Australia. . . . The interests of the whole Continent, therefore, demand that the railways to connect Port Darwin and Western Australia with the other Colonies should be made as soon as possible.

It is as essential to have proper means of access to Port Darwin as to Western Australia, but it is not as urgently necessary, because nobody in his senses would dream of saying that the Northern Territory has what has been pointed out in connexion with Western Australia, and that is that the potential wealth of the gold-fields would render its acquisition a valuable prize to a foreign nation.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The strategic value of Port Darwin is immensely greater than that of Fremantle.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator will not find that many experts share his view. The majority of experts consider that the necessity for defending Albany, and that corner of Western Australia, is infinitely superior to the necessity for defending Port Darwin. In dealing with this defence question, Senator Styles has, by interjection, suggested that we should be put into a position to resist such attacks as may be made upon us. I do not suppose that any honorable senator has really any notion of the position of Western Australia in respect to defence. To quote from an appendix to the report of the General Officer Commanding for 1903-4, we have a force of 1,603 men according to the establishment, and with the men in the rifle clubs, who are used for filling up the ranks in time of war, we have 2,700 men for the defence of the whole coast. The actual force, however, in the State is only 1,233 men. We have two breach-loading field guns, fifteen pounders, of a type now being discarded by the British Government. The men have no efficient instructors, and are trained to artillery practice with six muzzle-loading guns.

Senator GIVENS.—What has that to do with the railway?

Senator MATHESON.—It shows the absolute necessity for constructing the line.

Senator MILLEN.—It shows the necessity for instructing the men in the State.

Senator MATHESON.—Could an interjection be more puerile? Fancy the idea of instructing 1,200 men to defend that enormous coast-line, together with Perth, Fremantle, and Albany!

Senator MILLEN.—How many soldiers would it take to defend all that country?

Senator DOBSON.—This shows the necessity for universal training.

Senator MATHESON.—In the eastern States we find not 1,233, but 56,691 men as a provision in time of war, and the 28,000 men in Victoria could be thrown into South Australia or Queensland by rail. There is ample provision made for the protection of the eastern States. Yet we find that Senator Lt.-Col. Neild in dealing with the question last session expressed this view:—

The present military organization does not permit the bringing together in the eastern States of a number of troops sufficient to defend Western Australia.

And no doubt he is right. He is an authority. I am not cavilling at the authority. He merely emphasizes the discrepancy between the provision made for us and the provision made for the eastern States—

No arrangement is contained in the defence scheme which is being adopted by the Government whereby the eastern States should be stripped of troops for the defence of the western State. I say emphatically that we have not a man to spare now.

Does this not emphasize the necessity for the construction of the railway?

Senator DOBSON.—No; the necessity for universal training.

Senator MATHESON.—It may emphasize anything which Senator Dobson likes, first of all; but undeniably we come down to this fact, that Western Australia at the present moment, with the military system in vogue, cannot possibly be defended without the railway.

Senator STYLES.—It is the military system that is at fault.

Senator DOBSON.—It will come in time.

Senator MATHESON.—Senator Dobson says that our proper defence will come in time; but he shows no desire to facilitate our getting it.

Senator DOBSON.—I laid down a policy.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable and learned senator's policy was to take all the little boys and teach them to shoot. Are we to wait until the little boys grow up before we can be defended? What arrangement is to be made with foreign nations not to attack us in the meantime? I wish to know whether section 119 of the Constitution has any value in the minds of honorable senators or not? Because section 119 deliberately provides that the Commonwealth shall be responsible for the defence of Australia. It does not say, as honorable senators would like us to believe, that the Commonwealth shall be responsible for the defence of the eastern States. We have our experts telling us that it is essential for the defence of Australia that this railway should be built, and yet we actually have people cavilling at the expenditure of £20,000 for a survey of the line.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator acquiesced in cutting £170,000 off the Defence Estimates.

Senator MATHESON.—I did nothing of the kind.

Senator DOBSON.—Some of the honorable senator's friends did.

Senator MATHESON.—Really, Senator Dobson should be more accurate.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator acquiesced in it.

Senator MATHESON. — I never acquiesced in it. It has been pointed out that no expedition could land in these States from a foreign country with less than 20,000 men. If such an expedition came to Western Australia, it would find from 1,500 to 2,000 men opposed to it.

Senator STYLES.—There are 80,000 men in Western Australia between the ages of eighteen and forty-five capable of bearing arms. Why not train them?

Senator MATHESON.—It is all very well to say why not train the whole of our men capable of bearing arms. Why not do the same in the eastern States? What I wish to point out is the discrepancy between the existing arrangements for the defence of the eastern States and those for the defence of Western Australia.

Senator DOBSON.—The discrepancy is that, as Major-General Hutton pointed out, we have not an army.

Senator MATHESON.—The discrepancy is that we have 50,000 men armed for the defence of the eastern States because the majority of the legislators live in these States, and desire to see their own homes protected; but because we have only eleven representatives from the West, and legislators can afford to disregard our interests, we have only 1,500 armed men.

Senator GIVENS.—Western Australia did nothing more before Federation.

Senator MATHESON.—That is quite true; but it must be remembered that there is every reason why she did nothing more. Until fifteen years ago there was not the development of wealth that has subsequently taken place in Western Australia. It was only fifteen years ago that that State began to develop her own resources.

Senator GIVENS.—Western Australia could raise more than 1,000 men in five years, surely?

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator evidently does not understand that in Western Australia expenditure has been limited by the Federal Government, and in spite of all my efforts I have been unable to get more money spent for defence purposes in Western Australia; because, forsooth—here is the ridiculous thing—the money is allocated on a population basis. One might as well say that, because there are no more than 150,000 people in Western Australia, foreign nations may be expected only to send an expedition against that State proportionate in number to her population. Therefore, the defence force of Western Australia is to consist of only 1,500 men.

Senator GIVENS.—Has the number of men in the defence force in Western Australia been cut down since Federation?

Senator MATHESON.—Yes, the number was larger before. Now I come to the Federal aspect of this matter. So far I have simply touched upon the defence question. We are accused of taking a parochial view, just as we accuse our opponents of taking a parochial view of the matter. I want to deal with this aspect at some little length.

Senator MULCAHY.—The Western Australian representatives were the first to make that accusation?

Senator MATHESON.—Yes, and I think very properly. I expect to convince, not the honorable senator, but the public, that we are thoroughly justified in looking at it from that point of view. Senator Dobson said in 1904—

I now come to deal with the Federal aspect of the matter. In this regard the proposal stands in about as unhappy a position as it possibly could. The very gentlemen who accuse us of a want of the Federal spirit are themselves the persons who are guilty of an anti-Federal spirit in this matter.

His grievance was that Western Australia expects Tasmania to help. He went on—

So far from the anti-Federal spirit being on this side, it is all on the other side. So far from parochialism being on this side, and honorable senators here taking an unfair or an unjust view of the matter, that charge could be made with a great deal more truth in respect of the supporters of the measure.

Then he went on to say that two States would benefit most enormously from having this territory opened up and made available for settlement. He grudges us that because it is incidental to this great Federal question.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not grudge that.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator said—

The two States will benefit most enormously from having their territory opened up and rendered available for settlement and inspection as regards minerals, for I understand that some good land is to be found along a part of the route. The States will benefit from the increased settlement which must take place. It is idle to compare the direct advantages which they will get with any indirect advantages which can possibly accrue to the other States. To ask us to treat this proposal as if it were a Federal concern is an act of unfairness which I regret and deprecate. I find it most difficult to carry out my desire to deal with the question fairly, because my friends from Western Australia, who are so deeply concerned in this matter, have been unjustly accusing every opponent of it with showing an un-Federal spirit.

Then he said—

Let them take upon their own shoulders the construction of these enormously long trunk lines and do for themselves what every other State has done.

Further, he went on—

I take it that I have acquired some facility for looking at both sides of a question.

I really do think that I can cordially agree with Senator Dobson in that last expression. I take it that he has acquired a most marvellous capacity for looking at both sides of a question—especially when it is his question, or the other fellow's question. When he was speaking the other day about the advantages that Western Australia would derive from this railway, he enumerated some of them, and I interjected, "What about the tourist traffic?" It occurred to me that, as Senator Dobson was president of the Tourist Association of Tasmania, and knew what a great advantage the tourist traffic was, not of course to Tasmania alone, but to the Commonwealth, he might have had something to say as to it. He is a great authority on the tourist traffic. He appeared before a Select Committee of the Senate on the 13th January, 1902, and gave some very instructive and valuable evidence as to the tourist traffic. He had some very definite views as to encouraging the tourist traffic of Australia to centre in that marvellous little State of Tasmania.

Senator MULCAHY.—At our own expense.

Senator MATHESON.—I wish to quote a little of the evidence that this honorable and learned senator gave when it was a question of spending Federal money in his own State.

Senator MULCAHY.—Our own money, not Federal money.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator is mistaken. As a matter of fact, the money spent is State money, but Senator Dobson did not advocate that.

Senator DOBSON.—Did I advocate anything in my evidence?

Senator MATHESON.—Curious as it may seem to the members of the Senate, the honorable senator did. He has forgotten that, however, as he forgets many other things. He appeared before the Commission as president of the Tasmanian Tourists' Association, and he said—

I desire to point out that Tasmania is the only ocean State, separated from the mainland by 160 odd miles of sea. I think it is the duty of the Commonwealth to take that matter into consideration. I believe that Tasmania has special claims on account of its attractive scenery and its healthiness, which are essential to the well-being of the Commonwealth, and that it must become absolutely the sanatorium, as well as the pleasure ground, of Australia. I have had considerable experience with tourists for the last thirty-five years, and I know that it is essential to many of the men and women of Australia, and especially for the mothers of young children, to visit Tasmania, not only for pleasure, but also as a matter of health and for the proper bringing up of their children.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think that the question of the mothers of young children visiting Tasmania has anything to do with this Bill?

Senator MATHESON.—Undoubtedly; I wish to connect Senator Dobson's views and his advocacy of a Commonwealth subsidy with his peculiar and parochial objections to a similar subsidy in the case of the Western Australian railway. Senator Dobson lays considerable stress on the 160 odd miles of sea as a gap. But when it is a question of bridging over a gap between Western Australia and the eastern States he says nothing at all.

Senator DOBSON.—Adopt the same means as we did, and build your own trunk line.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator did not advocate each State building its own trunk lines, but advocated the Commonwealth providing means of communication with Tasmania.

Senator DOBSON.—Only so far as it is in the interests of the Commonwealth to do so.

Senator MATHESON.—Because it is in the interests of Tasmania. Senator Dobson went on to say—

I also think that it is the duty of the Commonwealth to do something in this matter. I think so, first of all, because as between State and State, a water-way has a right to be placed to some extent in the same category as a railway.

That is the point—"the duty of the Commonwealth."

Senator DOBSON.—I used the words "to some extent."

Senator MATHESON.—It is perfectly obvious that Senator Dobson claims those privileges for Tasmania because steamer communication should "to some extent" be placed in the same category as a railway. It would seem, therefore, that a railway has the larger claim—that steamer communication can only "to some extent" be placed in the same category. Yet Senator Dobson desires the Commonwealth to subsidize the steamer communication completely.

Senator DOBSON.—I never said "completely."

Senator MATHESON.—Senator Dobson went on to say—

Tasmania, as a State of the Federation, has a right to have its outlying position in the ocean considered.

Has Western Australia no right to have its outlying position considered, separated as it is from the eastern States by 1,000 miles of unexplored country, and over 1,000 miles of ocean?

Senator DOBSON.—The matter was considered, and yet nothing was done.

Senator MATHESON.—Senator Dobson went on—

What I mean is, that the time will come when, I suppose, a good case will be made out for a railway across the Continent to Western Australia, and the argument will be used that it is absolutely essential, even if that railway does not pay, that the outlying State of Western Australia should be brought into touch and close communication with the other States of the union, and with the more populous parts of the Continent.

I say that the same argument does apply to Tasmania; but how shall we find Senator Dobson voting when he comes to apply his own logic to the unfortunate State of Western Australia?

Senator DOBSON.—I said that the steamers should be subsidized according to the benefits received from them.

Senator MATHESON.—I shall not further quote the actual words of Senator Dobson, but merely inform honorable senators that he went on to say that it was in the interests of the whole Commonwealth that the Federal Parliament should pay the subsidy, which he regarded as essential to the development of Australia, and to the interests of the business of the Commonwealth itself.

Senator DOBSON.—I advocated the payment of a subsidy in proportion to the benefits received. I did not advocate that the Commonwealth should pay the whole subsidy.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator said nothing about "proportion" when giving evidence—that is a fresh development.

Senator DOBSON.—It is not; the honorable senator has read the words—"to some extent be considered."

Senator PEARCE.—Senator Dobson left the distinct impression by his evidence that the Commonwealth ought to bear the whole burden.

Senator DOBSON.—And what was done? Nothing.

Senator MATHESON.—Dealing with the argument of the rough sea voyage, which equally applies to Western Australia, Senator Dobson said—

I have had it from perhaps a dozen men who are accustomed to travel between Tasmania and the mainland that it is an absolute advantage to lose an hour for the sake of letting the bad sailors among the passengers have a little quiet water between the Tamar Heads and Rosevears or Launceston. If a number of passengers, who are bad sailors, are asked to get out of the steamer, which is perhaps rolling or pitching, and to jump directly into a train, they would probably find it a very terrible ordeal. Going by the Tamar, I should like to see the distance shortened by perhaps an hour and a half, or an hour at least. The passengers would then have a sail on perfectly smooth water, and would thus have a chance of pulling themselves together. . . . Many people cannot afford to go further than Launceston, and great complaints have been made as to the discomforts between Sydney and Hobart where travellers are three or four nights at sea.

On those grounds, Senator Dobson advocated a Government subsidy for the steamers to Tasmania; but he entirely ignored the fact that there is a rougher voyage for the unfortunate traveller who proceeds to Western Australia by sea. Finally, Senator Dobson was asked the following question:—

I understand from your evidence that you are in favour of increased or better communication between Tasmania and the mainland, and that you would improve it by means of a subsidy?

The reply of the honorable senator was perfectly unqualified.

I think that is the practical and ordinary way of doing it.

Senator DOBSON.—I spoke of a subsidy in proportion to Federal benefits.

Senator MATHESON.—There was no discussion of proportionate benefits when the honorable senator appeared before the Select Committee. He was the advocate for the Tourists' Association, and went straight-out for a subsidy from the Federal Government. Those arguments, he held, apply to the special means of communication with the little island of Tasmania, but he persistently refuses to apply them in the case of a railway to Western Australia. Still the honorable senator says that he is not parochial, and that the advocates of the transcontinental railway are.

Senator DOBSON.—I applied those very arguments in my speech, but the honorable senator has omitted to quote them. I not only say, but assert the fact, and defy the honorable senator to contradict it.

Senator MATHESON.—Unfortunately I have not been able to commit the whole of the speech to memory.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator has picked out the parts which suit him.

Senator MATHESON. — I have picked out those parts which show deliberate hostility to Western Australia and deliberate parochialism. Indeed, the honorable senator adds to the argument; he shows how he can look at both sides of the question by maintaining that in his speech he first said one thing and then the other.

Senator DOBSON.—No; in my speech I said that the Commonwealth ought to assist in the matter of the railway in proportion to the benefits which the Commonwealth would receive. I pointed out that the two States concerned would receive 80 per cent. of the benefits, and the rest of the States 20 per cent. I went into details, and laid down a policy.

Senator MATHESON. — And yet the honorable senator calls the proposal before us “as grossly unfair a proposal as possibly could be made to this Parliament.

Senator DOBSON.—And it is grossly unfair.

Senator MATHESON. — What would Senator Dobson have said if any representative of Western Australia had used such words in reference to a recommendation that the steamers to Tasmania should be subsidized?

Senator DOBSON.—I advocated a subsidy only in proportion to the benefits received.

Senator MATHESON.—Nothing was said about that whatever.

Senator DOBSON.—That is plain on the face of my evidence, if the honorable member will read it.

Senator MATHESON.—The report of the Select Committee contains the following:—

That it is desirable that there should be established a daily mail service each way throughout the whole year between Tasmania and Melbourne, and that, as far as practicable, the hours for arrival and despatch of mails should be on every day approximately the same. . . . Your Committee recommend the Government, in the meantime, to invite tenders for the performance of a six days a week steam service each way between Melbourne and Tasmania, such service to be three alternate days of the week by way of Launceston, and the remaining three days of the week by Devonport and Burnie, due consideration being given to improved passenger accommodation and increased speed.

There is nothing said about the State bearing any proportion other than its due population proportion.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator's construction is preposterous.

Senator MATHESON.—Are we, after all, so very parochial in Western Australia. Honorable senators seem to forget that Western Australia bears a proportionate share, per capita, in a very large amount of Federal expenditure, in which it has no interest of any sort or kind. Yet we have never heard a word of remonstrance from Western Australia.

Senator HENDERSON.—Wait a bit!

Senator MATHESON.—As the honorable senator says, “wait a bit.” I can well conceive that no representative of Western Australia would dare to sit in this chamber and support such legislation as has in the past been accepted by that State in a purely Federal spirit.

Senator MILLEN.—“No parochialism”!

Senator MATHESON.—Western Australia has shown no parochialism in those matters.

Senator MILLEN.—Is the honorable senator not doing so now?

Senator TRENWITH.—Has Western Australia not had a Customs revenue in a sense in which the other States have not?

Senator DOBSON.—And Western Australia would not join Federation unless she was promised that Customs revenue.

Senator MATHESON.—That is such an old “gag” as to be scarcely worth dealing with. Still, honorable senators are well aware that Western Australia never had any voice in making that arrangement.

Senator DOBSON.—Western Australian delegates had.

Senator MATHESON.—Western Australian “delegates”! They were the delegates of Sir John Forrest. The honorable senator knows that it is not a fact that Western Australia ever asked for this arrangement.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The Treasurer of Western Australia has had the benefit of the arrangement. Digitized by Google

Senator DOBSON.—And the State has deliberately accepted the benefit.

Senator MATHESON. — Senator O'Keefe is perfectly accurate; the Treasurer of Western Australia has had the benefit of a special Tariff; but at whose expense? At the expense of the residents in Western Australia. Last night the Commonwealth Treasurer laid it down as an axiom that where the Treasury benefits the pockets of the people suffer; and I should be diffident in disputing such an authority on a question of this sort?

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator does not always accept that authority.

Senator MATHESON.—I do not, but on a question of finance of such importance I should not care to dispute such an authority. I should like to touch shortly on the Federal burdens of which Western Australia bears her proportion without receiving the slightest benefit—burdens against which we have never raised a protest. First of all, £273,000 has been paid in sugar bounties, and it is estimated that this year another £150,000 will go in the same direction.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Does Western Australia object to that?

Senator MATHESON.—Western Australia has raised no objection. I merely point out that the Western Australian proportion was £26,414, for which that State has received no benefit whatever.

Senator TRENWITH.—Is there not a White Australia? Is that not of some benefit to Western Australia?

Senator MATHESON. — The sugar bounty has nothing to do with a White Australia; the bounty is a protectionist gift to encourage the growth of sugar by means of white labour.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Directly it can be shown that it has nothing to do with a White Australia, I shall vote against the bounty.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator knows the fact perfectly well. New South Wales has received £112,000 add for growing sugar with white labour, although in that State sugar has always been grown with white labour, and always will be. The papers which were laid on the table yesterday will give honorable senators full particulars.

Senator MILLEN. — Most of the New South Wales representatives voted against the sugar bounty.

Senator MATHESON.—I do not care who voted against the bounty. What I say is that Western Australia has, without the slightest objection, paid its share of the cost in a truly Federal spirit. Yet the representatives of that State are accused of parochialism. Then there is Western Australia's share in the cost of administration, amounting to £6,657 last year, with probably a similar amount to be paid this year.

Senator GUTHRIE.—From the expenditure of which Western Australia gets benefit.

Senator MATHESON.—Western Australia gets no benefit. What does Western Australia get from the sugar bounty.

Senator TRENWITH.—What benefit does Victoria get?

Senator GIVENS.—If the eastern States were filled with coloured labourers, how would Western Australia be able to defend itself?

Senator MATHESON.—I say that the whole thing is humbug. The coloured labour going out of Queensland must go out of it according to law. But the coloured labour that will remain in the State will work there, and therefore this is not a question of black and white labour, but it simply means that the sugar industry is being fostered to this extent as a protected and exotic industry. The coloured labourers who remain in Queensland must be employed. Do honorable senators suggest that they are to starve? I should advocate their deportation.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think the honorable senator should go into that matter; he is wandering from the question before the Senate.

Senator MATHESON. — I quite agree that I am, but I should like to say that, as a matter of fact, the area under sugar cultivation in New South Wales by white labour has fallen off instead of increased.

Senator GUTHRIE.—But it has increased in Queensland.

Senator MATHESON.—It has increased in Queensland to a very slight extent. Another thing to which we have to contribute our quota, without objection, though I opposed the matter when it was before the Senate, is the Pacific subsidy. We are paying our share of a subsidy of £8,400 to foster the trade of Sydney with the Pacific Islands.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable senator knows that that is a mail subsidy.

Senator GIVENS.—It is nothing of the kind.

The PRESIDENT.—Order! I do not think the honorable senator should discuss these extraneous questions, though he is quite in order in briefly mentioning them.

Senator MATHESON.—I have no desire to discuss them in the least, but to mention them one by one. The next item is the expenditure under the Naval Agreement Act. We are to pay a subsidy of £2,000,000 to the British Government, that is, £200,000 a year for ten years.

Senator MILLEN.—For defence purposes.

Senator MATHESON. — For defence purposes, and the sole result brought about by that Act is the expenditure by the squadron of £300,000 per annum in the ports of Sydney and Hobart. I make that statement on the authority of Senator Walker, who, during the discussion on the subject, interjected that that would be the effect of the measure. That statement is absolutely true. Then we have, in connexion with British New Guinea, another Federal expenditure. We contribute £20,000 to the expense of governing British New Guinea, from which Western Australia derives not one scintilla of benefit.

Senator TURLEY.—What State in Australia derives any benefit from our connexion with New Guinea?

Senator MATHESON. — Undoubtedly Queensland does. The entire trade between British New Guinea and the Commonwealth is carried on between that territory and Brisbane, and other Queensland ports. Though Western Australia derives no benefit from this expenditure, we are paying our share of it. In notice in the Estimates for the current year a proposal to inaugurate an expensive and luxurious telephone system between Sydney and Melbourne at a cost of £34,000, with a balance to be brought forward later on, making the total cost £50,000. The Government propose to spend this money on a luxury for the benefit of Sydney and Melbourne.

Senator MILLEN.—If the Commonwealth were to stand on one side private people would soon undertake that work.

Senator MATHESON.—Of what use is it for Senator Millen to split hairs in that way? I am not arguing as to what the Commonwealth might or might not do.

Senator TRENWITH.—Are these parallel cases?

Senator MATHESON.—Yes, they are; but with the difference that the railway to Western Australia is infinitely more vital.

Senator MILLEN. — One is a Commonwealth function, clearly, and the other is not.

Senator MATHESON.—Senator Millen denies that the railway has any value for defence purposes, and it is only in that view that it cannot be said to be a Commonwealth function. On the other hand, the leader of the Government in the Senate asserts that this is a defence line.

Senator MILLEN.—The leader of the Government in the Senate also said that South Australia would never agree to the line.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I never said anything of the kind.

Senator MATHESON.—That is only another instance showing the grossly unfair way in which this matter is dealt with by certain honorable senators.

Senator TRENWITH. — Senator Playford said that South Australia would never agree to the line unless she could dictate the route and the gauge.

Senator MATHESON.—Senator Playford did not say that South Australia would dictate in the matter, but that what was proposed must be to her satisfaction.

Senator TRENWITH.—That is the same thing, in another way.

Senator MATHESON.—I do not think it is the same thing.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator said, in answer to my interjection, "Quite right, too."

Senator TURLEY.—He said that South Australia must be consulted.

Senator MATHESON.—It is quite right that South Australia should be consulted. Another expenditure to which we have contributed, though not without a word of protest, is that connected with the up-keep of Government House in Sydney. This costs £3,000 per year, and though Western Australia pays her share of that expenditure she does not derive the least benefit from it.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania also pay their share of that expenditure.

Senator MATHESON.—I admit that. I wish to lay stress on this, because Senator Millen was at pains the other day to deny that there was a general understanding in connexion with this railway. Five leaders of the Federal movement have been quoted by Senator Smith as having expressed the opinion that there was some pledge or understanding.

Senator MILLEN.—Nothing of the kind.

Senator TRENWITH.—Mr. Deakin is quoted as having said that in consequence of Federation the transcontinental railway would ultimately be built. That might be twenty years hence. I could say the same thing.

Senator MILLEN.—None of the gentlemen named affirmed that any understanding had been arrived at.

Senator MATHESON.—I like to be accurate, and I admit that Senator Trenwith has stated what was said by Mr. Deakin. In that sense, we understood that the construction of this railway would follow on Federation. What is the position in connexion with Government House in Sydney? Here also it is claimed that there was an understanding, and that it was arrived at, not between the leaders of the Federal movement, but between Sir William Lyne and Mr. Chamberlain. The other understanding may be put on one side, but the understanding between Sir William Lyne and Mr. Chamberlain is not to be cavilled at or even questioned. It is the sacred inheritance of New South Wales. It is amusing to find honorable senators from Tasmania talking so much about the Federal spirit, because, as a matter of fact, even before Federation, Tasmania showed herself singularly lacking in any Federal spirit. My memory goes back to a meeting of the Federal Council of Australasia, held in Melbourne in 1889. Before that body there was laid a most important measure dealing with quarantine.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Quarantine has nothing to do with this railway.

Senator MATHESON.—It has to do with the Federal spirit, and we have been accused of a want of Federal spirit in this matter.

The PRESIDENT.—Does not the honorable senator think that he is wandering from the point?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I rise to a point of order. I should like to know if the honorable senator is in order in discussing the question of quarantine?

The PRESIDENT.—I have called the honorable senator's attention to the fact that he seems to me to be wandering from the subject. I cannot say that his reference to quarantine is out of order, because I do not know what he proposes to say.

Senator MATHESON.—I intended to say that this quarantine proposal, to which I have referred, involved Federal expenditure in exactly the same way as this railway.

The PRESIDENT.—Is the honorable senator referring to the Federal Convention?

Senator MATHESON.—No, to a meeting of the Federal Council of Australasia. I am referring to a proposal involving Federal expenditure, to which Tasmania declined to accede, with the result that a very valuable measure was shelved.

The PRESIDENT.—I cannot see that that has anything to do with the question before the Senate.

Senator TURLEY.—The Federal Council of Australasia was a non-representative body.

Senator MATHESON.—The instance to which I have referred marks the attitude of Tasmania in Federal matters.

Senator MULCAHY.—It marks the attitude of only one man.

Senator MILLEN.—What has the attitude of Tasmania to do with the question?

Senator MATHESON.—Honorable senators from Tasmania have accused us of a want of Federal spirit.

Senator MILLEN.—Honorable senators from Western Australia accused other honorable senators of a lack of Federal spirit.

Senator MATHESON.—To return to the question of Federal expenditure, I point out that Tasmania has hitherto absolutely refused to share in the expenditure on the forts at Thursday Island and Albany, although they are Federal forts, on the ground presumably that no enemy could reach her until after he had passed either one or the other.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator means prior to Federation?

Senator MATHESON.—No, at the present moment the whole of the expense of the garrisons at Albany and Thursday Island are borne by the other States, and Tasmania pays no share of the cost.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That has never been put before the people of Tasmania.

Senator MATHESON.—What do we find in Victoria in respect to the Federal spirit? It is the practice of Victoria to export her undesirables to the other States.

This is the way in which Victorians show their Federal spirit. We should never dream of doing such a thing in the West. I have here a newspaper cutting of the 19th June, 1905, from which I learn that a Miss Forbes, a girl with a bad record, got a chance from a court on promising to leave Victoria. She was subsequently sentenced by the City Court in Melbourne to twelve weeks' imprisonment, because she had not gone to another State.

The PRESIDENT.—Has that anything to do with this Bill?

Senator MATHESON.—Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDENT.—I cannot see that it has.

Senator MATHESON.—Other honorable senators have been permitted to accuse representatives of Western Australia of displaying an un-Federal spirit. I have quoted Senator Dobson's actual words, and I am prepared to quote them again if the President forgets them. I point out that the Federal spirit is lacking in Victoria most, and the want of it is displayed in an objectionable form.

The PRESIDENT.—Senator Dobson did not go into all these details.

Senator MATHESON.—Senator Dobson made a general statement which he did not attempt to substantiate. I am making particular statements which I can substantiate.

The PRESIDENT.—I have no wish to hamper the honorable senator in his argument, but I really think he is wandering from the question.

Senator MATHESON.—I may say in general terms that I have six most interesting items of evidence to show an absolute want of the Federal spirit on the part of Victoria. I should like to refer to them, but I am debarred from doing so by the ruling of the President. What does it all amount to? The real objection to this line has never been brought to the surface. The real objection of the Age is that it would facilitate the emigration of persons to Western Australia from this State, which is going on day by day. There is no doubt that, with the finest climate on our western coast, with our magnificent land, with our regular rainfall, and with unparalleled openings for investment, the entire stream of emigration which flows weekly from Victoria to both Canada and South Africa, would be diverted to Western Australia. I take it—and I make the remark with the conviction that it is absolutely true—that the opposition which is fomented by the newspapers in this State entirely arises from that cause. They are anxious that the people in the eastern States should be debarred from facilities to reach our glorious State.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—Speaking to the amendment, I wish to congratulate Senator Matheson upon the splendid fight he has made for his State. During the debate the representatives of Western Australia have presented the case in as strong a light as it could be put. If any honorable senator is wavering as to whether he should vote for the Bill or for the amendment, he certainly has had very fair reasons furnished in a number of the speeches to assist him in coming to a decision. Having listened to their speeches, both last year and this year, I regret to say that I cannot bring myself to vote for the Bill. I shall vote for the amendment, and, if it is defeated, against the second reading of the Bill.

Senator DAWSON.—Is the honorable senator sorry that he is going to do violence to his conscience?

Senator O'KEEFE.—No; I regret that safer reasons for supporting the Bill have not been furnished. I regret that the representatives of Western Australia, who, I am satisfied, voiced the opinion of a large majority of its people, have not been able to satisfy the representatives of other States that it would be a fair and equitable thing to pass this Bill. To put it briefly, they have a bad case. A few months ago, I had the honour of being a guest of the Government of their State. I found amongst all sections of the community an almost unanimous opinion as to the desirability of constructing this line. I found that a large number of the people in all classes of business were of opinion that the State had been persuaded by false pretences to join the Federation.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator is now discussing the main question, and not the amendment.

Senator O'KEEFE.—If any reason were wanting to make honorable senators vote for the amendment it would be found in the speech delivered last Thursday night by the Minister of Defence. It certainly must have decided the votes of two or three honorable senators, who were wavering in their minds. He laid it down clearly that the Government of South Australia desires a controlling voice as to the route of the survey. He mentioned that the present Premier, Mr. Price, is of opinion that the people and Government of the State should be able to direct the route of the survey. In most emphatic terms he declared that this was a question in which South Australia should have a controlling voice. We are now told in very forcible language by Senator Matheson that the chief reason for the construction of the line is the necessity for perfecting the defences of the Commonwealth. So far, that reason has always appealed to me more forcibly than any other. If, however, that is the chief reason for advocating this project, I think it is not fair that South Australia should have a controlling voice as to the route. Surely that is entirely a question for the Parliament of the Commonwealth to deal with.

Senator MATHESON.—So it is; they only want to lay down the route.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am referring to the speech of Senator Playford, in which he said that he, as a resident of South Australia, decidedly agreed with the attitude of its Premier that the Government would not be justified in agreeing to a survey unless they had the right to indicate which route should be taken. It seems to me that the question is inextricably mixed, and that we are not justified in going on with the Bill. We should have a clearer understanding as to whether, in the event of the Bill being passed, the route of the survey is to be decided by the Commonwealth Government and its officials, or whether the Government of South Australia shall be able to step in at any moment, as they could do unless the Bill were altered, and refuse to allow a survey to be taken along the selected route.

Senator MATHESON.—They could refuse eventually to pass a Bill to give their consent?

Senator O'KEEFE.—The Premier of South Australia said that unless the survey were taken in a direction which would suit the Government of South Australia they probably would not consent to the construction of the railway.

Senator MCGREGOR.—They never said anything of the kind.

Senator CROFT.—They agreed to a survey being made, but reserved the right to criticise the route.

Senator O'KEEFE.—When they reserved the right to criticise the route, they also reserved the right to reject it, when probably all the work would have to be done again. Where does the Commonwealth come in? Last Thursday night the Minister of Defence said that the Government of Western Australia were charging 100 per cent. more for carrying Tasmanian goods by rail than for carrying locally-made goods. To me that is the strongest evidence of parochialism that we could have. Perhaps the strongest argument which could appeal to the representatives of other States was furnished last night by the Treasurer, when he mentioned that since Federation three States had gained a large amount, and three States had lost a large amount. New South Wales has gained £5,941,408, Western Australia has gained £580,079, and South Australia has gained £49,244. Queensland has lost £2,180,587, Tasmania has lost £796,601, and Victoria has lost £72,792.

The PRESIDENT.—Has this argument any reference to the amendment?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I intended to connect the argument with the amendment, just as Senator Matheson did, but of course I am willing to withdraw the figures if that is your ruling. That is one of the strongest arguments which appeal to the representatives of other States, whose finances have suffered since the establishment of Federation.

The PRESIDENT.—I must ask the honorable senator not to continue a line of argument which has no relevancy to the amendment.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I bow to your ruling, sir. I regret that the representatives of Western Australia, who have made such a strenuous fight for the passage of the Bill, and have worked so hard to bring forward every conceivable detail in support of it, have not been able to make out a stronger case, quite apart from any feeling of parochialism or anything of that sort. Until fuller information is furnished I shall have to support the amendment.

Senator HENDERSON (Western Australia).—I wish to compliment those honorable senators who have so ingeniously manufactured this amendment. It appears to me that it is a beautiful subterfuge.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think the honorable senator is in order in characterizing the amendment as a subterfuge.

Senator HENDERSON.—I bow to your ruling, sir, and withdraw the remark. At any rate, the amendment is a most ingenious method by which honorable senators may be able to avoid giving a vote on the direct issue. To ignore the right of South Australia to be consulted in a matter that affects her would be absurd. As a Western Australian, I feel quite sure that the position taken up by South Australia does not in any way warrant the amendment. The South Australian people merely ask that they shall be consulted by the Commonwealth authorities in respect to the route to be chosen in order that an arrangement may be made satisfactory to both parties. There is nothing more reasonable than that such a course should be pursued. We, as Western Australians, can heartily indorse the position of the South Australians in that respect. But for this Senate practically to endeavour to compel South Australia to express herself as to building a railway before the survey is made, is certainly an entirely different question. When an analysis is made of the whole of the facts the evidence may be such as to convince even some Western Australians that the project is one that could not be carried to a completion until years and years have passed. In that case they, as men having an idea of what is right and wrong, would probably consider seriously before attempting to launch the Commonwealth in a project that looked hopeless from the outset. I entirely oppose the amendment, believing that it is simply an ingenious attempt to evade the main question.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—May I point out in passing how exceedingly awkward it is to have one's remarks on the main question reported in Hansard for one session, and one's remarks on the amendment in another set. But unless the Standing Orders are altered, I suppose that that is inevitable. I wish to address a few words to the Senate with reference to the amendment, which proposes the postponement of this matter until the South Australian Government has shown a willingness to permit the construction of the line. It is clearly indicated in the quotations from the official correspondence, read by Senator Playford last week, and published in Hansard, that while South Australia does not object to £20,000 of Commonwealth money being spent upon a survey, she most carefully refrains from any indication of her willingness that the railway shall be built if the Commonwealth desires to build it. Those who know anything of matters in South Australia are aware that that State is making a great and costly effort to provide shipping facilities in the Gulf that do not at present exist in the port of Adelaide. There is a strong feeling in portions of South Australia—I have no means of knowing whether that opinion expresses the views of the majority—in opposition to this proposal.

Senator MCGREGOR.—There is not even a fairly large majority.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I have no doubt that the honorable senator has more knowledge of the opinions of the majority in South Australia than I or any one else not living in his State can possibly have. But the fact remains that it is well known that the desire of those who wish to see the railway built is to bring about a terminus of mail routes at Fremantle, thereby taking from Adelaide the position of a place of call for mail boats. Undoubtedly that would be greatly to the disadvantage of South Australia, as is shown clearly by the official correspondence. It is for this reason that South Australia in the correspondence is so careful to say, "You may spend as much money as you like, but we will not give the slightest promise that the line shall be built." I should like to be able to apply these remarks to the general question, but as I spoke on it last session, I cannot do so again. But I think it would be very desirable to add to the amendment of Senator Givens another amendment, that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee for inquiry and report.

The PRESIDENT.—Such an amendment could only be moved after the second reading.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I was not aware of that peculiarity in our standing order?

The PRESIDENT.—It is a standing order of every Parliament in Australia.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Not, I think, of the Parliament of which I was a member for twenty years.

The PRESIDENT.—I think so.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—However, I am not proposing to move such an amendment at this stage, though it is a matter that is well worthy of consideration. I make the suggestion in the hope that some other honorable senator who has the right to move such an amendment will consider it.

Senator PEARCE.—Why should not the honorable senator move it after voting for the second reading?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am being supplied with such a large amount of pleasant advice that I am afraid I shall run some risk of being bogged amongst the various proposals.

Senator PEARCE.—Especially as the honorable senator is so unsophisticated!

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I think it would be better for me to suspend operations with a view to take action at a subsequent stage of the proceedings if I think it desirable. But, meanwhile, I strongly emphasize my view that it is undesirable until South Australia has given an indication of her willingness that we should take further steps in regard to the construction of the line. I do not think we should be justified in spending the considerable amount of the Commonwealth money involved with the almost certain prospect of it being insufficient until we know the mind of South Australia. I would point out also that the Minister in charge of the Bill has carefully hedged himself by not limiting the amount. He does not indicate a belief that £20,000 will be sufficient.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Oh, yes, it will.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Under the circumstances, the amendment should, in the interests of the Commonwealth, be carried at the present stage.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I desire to say that I am opposed to the amendment, because it is entirely unnecessary. No honorable senator has yet shown that the telegrams which have been received from the South Australian Government indicate any desire that its consent to the proposed survey shall be obtained. I think it is as well that honorable senators should look to the history of this matter. If they do so, I am sure that there are some who will be surprised to know whom they are supporting, and what led to South Australia taking the attitude that she did in reference to the scheme. What is the history of this matter? Up to a certain period South Australia was heartily in favour of this proposal, so much so that leading public men of the State pledged themselves to do their utmost to carry out this railway proposal on the accomplishment of Federation.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Not a word was uttered against the railway.

Senator PEARCE.—Not even the leader of the Opposition in the State Parliament raised any objection when the promises referred to were made by the Premier. But something happened. The Jenkins Government entered into a most iniquitous scheme to give away half of the State for the purposes of a railway on the land grant system; and they saw that the Commonwealth proposals for a transcontinental railway would be likely to operate to the disadvantage of the railway they were prepared to support. It was then, and not until then, that some politicians in South Australia began to raise objections; and I ask honorable senators who are now clamouring for the consent of South Australia to remember that they are playing the same game that was played by the Jenkins Government.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Surely the honorable senator will admit that it is necessary to get the consent of South Australia?

Senator PEARCE.—It is, but consent to what? It is not necessary to get the consent of South Australia to make a survey. That State has never thrown any obstacle in the way of that proposal. What South Australia claims is that, when the question of constructing a transcontinental railway arises, the Government of that State ought to be consulted as to the route. My point is that politicians and others of South Australia never raised this question of consent until they saw that a transcontinental railway constructed by the Federal Government would be likely to hinder the progress of the land grant system line which they favoured. Personally, I do not believe that the people of South Australia regard the proposed Commonwealth railway in the light of a rival to the other scheme. In my opinion, each scheme ought to stand on its own merits, and, under proper conditions, I should be prepared to vote for both. There is no doubt that the suggested Commonwealth railway interfered with the success of the land grant scheme, to which a large section of the public of South Australia were opposed, simply because it was a land grant scheme. The leader of the Labour Party in the State was against the land grant proposal; but the Jenkins Government, in order to further its interests, attempted in every way to block the Federal survey proposal. The whole of the letters and telegrams sent by the Federal Government to the State Government of South Australia, were couched in the most respectful terms, merely asking that the constitutional obligation should be carried out, and that the State Government should make known their views. On the other hand, the letters from the State Government to the Federal Government were written in most insulting and disrespectful language, calculated in every way to force a breach and to drag the Federal Government into disrepute. One of the blackest deeds which stand to the record of the Jenkins Government is their attempt to gain their object by means of such language. What is the attitude of the people of South Australia? I am not concerned with what is the attitude of the late Jenkins Government. That Government represented those who wished to give away one-half of the freehold of the State to people who were prepared to carry out an iniquitous gambling scheme. I am concerned with the attitude of the representatives in this Chamber of the people of South Australia. Is there an honorable senator from South Australia who was elected as a declared opponent of the railway in respect of which it is proposed to have a survey? Is there one honorable senator from South Australia who was elected pledged to vote against and to block this Bill? I have not heard of one.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Neither is there one from Queensland.

Senator PEARCE.—At the late Federal elections in South Australia, Senator McGregor, Senator Story, and Senator Guthrie raised this question on many platforms. Those honorable senators, I believe, told the people that if they were elected they were prepared to carry out South Australia's part in assisting to bring about the construction of the railway; and those honorable senators were returned at the top of the poll.

Senator TURLEY.—Senator Guthrie does not say that now.

Senator PEARCE.—I think that the division list will show that Senator Guthrie is for the Bill.

Senator TURLEY.—But Senator Pearce is speaking about the construction of the line.

Senator PEARCE.—I am speaking of the Bill before us. South Australia's attitude in regard to the measure is shown by the attitude of the representatives of that State within this Chamber in a more impressive manner than it is by the attitude of those who tried to engineer the land grant railway through the State Parliament. I am surprised that some of our Queensland friends, who in that State fought the greatest fight in Australia against the principle of land grant railways, should be prepared to take the opinion of men who tried to bring about the construction of a railway of the kind in South Australia.

Senator DOBSON.—Every word the honorable senator says proves that an Act of Parliament by the South Australian State is the only satisfactory form of consent.

Senator PEARCE. — The Commonwealth Government have received a telegram from the Premier of South Australia in these words—

We have no objection to the survey of the Western Australian railway—

Senator GIVENS.—“Provided”?

Senator PEARCE.—There is no “provided” in it—but we desire to be consulted as to the route. It must be understood that this in no way binds our hands to the ultimate approval of a policy.

I challenge those who wish to put a certain construction on that message to send a telegram to the Premier of South Australia asking whether he and his Government wish to bind the hands of the Federal Parliament as to the number of surveys that shall be made, or as to the route of any survey.

Senator STYLES.—That telegram says so.

Senator PEARCE. — I have the assurance of the Premier of South Australia, given to me personally—and so has another honorable senator—that his construction of the telegram, which was laid before him, is—“So far as we are concerned, you can survey any route you like, and as many routes as you like; the meaning of the telegram is that we are not concerned with the survey which we wish you to go on with, but what we ask is that, when the survey is made, and the Federal Parliament is asked to commit itself to a Railway Construction Bill, the measure shall be submitted to us, in order that we may be consulted as to the route the line is to follow.” I say that that is a perfectly justifiable course to take. The Constitution gives the State certain power, inasmuch as the railway cannot be built by the Commonwealth through any territory, without the consent of the State concerned. The Premier of South Australia would be false to his trust if, while consenting to the survey, he did not notify that, before proposals for construction were introduced, he should be allowed to exercise the right given to him by the Constitution—that he should be consulted as to the route. It is a mere quibbling with the position to say that the State Government ever laid down any condition as to which route should be surveyed; it is ridiculous to suppose that any Government would seek to bind the Commonwealth in that way. The surveyors themselves will not know the exact route until they have completed the survey, and, therefore, it is impossible for the State Government to tie us down to so many miles north or south of a certain line. The proposition has only to be looked at to reveal its absurdity. It has been said that South Australia objects to any route being selected, because the building of the line would make Fremantle the terminus for the mail boats. In the first place the Western Australian people generally have never expressed any such belief, and, as a Westralian, I have no idea of the sort. I do not think the time will ever come when any port of Australia will be the sole terminus for the mail boats. The disposition is not to shorten, but to lengthen the voyage of those boats, and propositions are already being made to extend the run to Brisbane.

The PRESIDENT.—Is the honorable senator discussing the main question?

Senator PEARCE.—I am dealing with the contention that South Australia's objection is based on the ground that such a railway would make Fremantle the terminus for the mail boats. I am showing that Western Australia has not expressed any such opinion—that it is an unreasonable contention, which bears no weight.

Senator GIVENS.—Not the terminus for the mail boats, but the terminus for the mails.

Senator PEARCE.—Senator Givens has raised another important question. What would South Australia lose by Fremantle being made the terminus for the mails? What on earth does South Australia gain by the handling of a few hundred mail bags at Largs Bay?

Senator GIVENS.—South Australia may think that, if the mail terminus were Fremantle, the boats might not call at Adelaide.

Senator STYLES.—And, of course, the boats would not call.

Senator PEARCE.—The mail boats would continue to call at Adelaide, especially in view of the fact that the expansion of the export trade of South Australia in apples, butter, and farm produce generally would make it worth their while. Are we to understand that the mail boats at present call at Largs Bay for the purpose of giving a few hours' work to the crew—and not to lumpers and wharf labourers, who are not employed in this way—in the handling of a few hundred mail bags? Is that the awful loss that South Australia is to suffer? Is that the secret of the opposition which we are told exists in South Australia to this railway, but which, I think, I have shown does not exist? Is it not strange to see the wonderful anxiety on the part of Queensland members for South Australian interests?

Senator GIVENS.—I am not anxious for the interests of South Australia, but for the interests of the whole Commonwealth.

Senator PEARCE.—Would it not rather be thought that Senators McGregor, Story, or Guthrie, would rush into this awful breach to save the downfall of the shipping industry of South Australia? No; it has to be left to our Queensland friends to discover that the whole State edifice of South Australia will tumble into ruin because a few mail bags are not landed at Adelaide, but at Fremantle. I think that the people of South Australia should make some sort of presentation to those honorable senators in acknowledgment of their vigilant and valiant efforts to protect the interest of that State.

Senator GIVENS.—The honorable senator is entirely begging the question.

Senator PEARCE.—As Senator Givens well knows, I am prevented from debating the main question, and confined to the matter of South Australia's attitude. I think I have shown—at any rate, I am satisfied on the point—that the amendment is unnecessary. It is not asked for in the interest of South Australia; and, even if it were in those interests, it would be a reflection on the representatives of that State that they should not have been the first to move.

Senator GIVENS.—I moved the amendment in the interest of the Commonwealth.

Senator PEARCE.—I am satisfied that South Australian representatives are the best guardians of South Australian rights. South Australian senators, however, have satisfied themselves that the amendment is unnecessary, and the Premier and Government of the State have shown by their telegram, that they are prepared to guard their rights when the proper time arrives, which will be when the proposal is made to construct the railway. Senator de Largie reminds me that, while Senator Givens has never gone to the trouble to go to South Australia to find out the opinion of the people there. Senator de Largie, Senator Smith, myself, and various other Western Australian members have been to that State for that purpose. We have addressed large meetings there, and at every one of those meetings resolutions were carried, not only in favour of this Bill, but of the construction of the railway.

Senator MULCAHY.—Why not come to Tasmania and enlighten the people there about it?

Senator PEARCE.—We are prepared to do that, and, judging from the remarks of some honorable senators from Tasmania on this Bill, they badly need enlightenment on this question. I should think that Senator Givens, having the interests of South Australia in this matter so much at heart, might have consulted the South Australian people. I am not aware that at any big public meeting in South Australia the honorable senator has been called upon to stand up for the rights of that State.

Senator GIVENS.—I am not so much concerned with the interests of South Australia as with the interests of the Commonwealth in the matter.

Senator PEARCE.—I take it that a certain provision was inserted in the Constitution in order to safeguard State rights. You, Mr. President, were a member of the Federal Convention, and helped to frame the Constitution. When agreeing to the provision to which I refer I have no doubt it was your intention that South Australia should have the right to say in the last resort whether a certain railway should be built through her territory. We have a State Government charged with the duty of seeing that the Federal Parliament does not impinge on their authority. We have in this Senate six representatives of the State, whose particular duty it is to see that the rights of the State are not impinged on. The State Government of South Australia have not yet said that they object to the construction of this line, or that they object to this proposed survey. I understand that the six honorable senators representing the State here will vote for the proposed survey.

Senator STYLES.—We have not heard anything from the State Parliament at all.

Senator PEARCE.—It remains for a Queensland representative to step into the breach and save South Australia from having her rights voted away by her representatives in the Senate.

Senator GIVENS.—If the opinion in South Australia is as the honorable senator has stated, there will be no trouble in getting her consent to this proposal, and we can then proceed properly.

Senator PEARCE.—Senator Styles has stated that the South Australian Parliament has said nothing on this matter. I remind the honorable senator that there is in the South Australian Parliament a very vigilant Opposition, and if Mr. Price in his telegram has in any way jeopardized the rights of South Australia—

Senator STYLES.—He could not do it.

Senator PEARCE.—Or had done anything against the interests of that State, the very vigilant Opposition would be the first to raise an outcry on the subject in the South Australian Parliament. This incident has occurred at a very crucial period in the history of the present South Australian Government, when the Opposition are looking for something with which to fight them, and yet no member of the South Australian Parliament has objected to the terms of Mr. Price's telegram.

Senator FRASER.—He is not entitled to speak for the South Australian Parliament.

Senator PEARCE.—He is more entitled to do so than is any other member of that Parliament, because he is the leader of a Government which possesses the confidence of that Parliament, or it would not be where it is. I take it that in this matter Mr. Price has spoken for the South Australian Parliament, because every member of that Parliament was free to criticise the telegram adversely, and no member raised his voice against it.

Senator STYLES.—Let the South Australian Government introduce a Bill on the subject, and there will soon be voices heard against it.

Senator PEARCE.—I think I have shown that we have the consent of South Australia for all that is necessary for the purposes of this Bill. I have shown that that State is prepared to support the Bill from the statement of a representative of her State Parliament, and from the statements of her Federal representatives. It is, therefore, hypocritical that an amendment of this character should be brought forward by an honorable senator representing a State within whose borders no part of the proposed railway will be constructed, and which cannot be affected by South Australia giving up any of her rights under the Constitution in this matter.

Senator MULCAHY (Tasmania).—I should like to begin my remarks by expressing a hope that the compliments which have been passed from one side to the other about parochialism will cease. I should be the last to accuse honorable senators who are so strongly supporting this Bill of being actuated solely by parochial motives. I have interjected during the debate that I think they should be the last to attribute such motives to any one opposing the Bill.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Therefore, we are most likely to be provincial?

Senator MULCAHY.—I think it might be admitted that honorable senators from Western Australia are looking forward to a benefit to be gained by their State in which the other States will not participate, and therefore they should not be the first to make these somewhat offensive charges. Honorable senators will admit that Tasmania can receive absolutely no benefit from this proposal.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not admit anything of the kind. Tasmanians will get their letters from Western Australia two days sooner.

Senator MULCAHY.—I do not propose to deal with that now. I hope to be able to get through my speech without saying anything to wound the susceptibilities of honorable senators from Western Australia. I believe I can suggest sufficiently strong reasons for opposing this measure without descending to anything of that kind. Whatever action may be taken, I trust that the Bill will be defeated or carried by an absolute majority of the Senate. I have already shown that I shall not be one to participate in any unfair tactics in order to defeat the measure.

Senator DE LARGIE.—All the tactics have been tried; it is too late now to make excuses of that kind.

Senator MULCAHY.—I make no excuses of any kind. I have not so far spoken on the Bill, and I have no need to make excuses for other people. I do not propose to discuss the question as to whether this so-called transcontinental railway shall be constructed or not. I admit frankly that the expansion of Western Australia, and of her sister State, South Australia, will probably in the near future afford a very much better justification for the construction of this line than any that now exists. I believe that the construction of a railway connecting Western Australia with the eastern States in the Federation will become a national necessity in a short time. The question we have to discuss is whether, as senators who have in a particular way intrusted to them the guardianship of the rights of their States, we can consent to the Commonwealth directly, or by implication, assuming the responsibility for the construction of this line. Several honorable senators have stated that this vote of £20,000 is asked for merely for investigation purposes. They have denied that they will attach any further responsibility to the action of the Federal Parliament than can be associated with the mere voting of this £20,000 for this purpose of inspection. I differ from honorable senators on that point, because, even in their speeches on this Bill, they have referred over and over again to the construction of the line.

Senator CROFT.—In answering arguments put forward by those who oppose the Bill.

Senator MULCAHY.—Senator Croft did good service for his State by dealing with technical matters which threw a great deal of light on the question. The honorable senator appeared to think there was some reason for showing that the construction of the line would not be so costly as some honorable senators assume. What was the honorable senator's object? The honorable senator also said that he would not ask any member of the Senate to vote for the construction of the line if the survey disclosed that there would be particular difficulties. With all due respect to the honorable senator, I say, "Thank you for nothing." Who would think of asking the Senate to vote for the construction of a line if the surveyors reported that it would be inadvisable, or very costly? To follow the argument used by Senator Croft and his colleagues to its logical conclusion, if we vote for the survey, and the subsequent report from the surveyors is to the effect that the line can be constructed comparatively easily, and for £4,000,000 or £5,000,000, the average estimate of its cost of construction, we shall be bound to support it. Senator Croft and his colleagues will in such a case contend that we have committed ourselves.

Senator CROFT.—Surely the honorable senator is not afraid of that?

Senator MULCAHY.—Why are we asked by the wealthiest State in the Federation to vote this paltry sum of £20,000, unless there is something behind it?

Senator MATHESON.—Because it is a Federal matter.

Senator MULCAHY.—Who says it is a Federal matter?

Senator MATHESON.—The Government—the honorable senator's Government.

Senator MULCAHY.—There is no Government here that is my Government. I am quite an independent member of the Senate. What is behind this vote for a survey? Is it not the construction of the railway?

Senator PLAYFORD.—That will not follow necessarily.

Senator MULCAHY.—It will not necessarily follow if the surveyors report that it would be too costly, or that it ought not to be constructed, but if the survey discloses that it can be constructed within the estimates, or guesses which have been made of the probable cost of construction, what will be expected of us? Will it not be said that having already put our hands to the plough, we should not turn back, but should go on and construct the railway?

Senator CROFT.—If any other inquiry should justify action on the part of the Commonwealth, would not the honorable senator support it?

Senator DOBSON.—I quoted Sir John Forrest's words, in which he said that any one voting for this Bill must vote for the construction of the line.

Senator MULCAHY.—I propose to quote the words of some honorable senators on this question. Senator Pearce has said with regard to it—

This is a proposal for making Federation with Western Australia a real Federation.

I shall have some reference to make to a real Federation before I sit down.

I refer, of course—

to the construction of the proposed railway from the east to the west.

A little later on the honorable senator said—

They would not be doing their duty if they consented to the construction of this railway merely from a spirit of good fellowship.

Quite a sound principle—

They had the right to ask for, and they should be given good reasons why the railway should be constructed.

Is there anything about the survey there?

Senator PEARCE.—I want the survey to enable honorable senators to get those reasons.

Senator MULCAHY.—I suppose the Premier of Western Australia is responsible for the issue of the very interesting pamphlet entitled, "The West Australian Union Railway." I suppose he may be taken to speak for the people of Western Australia, as Senator Pearce claims Mr. Price to have spoken for the people of South Australia.

Senator PEARCE.—No; that was Mr. James, and he has been rejected by the people of Western Australia.

Senator MULCAHY.—Not on this question.

Senator PEARCE.—On every question.

Senator MULCAHY.—Then I suppose that by-and-by, when Mr. Price is rejected the honorable senator will turn round, and say that what he said on the subject of this railway has been rejected by the people of South Australia?

Senator MCGREGOR.—He is not going to be rejected.

Senator MULCAHY.—These may not be the words of the Premier of Western Australia, but they are contained in a pamphlet issued with his authority. I find this statement made—

The bridging of this gap with the iron road is an undertaking which it is proposed that the Federal Government shall now carry out as work of national interest, and one essential to full Federal security.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Some prominent Federalists of Tasmania used that as an argument to induce Western Australia to join the Federation.

Senator MULCAHY.—I am not concerned with the inconsistencies of other persons, and I am not to be saddled with their sins.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Repudiation is so general that no one is surprised at it.

Senator MULCAHY.—I dislike the use of that word, and the honorable senator is not helping his cause by using it.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is the truth, all the same.

The PRESIDENT.—Order!

Senator MULCAHY.—The more temperately this debate is conducted the better it will be for the question under consideration, and the dignity of the House. Who is asking for this vote of £20,000 to carry out a survey? It is asked for by Western Australia, a large and important State, with a population of 200,000.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is part of our defence scheme.

Senator MULCAHY.—I do not accept the Minister as a satisfactory authority on matters of defence.

Senator PLAYFORD.—But look at the reports of Major-General Edwards and Major-General Hutton.

Senator MULCAHY.—It is proposed to see if the two railway systems can be connected by a line 1,100 miles long, and to carry out the inquiry at the expense of the Commonwealth. I admit that South Australia is associated with Western Australia in this matter, but the request for an inquiry comes from the latter State, which joined the Federation under specially favorable terms. I object to the Federation assuming a large responsibility of this kind until we are truly federated. Western Australia was allowed to tax the products of other States on a diminishing scale for a period of five years, and, acting with New South Wales, she secured the adoption of that wretched un-federal system known as the book-keeping arrangement.

Senator WALKER.—It was the Convention which framed that provision.

Senator MULCAHY.—It was done at the instance of New South Wales, and it is a most un-federal provision. Western Australia, which yields nearly £9,000,000 worth of gold annually, is asking little Tasmania to bear the expense of this project.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Does it want to get its hand into our pocket?

Senator MULCAHY.—No; I desire all the States to be partners on even terms. I do not like the idea of Western Australia carefully conserving to herself every penny of her revenue during the time of prosperity and preparing to bleed the Commonwealth when the time of adversity comes round. With the enormous debt she is piling up, the time will come when she will be glad to get assistance and will come to the Commonwealth for it. The Constitution contains a provision which is said to have been put in for the benefit of Tasmania, and which allows the Commonwealth to assist a State in financial difficulties. I have always advised the electors of Tasmania to pay their way, and not to appeal for help to the Federation, no matter what expense it may have caused to them. This is a very great question, indeed, but behind it is a still greater question, and that is the nationalization of the railways of the States. What sort of a business proposition is the project to which we are now asked to commit ourselves, and the Commonwealth must look at it as a business concern? Suppose that we offered this as a concession, with a land grant thrown in, to a number of capitalists, and said to them, "Here you can come in, and construct 1,100 miles of railway under certain conditions. The position when the line is constructed will be that the front door of it will belong to Western Australia, and the back door to South Australia. The intervening section will be yours." How many capitalists would touch it? And this will be the ownership the Commonwealth will have.

Senator STYLES.—Who would work it?

Senator PLAYFORD. — South Australia would work one end, and Western Australia the other. It would not pay the Commonwealth to work the line.

Senator MULCAHY.—Who would make any profit out of the working of the railway? Who would have to foot the bill for its loss each year? Even the advocates of this scheme estimate a loss of £60,000 a year, to start with. If that is the case, what sort of a business scheme can it be called?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Tasmania would not lose much.

Senator MULCAHY.—The Minister of Defence said more the other night to damage this proposal in the eyes of business men than did all the arguments which had been advanced against it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—No. What did I say?

Senator MULCAHY.—The honorable gentleman pointed to that which must be evident to every one. He said, "You are going to have a break of gauge."

Senator PLAYFORD.—There need not be a break of gauge.

Senator MULCAHY.—Then what becomes of the argument that, by the construction of this line, we should save a vast amount of time?

Senator PLAYFORD.—A train could be run on a 3 ft. 6 in. line as fast as the express trains are now run from State to State.

Senator MULCAHY. — The figures which have been quoted to the Senate are not calculations, but mere guesses. No one need discount the ability of the engineers to deal with the subject, but they frankly admit that they had to make their report on second-hand evidence, and very little of that, indeed. Let us take the evidence of Mr. O'Connor, who cannot possibly be said to be prejudiced against the proposal. I shall select his first report, which was dated the 1st May, 1901.

Senator MATHESON.—Surely the last report is the best one to take?

Senator MULCAHY.—Can the honorable senator tell me truly that there was very much more information before the engineers who made the last report than there was before Mr. O'Connor?

Senator MATHESON.—Yes; an enormous amount of additional evidence.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—They got the opinions of Mr. Muir, M.I.C.E., who had travelled over the whole line.

Senator MULCAHY.—Yes; and they demonstrated that there is water to be had at one spot in a distance of 1,100 miles.

Senator DE LARGIE.—There have been two parties over the line since then.

Senator MULCAHY.—I suppose I can read this portion of Mr. O'Connor's report—

In an undertaking of this magnitude, traversing 1,100 miles of country, which is mostly uninhabited, and uncultivated, and waterless, although there are no engineering difficulties to contend with, there is necessarily a good deal of uncertainty as to its probable cost.

That text is as good to-day as it was in 1901.

Senator PLAYFORD. — The honorable senator is arguing in favour of a survey being carried out.

Senator MULCAHY.—I am arguing in favour of a survey being made, if the Minister so wishes, by those who are interested in the construction of this railway, and not at the expense of Tasmania, which has no interest in the project further than the possibility of losing, through its construction and working, a large sum which she cannot afford to lose. Mr. O'Connor's estimates of the traffic on the line have quite recently been adopted. But I wish to point out the absurd basis on which they have been built. In his report he says—

As regards basis for estimate of probable receipts, we have data as follows:—

The average number of passengers each way per week, between Fremantle and the Eastern States, for the last three years, has been about 400, and it has been fairly uniform for each of the three years.

Counting both journeys, this means 800 passengers per week, namely, over 40,000 a year, the majority of whom reside upon, or are connected with the gold-fields, and would consequently probably go by overland railway in order to save time, and to keep in touch with their business, unless it involves considerable extra expense. Instead of involving extra expense, however, it will, on the contrary (as is evidenced by tables "A" and "B" herewith), be, in many cases, much cheaper for them to go by overland railway, if constructed, than to go by sea.

Side by side with the cost of travelling by rail from Kalgoorlie to Fremantle, and thence by water to Adelaide, this engineer put down the charges then made by the deep-sea boats, and also by the Inter-State boats. Since that time I understand that the rates on the latter have been reduced. But, adopting that basis, it seems to me, from a careful perusal of the report, that Mr. O'Connor assumed that every one of these 40,000 passengers would forsake the boats immediately and travel by the trans-continental railway.

Senator FRASER. — Not one-fourth of them would.

Senator MULCAHY.—I do not think it is at all likely that they would.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—If cheaper I think they would.

Senator MULCAHY. — In some cases the passengers might use the railway.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—This estimate is calculated on the ordinary Australian rates.

Senator MULCAHY. — No; there are two rates, namely, 1d. and 1½d. per mile.

Senator STYLES.—There is no such rate as the latter in Australia.

Senator MULCAHY. — Taking the second case, what revenue would be obtained from the carriage of 40,000 passengers at £4 11s. 8d. each?

Senator MATHESON. — The honorable senator might as well discuss the tariff in the refreshment bars.

Senator MULCAHY. — Although the honorable senator deprecated the introduction of extraneous matter, still he erred a great deal in that respect. In my opinion, this calculation is relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill. At the rate laid down by Mr. O'Connor, 40,000 passengers per annum would give a revenue of £183,333 6s. 8d. His estimate of the total receipts was £240,000. Apparently, he has only allowed £56,000 for goods traffic. But it goes without saying that the goods traffic along 1,700 miles of railway would not be very considerable in competition with sea traffic, though there may be some intermediate traffic in stock and perishable goods.

Senator MCGREGOR.—What does the honorable senator mean by speaking of 1,700 miles?

Senator MULCAHY.—I was speaking of the whole line between Adelaide and Fremantle, because not much stuff is likely to be taken on at Port Augusta. The traffic, if there is any, will be between Adelaide and Fremantle. But even if we knock off 600 miles, how many people will send goods 1,100 miles by rail when they can send them by water at one-half the cost? I mention this to show the wretched manner in which this project has been put before us. No harm will be done if the matter is delayed. On the contrary, great good will be done if an opportunity is afforded to Western Australia and South Australia to demonstrate the feasibility of the proposal. Then they can come to the Federal Parliament and ask for Commonwealth assistance, in which case I venture to say that even the Tasmanian representatives will be prepared to give them a fair hearing. But if once we put our hands to the plough, and plough this furrow right out, we shall be initiating a departure from the very safe non-borrowing policy which the Commonwealth has hitherto followed. If there is one thing more than another which stands to the credit of the Labour Party it is the non-borrowing policy, for which I believe they are responsible, and for which I have always given them every credit. But how are we going to construct 1,100 miles of railway at a cost of £4,000,000, at the lowest estimate, without borrowing? Will Western Australia, which has no income tax and no land tax, consent to direct taxation to provide the money?

Senator GUTHRIE.—This Bill is merely for a survey.

Senator MULCAHY.—I believe that the honorable senator is satisfied that that is the case. No doubt he is voting for the survey under the impression that he is not committing himself to go any further. I can quite understand that the representatives of South Australia feel interested in this line, and in obtaining information about it. They are deeply interested in getting the Commonwealth to construct the line without it costing their State anything.

Senator GUTHRIE.—South Australia does not want the line if it is not warranted.

Senator MULCAHY.—It is pleasant to hear that South Australia is so unselfish.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator would not give us the chance to find out whether the construction of the line would be justified or not.

Senator MULCAHY.—I would give to South Australia and Western Australia every possible chance. We are doing nothing to prevent those States from spending £20,000 for the purpose of a survey if they wish to do it. Nobody would attempt to interfere with them. After they had obtained that information, we should be willing to consider it.

Senator CROFT.—Would the honorable senator accept that survey? He would not accept the report of the engineers-in-chief.

Senator MULCAHY.—We have no report worth the paper it is printed on. I decline to accept a report signed by people who have not passed over the ground. The engineers themselves admit their inability to form a just estimate. Senator Smith knows something about surveying, and he knows that a mere traverse of the country is not sufficient to give any idea of what the cost of a railway will be. There are many other things in connexion with the line than the engineering difficulties. There is the possibility of sand-drifts covering up the railway altogether. When Federation has had time to develop, and we have fuller information, we may be more inclined to look at this matter in the light of a national work than we are able to do now. But at present, I doubt whether we should be justified in authorizing even the beginning of such a work on grounds such as have been put before us. The most that has been said in favour of it is that the line will possibly be useful for defence purposes. I am sorry that Senator Givens has proposed an amendment. I should prefer to defeat the Bill straight-out, but I feel that it is my duty to support the amendment as it has been proposed, because we ought to take all fair means to postpone the consideration of this subject by the Federal Parliament until all the information which can be supplied by the States most interested is forthcoming.

Senator TURLEY (Queensland).—It seems to me that since this question has been under discussion, senators from two States—Queensland and Tasmania—have been more particularly assailed by honorable senators who support the project. Senator Pearce was very much put out this afternoon because Senator Givens had moved the amendment that is now before the Senate. Evidently, in Senator Pearce's opinion, Senator Givens had no right to move in this direction, because he happened to come from Queensland. Nor had he a right to decline to vote for the project, because he wanted further information, and desired to have the assent of the State which, after Western Australia, is most deeply interested—not through its Premier, but through its Parliament. It is not sufficient that the Premier of a State should say that this or that thing should be done. During the course of this debate, we have had brought up the c of various men in politics before Federation took place in reference to the transcontinental railway.

Senator DE LARGIE.—We cannot hear of any one who was against the railway before Federation.

Senator TURLEY.—No one ever heard of the matter in Queensland prior to Federation. It was only after the Commonwealth was established that we heard that there was such a proposal as this Western Australian railway.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable senator never said a word against it during his election campaign.

Senator TURLEY.—I absolutely deny the honorable senator's statement.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Give us some proof.

Senator TURLEY.—I could give proof from the mouths of honorable senators who heard me answer questions from the platform.

Senator DE LARGIE.—We have the word of other Queensland senators against Senator Turley's.

Senator TURLEY.—The reply which I gave from the platform was that I was totally impartial as far as this project was concerned. It is a matter of absolute indifference to me whether the honorable senator who interjects believes me or not.

Senator DE LARGIE.—There is no doubt about the honorable senator's impartiality!

Senator TURLEY.—I can easily understand why the South Australian senators are in favour of the survey being made. But how many are prepared to pledge themselves to the construction of the railway? That is another question altogether. If the Commonwealth were prepared to spend £50,000 on a survey of a line from one end of Queensland to the other, I do not believe that a single senator from Queensland would object. The money would be spent in Queensland, and it would not be natural for us to object. Again, if the Commonwealth proposed to spend money on a survey of a line to Port Darwin, I do not believe that a single South Australian senator would object. And why? Because the money would be spent in their State. But I do not look at the present proposal from that point of view. The question is whether we should be justified in spending this large sum of money when the people who are asking for something to be done for them are able to do it for themselves. It has been stated by Western Australian representatives that a Western Australian Premier has remarked that his Government were prepared to do this work, but could not get the assistance of South Australia. I have heard Sir John Forrest say that the State of Western Australia was prepared to put down her proportion of the money necessary to carry out the survey if South Australia would consent to do her part. But South Australia declared that it would not spend a solitary penny, but that if Western Australia could get the Commonwealth Government to step in, well and good. The position that is taken up by myself and others is that the two States most nearly concerned, altogether outside the question of defence, are South Australia and Western Australia; and that if one State is prepared to vote money for a portion of the survey, the other State should, at least, be asked to give its consent to the construction of the line before anything is done regarding either survey or construction. In my opinion, the survey is part of the construction of a railway, and the cost of the survey is merged in the whole cost all the world over. In Queensland I know that the cost of the survey is reckoned as part of the total expenditure on a work of this kind; and when we are asked to pass this Bill I contend that we are asked to start the work of construction.

Senator PLAYFORD.—No.

Senator TURLEY.—Absolutely, yes.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Surveys are sometimes made, and no railway is constructed in consequence.

Senator TURLEY.—That is so, but in such cases the money spent on the survey might just as well have been thrown into the sea, and I am sure the Minister of Defence would not like that to be the destination of Federal money.

Senator PLAYFORD.—But a survey may prevent large unnecessary expenditure.

Senator TURLEY.—We know that surveys are sometimes made with other objects than that of constructing railways. In Queensland I know that surveys have been consented to by Ministries, simply in order to gain support when support was impossible by any other means, and I fancy the same sort of thing has occurred in other States.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Not in South Australia.

Senator TURLEY.—No doubt they are very nice people in South Australia; at any rate, they do not object to the Commonwealth spending money on a survey, while reserving to themselves the right to say, after the money has been spent, that they will have nothing further to do with the project, because the wrong route has been chosen.

Senator STYLES.—Or the wrong gauge has been proposed.

Senator TURLEY.—As pointed out by the Minister of Defence the other day, South Australia does not intend, in his opinion, to have anything to do with the matter if the Commonwealth is not prepared to make the gauge 3 feet 6 inches instead of 4 feet 8½ inches. As the Minister said, the cost of that would be £400,000, and South Australia is not prepared to go to that expense in connexion with a railway constructed for defence. Senator Pearce has expressed his surprise that Queensland senators support the action of the late Premier of South Australia, Mr. Jenkins, who engineered the biggest land steal ever attempted in the Commonwealth. The senators to whom reference is made have not been in the habit of supporting people who engineer land schemes of the kind, but, on the contrary, they have strongly opposed any lines being built in Queensland except by the State. At any rate, I am not prepared to be held up now as one who is following the lead of a man who carried, or attempted to carry, this great land steal. I take up my present position in regard to this Bill, in the belief that the great bulk of the people in the State which I represent are absolutely opposed to the construction of this trans-continental railway.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable senator has no authority for making that statement.

Senator DAWSON.—Senator Turley has no warrant for the statement.

Senator TURLEY.—I believe that if the honorable senators who interject travelled from the Tweed to Cape York they would find the bulk of the people absolutely opposed to the construction of this line. I have been in Queensland since Senator Dawson was there, and have addressed public meetings at a considerable number of places, and I found the consensus of opinion everywhere absolutely opposed to the Commonwealth spending money either on a survey or construction at the present time.

Senator DAWSON.—Has the honorable senator ever heard any persons speak about the matter in Queensland?

Senator TURLEY.—I have dealt with the subject on the platform, and have heard the opinions expressed by my auditors. There is one little matter which I should like to clear up. When Senator Croft was speaking the other day, he stated that every means had been tried to block this proposed survey, and he suggested that when I raised the question whether this Bill was in accordance with our Standing Orders, I was goaded on by Senator Symon. That means, I take it, that I was "used" by Senator Symon with the object of raising a point of order which he himself did not care to raise. That suggestion is entirely without foundation. The gentleman who directed my attention to the matter was Mr. McDonald, a member of another place, and it was only when I was entering the chamber, two or three minutes before I raised the point of order, that I asked Senator Symon his opinion. The honorable and learned senator was not sure about the matter; but when I had laid the facts before him he, in an offhand way, said that my point of order seemed to be pretty conclusive. So far as I know, Senator Symon had not considered the point before, and I was influenced in no way by that gentleman when I drew attention to the matter. I make this statement in order that the credit of looking into the matter may be given to the right person, namely, Mr. McDonald. We have heard a good deal about the attitude I took up in Queensland, but Senator Stewart and Senator Givens heard me asked the question, when I was contesting an election for this Chamber, as to what my opinion was. I have been told by Western Australian representatives that I was totally opposed to this railway, and prejudiced in regard to it, before I entered the House, and that no proper consideration of the matter could be expected from a person like myself. When I was asked the question at the election meeting, I answered that, according to the information I then possessed, I was not in favour of the project; but that, when I came to Melbourne, I should get all the available information, and then, if I thought it to be a fair proposal, I should hold myself free to support it. I did not in any way quibble about the question, as Senator de Largie seems to insinuate. If senators in Western Australia are elected by shirking questions, that is not the way to which the people of Queensland are accustomed.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable senator shirked the question when he was in Western Australia.

Senator TURLEY.—I did not. Before I came to this Chamber I had no information on which to make up my mind, except what had appeared in the press, and I was chary of taking that as reliable.

Senator DAWSON. — Did the honorable senator say that he had not made up his mind?

Senator TURLEY.—What I said I have already informed the honorable senator, and I take up the same position now.

Senator DE LARGIE.—And the honorable senator led the "stone-wall" to show his impartiality!

Senator TURLEY.—When I came to Melbourne I got all the reports and other publications on the subject, and, having read them carefully, I asked Senator de Largie himself, on one or two occasions, whether there was any further information to be obtained. His reply was "No; the reports ought to satisfy any one." The reports might satisfy any one who had very little experience of Australia, but any one who knows anything about this Continent would not be induced by such information to vote for the project. In my opinion, the proper course is for the two States more immediately concerned to arrange this matter between themselves, and then to demonstrate to the Federal Government that this is a fair and reasonable enterprise. The only objection raised by Western Australian senators to this suggestion is contained in the words, "You would not believe us." If that be their objection, the way out of the difficulty would be for the two States Governments to offer to bear the cost, and ask the Commonwealth to appoint the officials and carry out the work. The Western Australian senators, however, are not prepared to take a course like that.

Senator DE LARGIE.—That argument has been answered so often.

Senator TURLEY.—On the contrary, it has never been answered yet. Western Australia is prepared to bear her share of the expense, but the other State insists that the Commonwealth shall do the work.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable senator will see how Queensland will have to bear the expense of the sugar bounties, when they come up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT. — Order; sugar bounties have nothing to do with the question before us.

Senator TURLEY.—We are now threatened with what Western Australian representatives may do when something happens but when that something happens, we all may be prepared. If Western Australian senators are opposed to the policy of White Australia, I hope they will say so openly and candidly.

Senator DAWSON.—Western Australia gains nothing by the sugar bounties, whereas Queensland does.

Senator TURLEY.—A great deal of information is given in the report about the income likely to be derived from this line when it is completed. But all who have had experience know that very few people travel overland when there is the competition of sea communication. A first class return ticket between Brisbane and Melbourne costs £12, which, in addition to 50s. for sleeping berths and meals, makes the cost of an overland journey something like £16. For one passenger who travels by train from Brisbane to Melbourne a dozen travel by boat, for the simple reason that you can get a first-class return ticket by boat from Brisbane to Melbourne, for which you will be fed all the way, six days coming down and six days going back, for £7 10s., or about one-half of what it would cost by rail without those advantages.

Senator DAWSON.—What do the shipping companies pay their men as compared with the wages paid to railway men?

Senator TURLEY.—The shipping companies on this coast are paying better wages than are paid by shipping companies anywhere else in the world.

Senator DAWSON.—About £5 per month.

The PRESIDENT. — I ask Senator Turley not to be led away by irrelevant interjections.

Senator TURLEY.—Senator Dawson is attempting to correct me on a question of seamen's wages.

The PRESIDENT. — The honorable senator should take no notice of the interjection. We cannot have a discussion as to the rate of wages paid to seamen, in dealing with this Bill.

Senator TURLEY.—I have only to say that the honorable senator's statement regarding the rate of wages paid to seamen on our coast is absolutely incorrect, and I speak as a member of the Seamen's Union. What is our experience of the railway line running between the two capitals—Brisbane and Sydney? We have been told that all passengers from Western Australia will travel over the proposed line, not only those from Kalgoorlie, but also those from Fremantle, Perth, Coolgardie, and other places in Western Australia, who now go through Fremantle to the other States. According to this return, it is estimated that all those passengers will travel by this railway. No one with a grain of common sense can believe that that will be so. If we take the experience of the railway from Brisbane to Sydney we can say that for one person who travels by the railway between those places twenty travel by boat.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Fifty by boat at least.

Senator TURLEY.—Twenty at any rate. It is further said that because passengers from Coolgardie have now to travel from Fremantle to Coolgardie after coming from the other States by boat they will prefer to travel by this railway if it is constructed. In answer to that, I take the case of people travelling from Longreach to Sydney. They do not travel by rail. With the exception of very few, indeed, they come by rail to Rockhampton, and go from there to Sydney by boat, or they come by rail to Brisbane, and there take the boat for Sydney. The passenger traffic on the Inter-State line in Queensland is so small that the line from the border to Gowrie Junction, where it joins the Southern and Western Railway, has paid only about 1 per cent. over interest and working expenses. Now, as to goods traffic, what goods traffic is it expected will be taken over this line?

Senator STYLES.—None.

Senator TURLEY.—Very little. There is some talk about perishables, and we are invited to believe that fruit and vegetables will be taken for hundreds of miles by this railway. There is a great deal of fruit and vegetables leaving Brisbane for the North, but how much is taken from Brisbane to Rockhampton by rail? The distance is 340 miles by rail, and 500 miles by water; but I venture to say that 90 per cent. of the produce carried from Brisbane to Rockhampton goes by boat, though there is an additional disadvantage in that when it gets to Keppel Bay it has to be lightered and carried forty miles up the Fitzroy River, which involves two or three different handlings. Even with these disadvantages shippers of this produce find it to their advantage to send it by water rather than by rail. The same thing applies to all goods with the exception of small parcels carried from Brisbane to Rockhampton, and even to goods which have to be carried west from Rockhampton on the Central Railway.

Senator MCGREGOR. — Why does not Queensland close up her lines if they are of no use?

Senator TURLEY. — The railways of Queensland are doing fairly good work. The State is losing £200,000 or £300,000 a year on her railways, but a very great deal of good has been done in the opening up of the country by those lines. I have referred to lines in Queensland which can be compared with the proposed line to Western Australia, inasmuch as they have to compete with water communication. When we have such experience in other parts of Australia to show that water carriage can always successfully compete with railway carriage, we cannot expect that that experience will not also apply to this proposed line. I contend that this report is absolutely unreliable in the light of experience gained in other parts of Australia, where railways have to compete with water carriage. I do not know that I need go through the report. I read it very carefully, because I thought there might be something in it which would throw some light on the subject, and enable me to support this proposal. I understand that it is estimated that this line with rolling-stock and all complete will cost something like £4,400 per mile. I can take the case of lines running over the western plains of Queensland, far better country for railway construction than that outlined by the Minister of Defence when he told us that the route of this railway would traverse a belt of country with sand-hills 200 feet high.

Senator PLAYFORD. — The honorable senator has doubled it straight away; I said 100 feet.

Senator TURLEY.—I have just referred to the report of the honorable senator's speech in Hansard.

Senator PLAYFORD. — I think I said 100 feet.

Senator TURLEY.—I find from the Hansard report that the honorable senator stated that the sand-hills were in some instances 200 feet high, with valleys in between, and he did not know whether the surveyors would take the railway over the tops of the sand-hills, or around their bases. If the honorable senator now says that these sand-hills are only 100 feet high, I am willing to accept that statement.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I may inadvertently have said 200 feet; I meant 100 feet.

Senator TURLEY.—Many of our railways in Queensland are built over absolutely level country, involving very little construction work, but we have not yet been able in that State to build substantial railways on which trains can travel faster than fifteen miles an hour for anything like the sum estimated here.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We have done it for less in South Australia.

Senator TURLEY.—Substantial railways on which trains can travel forty miles an hour?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The railway from Broken Hill to Petersburg was constructed for a little over £3,000 per mile.

Senator TURLEY.—Not including the cost of rolling-stock.

Senator GUTHRIE.—What has that railway cost since? It has been reconstructed.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—It was only a tramway.

Senator TURLEY.—I am speaking of a substantial railway on which trains can be driven forty miles an hour. That is what is expected of the proposed line.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The Broken Hill line made at the price mentioned had to be pulled up.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It never was pulled up.

Senator TURLEY.—I could understand Senator Playford if he referred to a line laid down with little or no ballast, and on which trains might travel from ten to fifteen miles an hour. We have lines of that kind in Queensland on which there is very little ballast, and in some cases none. The sleepers are laid down, and the rails run over the top of them, but trains on those lines do not travel at more than from ten to fifteen miles an hour.

Senator DAWSON.—Where are those lines?

Senator TURLEY.—I refer to the line from Hughenden to Richmond.

Senator DAWSON.—Is that not because patent steel sleepers are used?

Senator TURLEY.—No, the patent sleepers used on that line are cut out of ironbark or gum trees. I do not know whether Senator Dawson has been over that railway, but I know the rate of speed at which trains are taken over it. If rain has recently fallen, those in charge of the train must be very careful not to travel too fast. The justification for the line is that it serves the district better than a bullock dray would serve it. But we are dealing here with a line which is to carry passenger and goods traffic at a speed of forty miles an hour, and the question is whether that line can be constructed at a less cost, including rolling-stock, than any line which we have been able to construct in Australia up-to-date. Even in Western Australia it is not claimed that they have been able to construct any section of their existing lines at the same price, including rolling-stock.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Yes, and for much less.

Senator MATHESON.—Take the line from Southern Cross to Kalgoorlie.

Senator TURLEY.—I take from Coghlan the cost of State railways as a whole.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They go through mountainous country in many places. Look at the immense cuttings and tunnels on the line from Brisbane to Wallangarra.

Senator TURLEY.—I have been speaking of the cheapest railways constructed in that State, and apart from the cost of rolling-stock, they have cost from £2,000 to £2,200 per mile. In his book, Mr. Coghlan gives the cost of railway construction per mile in each State. In 1903-4 the mileage in Western Australia was 1,541 miles on the 3 feet 6 inch gauge, and the cost per mile was £5,812. In all probability light rails were used, and the rolling-stock did not cost nearly as much as it would have done had the 4 feet 8½ inch gauge been adopted.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable senator's experience of Western Australia is not very great. That ought to show him the unfairness of quoting these figures.

Senator TURLEY.—When a Federal party was travelling in Queensland not long ago, the honorable senator was christened the seventh representative for that State. It is quite true that I have been in Western Australia only once, but I am not stating my experience. I am quoting the figures of a statistician who I believe is a competent man. Seeing that, according to Senator Playford, the trans-continental line would pass through sand-hills 100 feet high, the cost of construction must be very expensive.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There is only a limited extent of that country.

Senator TURLEY.—Outside the strip which has been travelled, no one knows the character of the land through which the line would pass. It is the duty of Western Australia and South Australia to demonstrate that this is a fair proposal for the Federal Government to take up, and the expense should be borne by those States. It is certainly no part of the duty of the Commonwealth to send out exploring parties.

Senator STORY.—Not for Federal purposes?

Senator TURLEY. — There is no Federal purpose involved here. The Minister of Defence said, in his speech, that the only reason he knows of which would warrant the construction of the railway is that it might be useful for defence. Are we in a position at the present time to spend that money on defence? Because no one contends for a moment that the line would pay.

Senator MATHESON.—Yes, the experts do.

Senator TURLEY.—Not in one report do the experts say that the line would pay for at least some years.

Senator MATHESON. — Not for ten years.

Senator TURLEY.—That means a loss of £60,000 a year for ten years, plus the cost of construction.

Senator MATHESON.—I said that the loss would be £60,000 in the first year, and it would gradually decrease.

Senator TURLEY.—It is estimated that a great deal of freight would be carried by the line, but we know from experience that there is no chance of that estimate being realized. Coghlan says that in Queensland the average cost of railway construction was £7,194 per mile. In that State we have a very large area in which railways have been easily built. We have some very bad examples, such as the Cairns line, and the line round the Toowoomba ranges.

Senator MCGREGOR.—And the Blackall range.

Senator TURLEY.—That line was fairly expensive, but others have been more expensive. If honorable senators will go across the Darling Downs they will find railways traversing for hundreds of miles land better than any I saw in Western Australia. The land is pretty flat, the grades are very easy, and the cuttings were not very expensive.

Senator MCGREGOR.—How much of the cost of those lines was due to the repurchase of land?

Senator TURLEY. — In some cases a good deal, but in the majority of instances nothing.

Senator MCGREGOR.—In the case of the transcontinental line there would be nothing to pay for the repurchase of land.

Senator TURLEY.—In some portions of the western district of Queensland railway construction cost about £2,500 per mile, but that work was carried out under most favorable conditions, with easy access to the coast, and the cost of provisions was considerably lower than would be the case in Western Australia. I do not propose to quote the figures for the other States, but to point out that even in Queensland, despite the cheapness of railway construction, we have not been able to get a reasonable return from our expenditure. In 1903-4 the interest returned on the capital was 2'36—that is a loss of 1'56 per cent. on the total outlay. While Queensland has spent a great deal of money on railway construction, and is still losing at the rate of £300,000 a year, it is not in a position to help to build a railway in another State which would involve an expenditure of, at the least, nearly £5,000,000. The proportion of Queensland might amount to only £600,000 or £700,000, but it is asked to find this money for the building of a line which every one who has reported on the project has admitted cannot possibly pay. Every honorable senator who has occupied a seat in the State Legislature knows that a railway has never realized the anticipations of its advocates. I remember projects being introduced into the Queensland Parliament with very glowing accounts as regards the probable returns from the carriage of stock, wool, and passengers. It was very easy for the supporters of a proposal to demonstrate that the income would be more than sufficient to pay the working expenses and meet the interest on the outlay. But I never knew a case in which there was not a loss on the working of the line for a considerable time.

Senator MCGREGOR.—There are so many prevaricators in that State.

Senator TURLEY.—I do not know that the railways of South Australia have been doing too well. I believe that in many cases a project has been painted in such glowing colours as to induce the State Parliament to build the line, even although it would entail a considerable burden on the taxpayers.

Senator GUTHRIE. — Our railways are paying.

Senator TURLEY.—I am glad to hear that they are, but for a good while the State was losing money on the working of its railways. The railway from Sydney to Brisbane has been worked for seventeen years. The length is 700 miles, and the fare is, I think, £2 10s. second class, and about £4 first class. In 1903-4 only 13,000 passengers travelled by it.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Does that include the intermediate passengers?

Senator TURLEY.—It represents the number of passengers who travelled from State to State, and not only the through passengers from Brisbane to Sydney, and vice versa. If a person went from Warwick to Glen Innes he was reckoned in the count. It is easy, therefore, to see that the number of through passengers would be considerably less than the number stated here.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Thousands of persons who went from Warwick and Toowoomba to Glen Innes, and vice versa, were not counted.

Senator TURLEY.—Although the line runs through a fairly thickly populated country, with towns and settlements along its route, still it does not pay. Except during a drought there has been practically no goods traffic. At that time some hay was sent up from the Hunter to the Darling Downs for feed. That, I believe, was the only time when produce of that kind was carried over the line. I have been twitted with having made up my mind and being prejudiced against the project to build a railway to Western Australia, and therefore I wish to say why I believe that, from the Federal stand-point, it is a bad proposal. Senator Matheson quoted the names of the engineers who constituted the committee of inquiry, and wished to know if they retain their positions. I believe that they do. But when the inquiry was made they were practically limited to going to Port Augusta, calling at another little port, and then proceeding to a port at the far end, where information was gleaned from the reports of a few men.

Senator MATHESON.—Information which satisfied them, anyway.

Senator TURLEY.—I do not think it did satisfy the engineers. Have they any information as to the advisability ness of constructing the line at the present time? They say—

We beg respectfully to suggest that, in view of the direct monetary loss involved, this is largely a question of policy and sentiment—

Senator MATHESON.—Is the honorable senator quoting from the first or the last report?

Senator TURLEY.—From the first one.

Senator MATHESON.—They give a different report later on.

Senator TURLEY.—The quotation proceeds—

depending on many issues regarding which we have no information, and we hope we may be excused from expressing any other opinion than that, if the past progress of Western Australia is maintained, the line will ultimately be a necessity and a financial success.

Senator MATHESON.—That is not the final report.

Senator TURLEY.—But they say something similar to that in their final report. They say that they are not prepared to express an opinion on the direct question that is put to them. They go on to say further that there will be a lot of pastoral country opened up. I do not know how they were able to say that. They base their opinion on reports which have been submitted to us by other men who were sent out by the Western Australian Government. Those reports ought not to induce us to vote for a line like this. Senator Matheson has referred me to the final report of the experts. I will quote from it. They say—

To question No. 8 we find it very difficult to give an answer, in view of the fact that the monetary loss will, for the first few years, be considerable. The revenue may prove to be higher than we have estimated, and the deficiency may tend to diminish from year to year more rapidly than has been assumed. It will be for the Commonwealth Government to decide whether the immediate pecuniary loss is so serious as to outweigh the beneficial effects pointed out in our answer to question No. 7.

Senator MATHESON.—That shows that, in their opinion, the loss they mention is a maximum.

Senator TURLEY.—No; they say that the loss "may" diminish. They leave it perfectly open. They do not say for a moment that it will probably be less than they have estimated.

Senator MATHESON.—That is very ingenious.

Senator STYLES.—They throw the responsibility on the Commonwealth Government,

Senator TURLEY.—The whole of the responsibility is thrown by them on the Government. I have seen nothing in this report to justify any sanguine hopes, except that they say—

New tracts of country would be opened up for pastoral settlement, both in South Australian and Western Australian territory, the chief difficulty at present lying not so much in the want of fertility of the country and the absence of water as in its inaccessibility.

I do not know that there is any part of Australia that is inaccessible, provided it carries good grass and water.

Senator HENDERSON.—People will not go 1,100 miles into the back country for the sake of grass and water.

Senator TURLEY.—Does not the honorable senator know that Queenslanders have gone more than 1,100 miles into the back country for that purpose? They have gone 3,000 miles from the eastern coast, and taken cattle across. Does the honorable senator think that if the land which would be traversed by this railway were good the men who went to the north-west of Queensland would not be prepared to take it up? Most decidedly they would, and they are men who understand country.

Senator HENDERSON.—Do the men to whom the honorable senator refers take feed with them?

Senator TURLEY.—No, they do not, and it is only in good seasons that they can carry the cattle over. If the honorable senator had seen the report of the last drover who came across he would be aware of the difficulties that man found in traveling his cattle hundreds of miles without water. I come now to the report of Mr. Muir, which we are told is sufficient to convince any one that this railway ought to be built. On page 4 of his report Mr. Muir writes as follows about a water-course which he saw:—

At some considerable time back a large volume of water must have gone down this creek in order to cut such a distinct channel through the country; but, judging by the heaps of decaying timber and débris lying in its bed, this has not occurred for at least ten years, and probably not for a longer period.

What sort of country is it where, as this gentleman points out, there are very few water-courses at all, and where the one that he saw, Goddard's Creek, had débris lying in it, which indicated that, though there might have been a considerable amount of water in it at one time, there had not been any for the last ten years?

Senator MATHESON.—It must have been very like Queensland, where they have had a ten years' drought, which only recently broke up.

Senator TURLEY.—They have not had a ten years' drought in Queensland. I know they have had a drought for about six years, but in a considerable portion of the country that drought broke up a good while ago. I would point out that men went out into the back country of Queensland, and made it habitable because it would produce grass, and there was plenty of surface water that could be made available for stock. If the country through which this railway is to go were as good as the Queensland country to which I refer, it would have been put to a similar use many years ago.

Senator DAWSON.—What about the Northern Territory?

Senator TURLEY.—Some men who have been dealing in cattle in the Northern Territory have simply been making fortunes since the drought broke up a few years ago. That statement can be borne out by honorable senators opposite who are interested in the business. They have been enabled, through the break up of the drought, to travel their cattle into country where they could sell to advantage.

Senator DAWSON.—There are only about 120 white settlers altogether in the Northern Territory.

Senator TURLEY.—I am not saying how many white people there are there, but I know that thousands of cattle every year are brought from the Northern Territory to South Australia, New South Wales, and Victoria.

Senator MATHESON.—I understand that many persons who took up land in Queensland prior to the drought have gone under.

Senator TURLEY.—I believe that a good number of men have gone under. Does the honorable senator know the reason?

Senator MATHESON.—The drought.

Senator TURLEY.—No; it was simply because young men were sent out from the old country whose people had no use for them there, and were given a few thousand pounds with which to embark in the pastoral industry in Queensland, in which there was a boom at the time. Big profits were being made out of the land because the settlers were working their holdings economically. But when these young men came out with a few thousands of pounds behind them, they bought up properties, probably for £40,000 or £50,000, the greater part of which they borrowed from the banks, and upon which they had to pay interest.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Experienced men went under also.

Senator TURLEY.—A large number went under because of the heavy interest that they had to pay. I know of one estate that has been paying 10 per cent. for years past, and has actually paid a great deal more in interest than the amount of capital first invested in it.

Senator MATHESON. — Some of those who went under were the sons of experienced people in Victoria.

Senator TURLEY.—Some of them came from just over the border in New South Wales, and went to country where I suppose the rabbit pest was worse than it has been in any other part of Queensland. But let me continue my references to Mr. Muir's report. He says—

On the morning of the 16th June I made another start out northward, accompanied by two members of the party, carrying five days' provisions and water. I was anxious to thoroughly test this portion of the country for water, but our efforts were quite fruitless, and we had no better luck than on our previous trip; Babington meanwhile taking the main caravan down the creek to the water discovered thirty miles below.

There is evidence time after time in Mr. Muir's report that though he discovered land that was carrying fairly good grass, there was no water to be found, except just a little between the rocks. I think that the biggest supply of water which he found was a basin that contained about 10,000 gallons. He camped near it, and filled up his water vessels to allow him to go on. He points out that there are comparatively few water-courses in this country. Any one who has been in the back country, knows that if there is any rainfall there are bound to be water-courses. There are very large water-courses in the back country of Queensland, although there is not a large rainfall there. As you go further north where the rainfall is fairly regular, and you get 50 to 60 inches per annum, you meet with big rivers every few miles. In mountainous country where the water comes down with a rush, there are deep water-courses. Every ten or fifteen miles you come across a large water-course. But this engineer who was sent out specially to report on this country, finds practically no water-courses. Why should we be asked to support a survey like this when everything points to the fact that it would be a very expensive job to put the line through? In spite of the evidence which we have had, we should certainly ask that the Western Australian and South Australian Governments shall prove that this is a fairly feasible project. When I spoke last year, an interjection was made to the effect that Western Australia had been to the expense of sending out a man who had done a good deal in the way of proving that it would be a good "spec" to construct a railway, because there was artesian water. I have read the report of Mr. Castilla, and I do not gather that any artesian supply has yet been discovered.

Senator FRASER.—I am quite sure there has not?

Senator TURLEY.—Mr. Castilla states that he came across a deserted station, and that is some evidence that the country was at one time taken up. No doubt it was deserted simply because of the seasons, just in the same way as a considerable area has been abandoned in the western part of Queensland. When the drought came in Queensland the stock died, and the people were obliged to leave, just as I suppose the people were obliged to abandon their station on the route of the proposed railway.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator admits that people have had to abandon their stations in Queensland.

Senator TURLEY.—A considerable area of country was abandoned in Queensland on the border of the Northern Territory, for the same reasons that other areas have been abandoned in every State of the Commonwealth.

Senator MATHESON.—That country is perfectly capable of carrying stock in good seasons?

Senator TURLEY.—Yes, but beyond that the country is no good, and when a long drought came it had to be given up.

Senator MATHESON.—Because there were no tanks or artesian water.

Senator TURLEY.—Some settlers had tanks and artesian water. The honorable senator seems to imagine that there can be nothing but a water famine in the western part of Queensland; but what really happens is not a water famine, but a grass famine.

Senator MATHESON.—The country on the route of the proposed railway is a thousand times better than that in Queensland, because it is covered with salt bush.

Senator TURLEY.—How long will salt bush last if cattle are left to feed on it? I know what the country is in Queensland, and there the salt bush is nearly all eaten out, even before the grass is finished; and there has been some talk of growing this bush in some of the western stations, because the cattle need the salt obtained in that way. This report of Mr. Castilla, which was going to convince me as to the splendid prospects ahead of the line, goes on to say—

Some seventy miles east of Twilight Cove there is a place called Madura, at which an attempt was once made by a company to establish a station. Buildings were erected and tanks made in the gorges, but the venture fell through, and the place has lapsed to the Crown, everything being in a very ruinous condition.

There is no doubt that the people mentioned tried to make a success of this country. I have heard, although I have not such definite information, that in other parts of the country men representing considerable capital have prospected with the object of taking up country. Mr. Castilla proceeds—Boring for water at site No. 2, sixty miles from the coast, and thirty north of Madura, 7th September, 1902, and water was struck at a depth of 411 feet. . . .

It has been reiterated in this chamber that artesian water has been found, but, as a fact, the water mentioned in the report is all sub-artesian water, and has to be pumped up. Artesian water, as I understand it, flows over the casing without any pumping; and if sub-artesian water is regarded in Western Australia as artesian, that is the only place in the world where it is so regarded. I have read this report very carefully, and I see that at some distance away from Madura, Mr. Castilla struck water at a depth of 2,101 feet, the flow being about 70,000 gallons. Why were not further steps taken to demonstrate that this is country where good water is obtainable along the proposed route? Do honorable senators think that when they read of water being struck suitable for stock, that it is water which can be used for engines? In Queensland there are bores returning water fit for stock and for human use, but it is not used by railway experts for engines if any other can be obtained. Wherever possible a tank is erected near a creek, and a man kept constantly at the pump, in order to supply the locomotives. There is not, so far as I know, a supply of artesian water in Australia that does not carry a considerable quantity of magnesia or other salts, which have a most injurious effect on boilers.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator not know that some of the best water in the western district of Queensland, both for engines and human consumption, is got at a depth of 4,001 feet near Winton?

Senator TURLEY.—Water is got at a depth of 4,000 feet, and it contains any quantity of mineral salts, a fact of which the honorable senator is as well aware as myself. Artesian water is never used for engines where other water can be obtained. Of course, I know there are places where artesian water has to be used for engines, but that is simply because no creek can be found in the neighbourhood. Mr. Castilla goes on to tell us what the land is like, and points out that there is a considerable area of sand hills. The report proceeds—

Clear of this belt, which is several miles wide, proceeding north, the country is nicely timbered with mallee, sugar tree, and mulga.

I do not know what the sugar tree is, but I know that mallee is a bush which grows in very dry country, and that mulga is not found where there is much water from the clouds. During the great drought, mulga was used by settlers both in Queensland and New South Wales in order to keep some of their stock alive; but, at the same time, it only grows in countries where the rainfall is very light. The soil in which it grows is practically useless for cultivation without a good rainfall, because it hardens very quickly. Indeed, in mulga country in Queensland, I know lanes which are just as hard as the streets in the city of Melbourne; and without a heavy rainfall nothing can be done in the way of production.

Senator DAWSON.—What about the mulga country between Fremantle and Kalgoorlie?

Senator TURLEY.—I saw some mulga country as I was travelling to Kalgoorlie in Western Australia, but it would not feed a bandicoot to the acre.

Senator DAWSON.—And yet the honorable senator saw some prize cattle which came off that land.

Senator TURLEY.—I did not see prize cattle which came off country like that. I do not know whether there was other mulga country further inland, but it was not along-side the railway on which I travelled.

Senator DAWSON.—There are miles and miles of mulga there.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator ignores the report about fodder plants, although he has said a great deal about other points in the report.

Senator TURLEY.—Why should I? I know the sort of country on which is found the timber Mr. Castilla mentions. It is very dry country, because such timber does not grow where there is a good rainfall.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator acknowledges that the country grows natural grasses and other fodder plants which Mr. Castilla mentions?

Senator TURLEY.—Western Australian parliamentary representatives some years ago asked the Federal Government to bring pressure on the Parliament of that State to induce them to build a railway from Esperance to the gold-fields, but the Federal Government did not see their way clear to accede to the request. I have in my possession a newspaper article written when I was in Kalgoorlie, and it is there stated that such a line would save hundreds of miles of sea and land carriage from the eastern States to Coolgardie and Kalgoorlie. Even if the transcontinental line were proceeded with, we know perfectly well that, as soon as that part of Western Australia was fit for development, the State Government would, by means of the suggested local line, endeavour to divert the traffic. There is, therefore, in the hands of the Western Australian people, a solution of, at any rate, a part of the difficulty. This has been a question between the dwellers on the coast in Western Australia and the dwellers in the back country. Those on the coast have had an advantage, owing to their larger representation in Parliament, those in the back blocks, while able to make a noise, not possessing much influence. I have given a few reasons why I intend to oppose this Bill. We are continually told that this is only a proposal for inquiry—a proposal that the Federal Government shall send out an exploring party to tell us what the country is like. I decline to be a party to any such undertaking. If the States concerned want an exploration to be made they should make it at their own expense. It is their duty to demonstrate to the Federal Government that the proposed railway is not only feasible, but reasonable, and to that end they should provide the money, even if the Federal Government have to appoint Federal officers to do the work.

Senator TRENWITH (Victoria).—With reference to this question, I feel very great difficulty. Last session I was altogether uninformed on the matter, but I had a general feeling that the Bill ought not, at that stage, to be carried. If the question had gone to a vote last session I should have been against it, but I refrained from saying anything, being anxious to find reasons for voting in favour of the measure. I see a great many sentimental reasons why the Bill should be carried; and I feel great sympathy with the people of Western Australia, and with honorable senators from that State. I have taken every opportunity in my power to acquire information on the subject, and the more I look into it, and the more I hear about it, the more positively my judgment is against the proposal. I feel that to discuss the question at this stage would be unwise, and I do not propose to occupy the attention of the Senate for very many minutes. But, broadly speaking, I feel that we do not know enough about the country to warrant us in taking this step at the present stage. Suppose we made the survey, and decided that it was a good railway to construct, the fact that we have not the power to carry out the work is another strong reason why I think we should not undertake this expenditure. The strongest reason of all, to my mind, is that if we take any positive action in this direction we shall be initiating a railway policy for the Commonwealth. I think that some day the Commonwealth will have to adopt a railway policy, but when it does, it should be on some general principle, and after mature and careful consideration.

Senator FRASER.—It can only be with the consent of the States in which Commonwealth railways are to be constructed.

Senator TRENWITH.—I hope we shall have the consent of the States when the time comes. In connexion with this particular railway, if it is made at all in the near future it seems to me that it ought to be made on the land grant principle. The Commonwealth, at present, has no land. There are continual suggestions that the Commonwealth should do something to facilitate immigration, but, as a Commonwealth, we have nothing that we can offer to persons abroad to induce them to come here, and if we make railways we ought to provide some means by which the increment arising from Federal expenditure shall go into the Federal exchequer. I think, therefore, that if this railway comes to be made by the Commonwealth, it should be only on such conditions as would give to the Commonwealth the increment which Commonwealth expenditure in connexion with it would create. If that were arranged for it might bring this question within the realm of practical politics, and of the possibility of accomplishment in the somewhat near future. But that can only be done by an overt act on the part of the two States interested. I would therefore suggest to honorable senators from Western Australia and South Australia that they should urge in their respective States the desirability of initiating legislation for the making of a definite legislative offer in this direction. There has been a good deal of talk as to whether we have, or have not, power to make this survey. My own view is that we have not the power.

Senator GUTHRIE.—With consent, we have.

Senator MATHESON.—We have got permission.

Senator TRENWITH.—We have not got permission on which we could proceed at law. Suppose that after carrying this Bill, we proceeded to make the survey, and were confronted by an objection from one of the States interested, we should have no power to proceed.

Senator MILLEN.—Or from an individual property owner.

Senator TRENWITH.—I am not lawyer enough to be able to speak in reference to all details, but I feel sure that we should have no power to proceed with this survey if South Australia or Western Australia objected.

Senator MATHESON.—Why assume that they would object when they have said that they will not object?

Senator TRENWITH.—In the first place, they have not said that they will not object.

Senator MATHESON.—Senator Pearce explained the position fully this afternoon.

Senator TRENWITH.—Senator Pearce, after all, is but one citizen of Western Australia. He is a representative citizen in whom I have very great confidence, and for whom I have the highest possible regard; but he is not empowered to make a promise which will hold water if contested.

Senator MATHESON.—He has made no promise, but he has explained the situation.

Senator TRENWITH.—Western Australia is not the only State interested. Even if we were to proceed to do anything in this matter, which we have not the power to do, I believe that Western Australia would make no objection; but the Minister of Defence has told us the opinion held in South Australia. Senator Playford has no power to make a definite promise on behalf of South Australia; but we may consider that the honorable senator has been fairly accurate in describing the will of the South Australian people, when he told us that the reason why Mr. Jenkins, as Premier of that State, did not proceed with the Bill after having made a promise to do so, was that he knew perfectly well that he would not have a hundred to one chance of carrying it into law.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not know that I said a "hundred to one chance;" I think that is a little of the honorable senator's gloss.

Senator TRENWITH.—I shall not insist upon the figures. I think the honorable senator was sufficiently emphatic to say that the South Australian Premier knew he had not the remotest hope of carrying it. That is strong enough for my purpose.

Senator PLAYFORD.—He had no chance of carrying it.

Senator TRENWITH.—No chance of carrying it! It is above hundreds and millions to one if he had no chance at all. Then the Minister of Defence, who represents South Australia, told us that that State would not consent to the construction of this line unless it traversed a route that met with its approval, and was constructed on the 3 ft. 6 in. gauge. These are two conditions which I think extremely important. Therefore we may reasonably say that if we believe it is desirable to make this railway in the interest of the Commonwealth we are still not in a position to embark in an expenditure of this character until we get a more definite legal permission to proceed. I do not propose to further discuss the question, which has been argued until it is threadbare, but I say that my judgment at present is entirely against supporting this Bill. I should feel personally glad if there were reasons which would justify us in proceeding to make this line.

Senator STORY (South Australia).—I do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate by making a speech in support of the construction of a line from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie. During the time I have been a member of the Senate, I have engaged the attention of honorable senators to a very limited extent. Being new to parliamentary life, I thought I could better employ myself in endeavouring to learn the procedure of Parliament and its methods of carrying on legislation. It has occurred to me, especially in the course of this debate, that, although honorable senators sometimes profess to have open minds on a subject, in most cases they decide, first of all, that they are for or against a motion. They then proceed to get up all the arguments which will back up the particular line they have decided to take; they carefully shut their ears to anything said on the opposite side, and refuse to believe it; and in quoting from reports they select only such passages as suit their own side of the question, and they carefully avoid reading, in some cases, the whole of a report, which would justify the arguments of their opponents.

Senator MULCAHY.—The honorable senator is very rough on the Western Australian senators.

Senator STORY.—I might refer to a remark made by Senator O'Keefe this afternoon, who congratulated honorable senators from Western Australia on the excellent case they had made out.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I beg the honorable senator's pardon.

Senator STORY.—On the excellent speeches they had made in advocating this measure.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is a very different thing from saying they have made out an excellent case. I admit they have made as good a case as they could.

Senator STORY.—The honorable senator followed up that statement by saying that they made no impression on him, and he appeared to regret the fact that honorable senators from Western Australia had been unable to convince him that it is desirable to pass this Bill.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator must have listened with his ears shut.

Senator STORY.—I think that the statement made is an indication that Senator O'Keefe has been listening to the debate with his ears shut, and it is an illustration of the old adage that there are none so blind as those who refuse to see. When Senator Symon was leader of the Senate, and moved the second reading of this Bill, he was careful to point out that it is not a Bill for the construction of the line, but a Bill to authorize a survey. If honorable senators who have spoken to the question had confined themselves more to the proposed survey, and less to the probable cost of construction of this line, very much valuable time would have been saved. The honorable senator who immediately followed Senator Symon was Senator Styles, who claims to be an expert in railway construction. That honorable senator made a long speech against the construction of the line. He disputed to some extent the statement that £20,000 would be sufficient to defray the cost of the proposed survey, and, speaking as a railway contractor, the honorable senator expressed the opinion that at least £50,000 would require to be spent on the survey before it would be one on which he could give an estimate as to the probable cost of the line. In the same breath the honorable senator proceeded to inform the Senate that the line, if constructed, would cost a certain amount of money, and he got up, I think, to somewhere about £8,000,000. Senator Mulcahy interjected that the line would probably cost £8,000,000, and Senator Styles proceeded to give figures to show that it would cost about that sum.

Senator STYLES.—The honorable senator is mistaken. £5,000,000 was my estimate.

Senator STORY.—If the honorable senator will refer to Hansard he will find that in reply to an interjection by Senator Mulcahy, he said that £8,000,000 would be near the mark. He proceeded to produce figures to prove that. If Senator Styles could not make an estimate, except on the details supplied by a survey costing £50,000, how is it possible for the honorable senator to form the remotest idea of the cost of this line when no survey whatever has been made?

Senator STYLES.—I had the same information as the engineers had.

Senator STORY.—The information which the honorable senator had came from the engineers. Senator Styles has put the worst possible construction on their estimates, although in their reports the engineers have said that they made ample allowance for everything. Senator Styles has stated that in his opinion they have supplied under-estimates in several cases. The honorable senator has placed his opinion in the matter very much above that of the engineers.

Senator STYLES.—I have a right to my own opinion.

Senator STORY.—Even the engineers have had no certain data on which to base their estimate of this line. The object of this Bill is to enable people to form a correct idea as to what the cost of the line will be.

Senator O'KEEFE.—And we say that the two States immediately interested and to be benefited should defray the cost of the survey.

Senator STORY.—In my opinion this is a Federal matter, although the State of Western Australia would probably benefit more than any other from the construction of the line, and South Australia might also derive some special benefit from it. We are assured by Senator Styles that the construction of this line would be the worst possible thing that could occur for the State of South Australia, and that practically it would half ruin the State.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator does not think so.

Senator STORY.—No. I do not think that South Australia would derive very great benefit from the railway for some time. It appears to me that some honorable senators will only look at this question from one point of view, and refuse to listen to arguments on the other side. Because Senator Playford, who had such a reputation for being fair in the State Parliament that he was called "Honest Tom," referred to some possible objection to this survey, and pointed out that Western Australia had been unfair in its treatment of the products from other States, especially from South Australia, one or two honorable senators interjected, "Well, after making that admission you ought to withdraw the Bill." They appeared to suggest that it was entirely wrong for a member of Parliament to say anything on the other side of a question. When Senator Givens rose to speak the other evening he said that he did not intend to occupy the time of the Senate at any very great length, chiefly because he was weak physically. He made a very energetic speech, and finished by moving an amendment. If he was really honest in his action—if he thought that his amendment would be accepted by South Australia—he must have been weak mentally, as well as physically. At any rate, he must have formed the impression that the electors of South Australia have returned to its Parliament men who are mentally weak. Because his amendment simply means that, prior to a survey being made, the Parliament of South Australia is to practically agree to a railway being constructed without being consulted in the slightest degree as to route, or gauge, or the conveniences to that State. Suppose that a Minister of the Crown were weak enough to ask the State Parliament to pass a measure agreeing to the building of the line. The very first questions he would be asked by honorable members would be, "Which route is the line to take, what sort of country is it to traverse, and is it likely to injure our State?" They certainly would refuse to entertain the measure until a survey had been made. The reason why every honorable senator, no matter what State he may represent, should support the making of a survey is because the railway will ultimately have to be built. I am sure that the great majority of honorable senators think that there must be a railway built at some time, if it is only for defence purposes.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I believe that for defence purposes it will be built.

Senator TRENWITH.—That is a different thing from saying who shall build the line.

Senator MULCAHY.—We are not stopping the survey.

Senator STORY.—It is the business of the Commonwealth to construct the railway if it is required for defence purposes, because it has control of the defences. Events are moving very fast in the East. It is the opinion of men best able to judge that in the near future, within the next fifteen or twenty years, the Chinese and Japanese may make up their minds that they would like to occupy Australia. That decision may be come to even during the next ten years. It is well known that a very large number of Chinese are serving with the Japanese army. The Chinese are learning Western methods of fighting, and when they are as well trained as the Japanese they may, simply in retaliation of the measures which we in Australia have taken to prevent an influx of Asiatics, decide to come in here by force.

Senator DOBSON.—I am glad that the honorable senator admits that our measures do justify retaliation on their part.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Uncle Jonathan has the Philippine Islands.

Senator STORY.—Nearly all honorable senators admit that this railway must be made at some time. Previous to its construction being commenced there must be a survey, and, whether it is made now, or next year, or ten years hence, it will cost just about the same amount of money. Any information collected as the result of a survey at the present time would be just as useful ten or fifteen years hence as now. If it were necessary for defence purposes to hurriedly construct a line to connect the western with the eastern States, the fact that a survey had already been made would be a very great help.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—It would only be a preliminary survey.

Senator STORY.—It would save a very considerable amount of time if the railway had to be constructed for defence purposes. A good deal has been said by the last two speakers about the two States particularly concerned paying the cost of the survey. But South Australia has no more interest in the construction of the line than has Queensland. If Australia were invaded on the north-east or the west or the north, South Australia would be no more interested than any other State. If it wishes to spend a large sum on railway construction, undoubtedly it will do so on the line from Adelaide to Port Darwin. I believe that it will go on with the construction of that line, but whether it will be finished or not I am not prepared to hazard a guess. The line must ultimately be constructed, I think, for defence purposes. In an oft quoted report, Major-General Hutton said our defence system would never be complete until Western Australia and Port Darwin were connected by rail. I ask honorable senators who have cavilled at the expenditure of £20,000 on a survey to put themselves, if they can, in the position of the representatives of Western Australia, and consider whether they would not then look at this project from a different point of view. Here we have a very rich part of Australia not altogether undefended, but with nothing like the defence it ought to have. In the case of invasion, the people of Western Australia would be entirely helpless. It would be utterly impossible for any assistance to reach them from the eastern States by water. A hostile force would naturally come in ships, and any relieving force which attempted to go round to Western Australia by water would be very soon destroyed. The only way by which assistance could be rendered to that State would be by land communication, and that is by a railway. Whether it is advisable to spend even £4,500,000 on a railway at present I do not intend to argue at this stage; but I submit that it is advisable to make a survey, because it would save time hereafter, and when the formal consent of South Australia was given, the Federal Parliament could then consider the question of constructing the railway.

Senator STYLES.—Why do not the two States make the survey, if it would cost only £20,000?

Senator STORY. — I ask why should these two comparatively weak States incur this enormous expense of £20,000, which, according to Senator Styles and others, is too much for the Commonwealth to incur? That is a most unfair position for honorable senators to take up, because the two States are no more interested in the line for defence purposes than are Victoria and New South Wales. If a hostile force were to invade Western Australia it would gain a footing from which it could not be dislodged, and that certainly would be a very bad thing for Victoria and New South Wales.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There could be no invasion of Western Australia unless the British Fleet were destroyed.

Senator STORY. — I believe that the mind of every honorable senator has been made up for a considerable time. If the Bill is defeated now, and is introduced once or twice more, the cost of printing the speeches of its opponents will amount to quite as much as would be required to make the survey of the line. If honorable senators are not in favour of passing the Bill, and they have any real desire to obtain fuller information, a reference of the Bill to a Select Committee, as Senator Neild suggested, would result in very valuable information being obtained, and the question could afterwards be discussed from a better stand-point. I intend to vote for the second reading of the Bill, and I sincerely trust that, in the interests of defence and of the welfare of Australia, it will be passed.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland). — I do not propose to speak at any great length, because nearly all the arguments against the proposal have been dealt with very exhaustively. I think that the proposal might be very well used as a very strong argument in favour of elective Ministries. I am not allowed by the Standing Orders to go into that matter, except for the purposes of illustration. This Bill has found a place on the programme of every Government, for some reason or other.

Senator MATHESON.—On its merits, undoubtedly.

Senator HIGGS.—No. I believe that, if a majority of the Parliament had a chance of voting on the proposal apart from the exigencies of the situation, so far as the Government is concerned, it would not have a chance.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It was carried by a majority of twenty-two in the other House.

Senator HIGGS.—Take the case of the Minister of Defence, to whom I refer with a great deal of compunction. It is really painful to me to consider his position, because I have such a great respect and regard for him. He is, as we all know, a gentleman who believes in government by the people and for the people. He is a very strong democrat; and indeed, if I may say so in his presence, a very lovable person. His present attitude on this Bill, however, shows that he is not only a politician and a statesman, but a consummate actor. Any one who has watched the honorable senator throughout this debate, and has heard him cheer the supporters of the measure, and glory in the downfall of its opponents, must have come to recognise that the stage has lost a very eminent ornament. Speaking on the defence aspect of this question, the honorable senator said last week—

It is an unmistakable Federal obligation that, for defence purposes, the line should be constructed, and sooner or later, it must be constructed.

That is what he said as Minister of Defence, but when he was speaking from the Opposition benches, referring to this very question, he said—

There is only one ground on which its construction can be defended. If it is required for defence purposes, then the rest of the community might put their hands in their pockets to the tune of, say, £50,000 or £100,000 to make up the loss which would be occasioned. They might find that sum every year for defence purposes just as we find the money to insure our buildings against fire.

The PRESIDENT.—Is the honorable senator quoting from a debate during the present session?

Senator HIGGS.—No, I am quoting from last session's Hansard. I wish also to point out that Senator Matheson, who at great length quoted Major-General Hutton's views, refrained from giving his opinion as expressed to the Minister of Defence. On the 14th May, 1903, Major-General Hutton said—

As long as the supremacy of the sea is in the hands of the Royal Navy no serious attack on Australia, upon a large scale, may be considered as practicable. In this regard little attention need be paid to the temporary or local effect of a raid upon one or two of the undefended ports.

That means that so long as the British Navy is a fighting force, there is no possible chance of any attack being made on Western Australia, or on any other part of the Australian Continent.

Senator MATHESON. — Major-General Hutton went on to point out that there was.

Senator HIGGS.—But if the British Navy no longer existed as a fighting force, and if an enemy attacked Australia, presuming that the line were constructed between Port Augusta and Kalgoorlie, the enemy would simply have to go to some other part of Australia in which there was not a railway. He could then carry out his plan just as effectively as if there were not a line between the two points mentioned.

Senator DAWSON.—What other part of Australia is open to attack?

Senator HIGGS.—From Fremantle to Port Darwin, and right round the northern coast to Townsville.

Senator DAWSON.—The only two parts of Australia that are open to attack are Western Australia and Queensland.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Playford's speech last week is best answered by his speech reported in Hansard, on the 3rd June, 1903, page 438, when the honorable senator said—

I am highly amused at my honorable friends from Western Australia referring to what they call the transcontinental railway. I have never heard of a railway to run along a coast being called a transcontinental railway. The general understanding of a transcontinental railway is that it is one to run from the coast on one side of the Continent to the coast on the other side. But our honorable friends from Western Australia—that land of sin, sorrow, and sand—will insist upon using this high-sounding phrase of “transcontinental railway.”

The phrase came very glibly from the honorable senator last week.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I never used it once last week.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator used it once or twice, as Hansard will show. In his speech in 1903, he continued—

I have some knowledge of the territory in South Australia; first, from having seen some of the land; second, from talking with those who have gone over the route of the line; and third, from having, when Commissioner of Crown Lands, sent out an expedition to report to me on the Nullarbor Plains. The fact is that on the border line of Western Australia and South Australia there is an immense area of well-grassed land. The puzzle is that it grows good bushes and is well grassed. It is one immense crystalline limestone formation, in which all the water runs away, in which you cannot make a dam until you get to some granite outcrop. I thought that we might be able to get artesian water. When I was in office I suppose I spent over £5,000, and I believe that South Australia has spent from £10,000 to £20,000 to that end. We sank to a depth of 3,000 feet, but we never got artesian water. . . . It appears to me that our experience on the Nullarbor Plains will be repeated elsewhere along the route of the line. The country, with the exception of a slip round Port Augusta, right away to Kalgoorlie, with the exception of a slip round Eucla, has never been taken up by the pioneering squatters. If they could have made dams they would have taken up the land. It has not been taken up, not because it has no food for stock, but simply because it is waterless. For the whole distance from Port Augusta, except near that port, to Kalgoorlie, the railway would not pick up one ton of freight on the one hand, or one passenger, practically on the other hand. It would never pay.

That is Senator Playford's speech, in Opposition, in answer to the Minister of Defence, in office. Now, I wish to say a word or two in answer to Senator Matheson's very positive statement that the Western Australian Government had reserved some twenty-five miles on either side of the route as a bonus.

Senator MATHESON.—I did not say as a bonus.

Senator HIGGS.—I appeal to honorable senators as to whether Senator Matheson did not say that it was proposed to reserve twenty-five miles on either side as a bonus to the Commonwealth for constructing this line.

Senator MATHESON.—I said that if the Commonwealth wanted it as a bonus they could insert it in their own Bill.

Senator HIGGS.—I have asked other honorable senators from Western Australia, who tell me that they know nothing of such a proposal. Senator Matheson's statement may be calculated to appeal to those members of Parliament who favour land nationalization, but of what value to the Commonwealth would twenty-five miles of territory on either side of the line be? If the land is of any value, the construction of the railway would enhance that value, but the increase would go to the people of Western Australia, and not to the people of the other States, who would have heavy burdens to bear in connexion with it.

Senator MATHESON.—Parliament can stipulate in the Railway Construction Bill that the Commonwealth shall get the enhanced value.

Senator HIGGS.—Why does not the honorable senator have these proposals made in some substantial form? His statement is comparable to that of Mr. Walter James, that if we constructed this line Western Australia would pay her fair share of the loss for the first ten years, though he was not prepared to say what that share would be. I do not wish to go into the question of the value of the calculations of the engineers, but I may remark that their calculations are based on  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. interest being paid on loan money. But Western Australia itself, which is one of the richest of the States, has had to pay 4 per cent. for money borrowed to complete the gold-fields water scheme. Mr. Gardiner, the ex-Treasurer of the State, on his return from England, stated that for some time the States would have to pay 4 per cent. for any moneys they might require. The extra  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. would make a considerable addition to the £5,000,000 that would have to be paid for the construction of the line. Another point is that on the showing of the Western Australian senators this State is more prosperous per head of the population than any other State in the group. In a pamphlet issued by the Western Australian Government, entitled "The Western Union Railway," various facts are given to prove the prosperity of the State. By the way, it is noticeable that since the criticism of the title, "Transcontinental Line," the supporters of the measure have rather dropped that term. Probably they have done so largely owing to Senator Playford's remarks in 1903. Now it is termed "The Western Union Line." In this pamphlet a great number of facts are given as to the prosperous condition of Western Australia. It is shown that the trade per head of the population of Western Australia is £77 per annum, and, singular to say, that is compared with the trade of Tasmania, which amounts to about £33 per head. The prosperous State of Western Australia is asking, the poorer State of Tasmania to meet the interest which will fall due for a great many years in connexion with losses on this line.

Senator DAWSON.—Does not the honorable senator believe that all the railways ought to belong to the Commonwealth?

Senator HIGGS.—I think it would be an advantage if the railways were in the hands of the Federal Government; but it does not follow that because we favour the federalizing of the State railways that we are prepared to construct railways through any part of the Commonwealth a particular State may desire.

Senator DAWSON.—Should not all new railways belong to the Commonwealth?

Senator HIGGS.—The Standing Orders do not allow me to have a dialogue with the honorable senator. We have been told by some of the supporters of the measure, though not, perhaps, so emphatically as was the case last year, of the anxiety amongst Western Australians for the construction of this line, and of what may happen if the Commonwealth refuse to construct it. When I had the good fortune to visit Western Australia along with other members of this Parliament, we were met in the great mining districts which this proposed railway is to serve, by men bearing banners and streamers, on which were the words, "We want the Esperance Bay railway." That was the railway Federal members appeared to be asked to support; and it is singular that in the pamphlet which I have referred to as issued by the Western Australian Government in order to convert people to this railway, the Bay of Esperance, although it occupied a prominent place in the debates, does not appear on the accompanying map; it is absolutely blotted out. Inasmuch as Esperance Bay offers a kind of alternative route, it ought to have found a place on that map, so that we might have been seized of the facts from all standpoints. The real opinion of Western Australia is, I think, voiced by Mr. Frank Wilson, attorney to the Collie Proprietary Coal Company. Mr. Wilson, speaking at the Wallsend mine, is thus reported in the West Australian:—

Referring to the transcontinental railway, he predicted that if the Federal Government were not prepared to construct the line, the Western Australian Government would undertake its portion, if the State of South Australia would do likewise.

It seems to me that that is more likely to represent the feeling of the independent-spirited people of Western Australia than the suggestion that they are coming to the Commonwealth, cap in hand, for the necessary money. The Bill itself—which Senator Matheson was going to justify so conclusively, but with which, although he mentioned it, he failed to deal—is a Bill to survey "a route for a railway from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie." There is not a single letter in the Bill which suggests to those who are to make the survey that they have to institute any inquiries whatever as to the cost of construction and equipment. That latter question has apparently been decided, and what the Government ask for is £20,000 for a permanent survey of a route for a railway.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Not a permanent survey.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—It is a preliminary survey; a permanent survey will have to be made afterwards.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Playford describes it as an inquiry; but what does Sir John Forrest say? When asked in the House of Representatives whether this was to be a flying or a permanent survey, Sir John Forrest said that it was intended to be a permanent survey.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Sir John Forrest is wrong.

Senator HIGGS.—When this Bill and the question of the revenue which the railway would produce was before us, I wrote to the Commissioners of the Victorian Railways, asking them if they would be good enough to give me the rates of freight charged for goods between Melbourne and Brisbane. It struck me that the distance between those places is about the distance that the proposed railway would traverse. The information supplied to me by the Commissioners was as follows:—From Melbourne to Sydney, a distance of 583 miles, the freight in the A division is 55s. 6d. per ton; B division, 85s. 11d.; C division, 128s. 1d.; first class, 175s. 3d.; second class, 218s. 5d.; third class, 240s. 8d. Between Fremantle and Kalgoorlie, a distance of 397 miles, the freight is—A division, 28s. 9d.; B division, 36s. 5d.; first class, 82s. 6d.; second class, 103s. 8d.; third class, 152s. 7d. From Brisbane to Sydney, a distance of 723 miles, the freight is—A division, 58s. 4d.; B division, 104s. 5d.; first class, 108s. 6d.; second class, 268s. 6d.; third-class, 310s. 8d. From Brisbane to Melbourne, a distance of 1,306 miles, the freight is—A division, 99s. 6d.; B division, 164s. 2d.; first class, 322s. 6d.; second-class, 422s. 3d.; third-class, 475s. 5d. The very lowest rate in the very lowest and cheapest class from Melbourne to Brisbane is £4 19s. 6d. I consulted the steam-ship companies as to the rates of freight charged by sea, and I was informed that it is anything from 12s. 6d. to £2 per ton from Melbourne around to Fremantle. Honorable senators will very easily see from the difference between shipping freights and railway freights the improbability that the proposed railway would be remunerative in this connexion. The Secretary to the Victorian Railway Commissioners said in the letter which accompanied the information I have given—

I may add that it is a very rare occurrence for goods to be forwarded by rail from Melbourne to Brisbane.

Why? Because they are carried round by water. I might give a little time to Sir John Forrest's predictions about what is likely to happen if this railway be not constructed; but life is too short. I may mention, however, that Sir John Forrest has referred to the Coolgardie water scheme, and to the prophecies made that it would be a financial failure. No doubt that scheme is a very great enterprise, and Sir John Forrest, in speaking of it, has said—

The Coolgardie water scheme was carried out at a cost of £2,500,000, and we are now told (in 1903) that even before the reticulation is completed, and in the winter time, it is returning a revenue of £112,000 per annum. When the summer comes, it is said that this return will be doubled, so that the scheme may, in its very early days, be regarded as a paying concern.

The scheme, much as may be said to its credit, is not a paying concern. A very recent return which I saw showed that the loss on the scheme is some £80,000 per annum.

Senator DAWSON.—Will the honorable senator look at the other side of the question? Water on the gold-fields is about only one-third the price now that it was before this scheme was carried out.

Senator HIGGS.—The question asked by business people is whether the scheme is a paying concern. I understand that on the gold-fields water is now 7s. 6d. per thousand gallons, whereas previously it was 7s. 6d. per hundred gallons.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It was much more than 7s. 6d. per hundred before the scheme was carried out.

Senator HIGGS.—If the price were higher than I have stated, it furnishes a further argument against this Bill. Sir John Forrest's proposal is to supply the water necessary for this railway by means of pipes from Kalgoorlie. If a work of that kind is proposed, a considerable addition, running, if not to millions, at any rate to hundreds of thousands of pounds, will have to be added to the estimates of Senator Matheson's experts. And if this idea of Sir John Forrest is not carried out, water will have to be condensed on the spot; and we have just been told that condensed water costs 7s. 6d., or even more, per hundred gallons. I am sorry to find that the supporters of this measure have been so emphatic from the first in their various statements regarding it. First, they based their claim on a compact which they said had been entered into between the people of the Commonwealth and Western Australia.

Senator DE LARGIE.—We said there was a promise by leading Federalists.

Senator HIGGS.—The only two leading Federalists I can find who made anything like a promise were Sir Frederick Holder and Mr. Kingston.

Senator DE LARGIE.—And also Mr. Deakin and Senator Symon.

Senator FRASER.—Mr. Deakin never made a promise.

Senator HIGGS.—As elected representatives, we hold a very high place in the community, but, after all, what are the promises of three or four of us, when balanced against the wishes and determination of the rest of the four millions of people in Australia? I do not think they amount to very much. We find two Premiers of South Australia supporting this proposal, but we find other Premiers of that State taking the opposite view, men like Mr. Jenkins, who has lately gone to England. It seems to me that, in their anxiety to have this proposal carried, honorable senators from Western Australia have been willing to interpret anything as a promise in support of this railway. I remember that Mr. Reid made a speech some time ago at Fremantle. The right honorable gentleman avoided for some considerable time giving any reply on the railway question. He was interrupted frequently by persons amongst his audience, who asked, "What about that railway, George?"

Senator DAWSON.—Be fair to him; he spoke straight out in favour of the railway on every occasion.

Senator DOBSON.—He spoke straight at the Conventions, when he said that the States must build their own trunk lines.

Senator HIGGS.—I can give Senator Dawson, if he desires it, a printed report of the right honorable gentleman's speech. He said, in effect, "I was met at the door by somebody, who put a pistol to my head and asked me what about the railway from somewhere to somewhere else." When a person in the hall said, "No, no," Mr. Reid said, "What is a railway from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie, but a railway from somewhere to somewhere else?" He said he was in favour of a trans-Australian line, and he was very glad to find that the Western Australian people had altered the term from "Trans-continental" to "Trans-Australian." He also said to his questioner, "If he can assure me that the route is all right, I can assure him that I will vote for the railway if the route is all right." Immediately after that there appeared throughout Western Australia statements to the effect that Mr. Reid had agreed to support the railway. The right honorable gentleman said that he would support the railway if the route was all right.

Senator FRASER.—The route is all wrong.

Senator DOBSON.—Did the right honorable gentleman give any indication as to what he meant by the route being all right?

Senator HIGGS.—That was the mental reservation, and if, in the opinion of the right honorable gentleman, the route was not all right, of course, he would not vote for the railway. Our Western Australian friends, in their eagerness, said that Mr. Reid was for the railway, and I remember that Senator Pearce was interviewed by a reporter, who asked him whether he was aware that Mr. Reid had expressed himself in favour of the railway?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I have heard Mr. Reid make very emphatic statements in support of the line.

Senator HIGGS.—That was after he became Prime Minister, and honorable senators must see the difference in the position. I do not wish to make any suggestions, but if honorable senators cannot read such signs for themselves, it is not my fault. I believe that if Western Australian representatives had come before us from the commencement with a proposal that the Commonwealth should inquire whether there should be a trans-Australian line running throughout the Commonwealth, they might have found a greater number of supporters. But they have come here, and have endeavoured to force us—because they have exerted considerable pressure, and Western Australia is to be congratulated upon having such strenuous advocates—

Senator CROFT.—If we knew as many tricks as do honorable senators from Queensland, we should have carried the whole thing.

Senator HIGGS.—They have endeavoured to force us by appealing to our Federal sentiment, and our sympathies with the Commonwealth. If they had asked for an inquiry as to whether a transcontinental railway ought to be constructed, and as to which should be the route chosen for a trans-Australian line, they would have had a stronger vote in their favour, because in that case many of us who come from Queensland, would have been able to put in a claim for a trans-Australian line, connecting a section of the Queensland railways with Port Darwin.

Senator FRASER.—That would be a very much better line than this.

Senator HIGGS.—I think there would be evidence that that would be a much more payable line. South Australian representatives would be able, in those circumstances, to put in a claim for their line running north, right through the centre of the continent. Western Australian representatives have not deemed it wise to adopt the course of asking for such an inquiry, and have preferred to ask us to vote for this route.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Only for a survey?

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Playford is endeavouring to persuade us that we are being asked to vote only for a survey of this line, but the view I take is that which Sir John Forrest has expressed.

Senator CROFT.—He is not everybody.

Senator HIGGS.—There is very little in Sir John Forrest's political economy that I find myself able to agree with. When a man can go to England and tell the British people—

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator is not discussing the Bill.

Senator HIGGS.—I proposed, Mr. President, to refer merely as an illustration to certain things to which I shall not now refer in deference to your ruling. But Sir John Forrest has told us that if we vote for the expenditure of this £20,000 on a survey, we must vote for the construction of the line. He does not desire that any one should vote for this survey who is not prepared to back up that vote by supporting a proposal for the construction of the line. I take the view already voiced by some honorable senators that if honorable senators from Western Australia can induce us to vote £20,000 for the survey of a line from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta the people of Western Australia will be able to say that we believe there is a compact between the Commonwealth and Western Australia for the construction of this line. It will be another piece of evidence to add to the promises of Sir Frederick Holder and Mr. Kingston.

Senator CROFT.—Every Western Australian senator has given the assurance that he regards this Bill only as a measure to provide for the survey, and that if the result of the survey is not in favour of the construction of the line he will not press for its construction.

Senator HIGGS.—It is true that they have said that this is only for a survey, but it has already been pointed out that if the Government get this through they can appoint surveyors who will not be charged with any duty other than that of making the survey, whilst we know that there are a number of inquiries that ought to be made before a permanent survey of this line is undertaken.

Senator DAWSON. — Why not have a Select Committee to deal with the matter?

Senator HIGGS. — Honorable senators from Western Australia should have come forward with a proposal for a Select Committee, but they have not done so.

Senator TURLEY. — What information could a Select Committee get, any way?

Senator HIGGS.—I do not intend to support a Bill for the purpose of spending £20,000 on a permanent survey of this line. The idea of having a flying survey or a preliminary inquiry has been lately suggested by a gentleman who is not in favour of the construction of the line. We cannot consider his views, but we must consider the views of the strongest supporters of the proposal. In the circumstances, I do not propose to vote for the second reading of the Bill.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I should like to be permitted to ask the Minister in charge of the measure whether, in view of what has been said during the debate, if the second reading of this Bill should be carried, he will be prepared to support the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee, as suggested?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Yes, I will do so.

Senator HIGGS.—That is not sufficient.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—That promise would absolutely depend on the second reading being carried?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Undoubtedly.

Senator DAWSON.—I should like to say that, during my parliamentary career, I have very often been astonished at the acrobatic feats of politicians.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator is not now referring to Senator Playford, I hope.

Senator DAWSON.—I am referring to Senator Higgs. Listening very carefully to Senators Turley and Higgs, I was very much astonished to find that they both assumed to know more about the opinions of the people of Western Australia and South Australia than honorable senators representing those States in this Chamber.

Senator TURLEY.—I never said a word about the opinions of the people in either State.

Senator DAWSON. — Senators Turley and Higgs in the most emphatic manner declared opinions of the people of Western Australia and South Australia which were opposed to the opinions of the people of those States as submitted by honorable senators representing them.

Senator TURLEY.—I did not say a word about the opinions of the people in either of those States.

Senator DAWSON. — The honorable senator did, and so did Senator Higgs. Honorable senators coming from other States should, in fairness, be prepared to admit that the representatives of Western Australia and South Australia know best what are the opinions of the people of those States.

Senator TURLEY.—I did not deny that.

Senator MILLEN.—Senator Playford gave us the opinions of the people of South Australia.

Senator DAWSON. — I am not sure whether Senator Turley or Senator Higgs is a Mahatma, and has sojourned for some time in Thibet; but they seem to know something which the elected representatives of those States do not know. In connexion with this railway, I am not concerned as to whether there was an understanding or even an implied understanding that this railway should be built, in order that Western Australia might be induced to join the Federation. The question, to my mind, is, is it a good thing for Australia that this railway should be built? In my opinion it is. In the most contemptuous tone, and in the most insulting way, the Melbourne press have referred to this railway as "The Desert Railway," and I regret very much to say that there are certain honorable senators who jump at the crack of the whip of the Melbourne press. When it is called the "desert" railway in the Melbourne press, they echo the term like a taught parrot, and talk about a "desert" railway. Senator Turley, although he is not a Victorian, has to-night shown that he has been influenced by this talk about desert country. What does he mean by the desert country? What do the opponents of the railway mean by that term? I believed that to a large extent the portion of Western Australia between Fremantle to Kalgoorlie was a desert. But I never before had such an eye-opener as I got when I went over the country. While it is not a forest, and while there are no running streams and rivers which Senator Turley seems to think so much about, and which he does not find in the western part of his own State, still, it has the richest soil to be found in the whole of Australia, although it is called a desert.

Senator FRASER.—What is the good of that country without a rainfall?

Senator DAWSON.—All it needs is water. Sir John Forrest was brave enough to propose, and his Parliament was game enough to supply, a water scheme, and at Kalgoorlie and the Boulder City are the finest gardens to be seen in any portion of Australia. To talk about this place being a desert is to utter an absolute scandal. It is a disgrace to any man to utter such a remark.

Senator FRASER.—It is nothing else. Is it settled upon?

Senator DAWSON.—It certainly is.

Senator FRASER.—Oh!

Senator DAWSON.—I may tell the honorable senator, who is a Victorian, that had it not been for the enterprise of Western Australians in this desert country, Victoria would have been insolvent to-day.

Senator FRASER.—Oh!

Senator DAWSON.—It was the wealth of Kalgoorlie, Boulder City, and Coolgardie which saved Victoria from insolvency.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—That is all bosh.

Senator DAWSON.—It certainly is not.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—The honorable senator does not know anything about it.

Senator DAWSON.—I say that £83,000 per month came through the Government Savings Bank to starving families in Victoria from Western Australia, and it is a disgrace to any man to even hint that this country is a desert.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—The honorable senator had better settle upon it and see how he will get on.

Senator DAWSON.—I am prepared to show from the records of the Senate that for over two years, £83,000 a month was sent through the Government Savings Bank to the wives and families of Victorian miners who were working in Western Australia. Yet some men have the sublime audacity to say it is a desert. For several reasons, I think that this railway ought to be constructed. It would complete the railway systems of Australia. No one can deny that it is absolutely essential that one of the open gates of Australia—that is Western Australia—should have one means of concentration apart from the sea. We have no chance of considering a proposal to establish a navy. We must have some other means of communication between the east and west, and that is a railway. I should not care if it were to be built on a sand bank, or to go over ice, so long as it connected our railway systems. This line ought to be constructed in order that we may be able, at the point of danger—Queensland in the north, or Western Australia in the west—to concentrate our forces to repel an enemy. "Desert railway" is a contemptuous term which has been used by the unspeakable press of Melbourne, and taken up in a parrot-like way by some honorable senators. To my mind, their action is absolutely disgraceful. Senator Givens and Senator Turley know that the best paying railway in Queensland passes through country which is not settled. The line from Townsville to Charters Towers pays 12½ per cent. It traverses poor country, but when it gets to the terminus it pays.

Senator PEARCE.—Our eastern gold-fields' railway is the best paying line in Western Australia.

Senator DAWSON.—Exactly, and it has the best service to be found in all Australia. Senator Turley knows just as well as I do that the railway from Maryborough to Bundaberg goes through grass-tree country which would not feed one cow to forty acres, but when it gets to Bundaberg, and the Isis scrub, it pays. The opponents of this line talk about a desert railway.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Can the honorable senator show that it is anything but a desert railway?

Senator DAWSON.—I can show that the country it will traverse is not a desert.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Well, what is it?

Senator DAWSON.—It is one of the best growing places in the world. I can assure the honorable senator that in Kalgoorlie and Boulder City—

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—The honorable senator is talking about the country round Kalgoorlie and Port Augusta.

Senator DAWSON.—The line traverses the same class of country.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Nonsense!

Senator DAWSON.—The line traverses a rich, red loamy soil with a good subsoil.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—But where is the settlement?

Senator DAWSON.—The settlement is in Kalgoorlie and Boulder City.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—That is on the gold-fields.

Senator DAWSON.—I can assure my honorable friend that there will not be found in any part of Australia, not even in the garden city of Bendigo, so many comfortable cottages, with little vegetable and flower gardens, as are to be seen in either Kalgoorlie or Boulder City.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—No one disputes that.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator call a country in which these gardens abound a desert? In Boulder City I stayed with a friend, Mr. Banham, who, on a quarter-acre allotment, grows all the vegetables he requires for his wife and family of five children. He has the water at his service, and he has no need to buy any article from a Chinaman. He would, of course, rather starve than buy from a celestial.

Senator MILLEN.—Does the honorable senator bring an instance of irrigation cultivation as proof that it is not a desert? If it is not a desert, what does he want the water for?

Senator DAWSON.—When the honorable senator talks of this country as a desert he conveys to the minds of those who do not think that it is either a mountain or a plain of sand. It has a rich loamy soil which merely needs water. The country to Kalgoorlie was called a desert. Owing to the intrepidity and pluck of a man called Hannan they found a gold-field there, and it is to-day a more prosperous city than Melbourne. The country from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta is also called a desert. But is that so? Have we not heard that a man went across this country with his wife and family in a "prairie schooner," without losing a goat, or fowl, or sheep? When a man takes his family in a covered-in cart he does not ride through the country like Lindsay Gordon would ride on Carbine. He must travel by easy stages with his stock, and have a camping place by night. A man travelled across this country without losing one head of stock.

Senator MILLEN.—The only evidence we have of that is a telegram from the Perth correspondent of a Melbourne newspaper.

Senator DAWSON.—We have an interview with the man by a representative of the South Australian Advertiser.

Senator MILLEN.—We have the evidence of experts that for five days they had to camp without finding water.

Senator DAWSON.—Did the experts go over the country? Here is the evidence of a man who travelled with his wife and family in a "prairie schooner," and did not lose a head of stock on the way. Yet it is called a desert country!

Senator FRASER.—I will give £100 to the hospital if the honorable senator will produce the man at the door and let him give evidence.

Senator DAWSON.—What time will the honorable senator allow me in which to produce the man?

Senator FRASER.—A reasonable time.

Senator DAWSON.—This man travelled across the country.

Senator FRASER.—He never did.

Senator DAWSON.—I know that the honorable senator will not doubt the word of Sir Langdon Bonython, who caused a reporter to interview the man and ascertain how he got through the country. It was elicited at the interview that he got water at about every fifteen miles.

Senator FRASER.—Is the South Australian Advertiser much better than the Argus or the Age?

Senator DAWSON.—It is the best daily newspaper in Australia, and, in my opinion, the Argus and the Age are about the worst.

Senator FRASER.—They get credit all over the world for being very good newspapers.

Senator DAWSON.—Understanding or no understanding, in the interests of Australia as a whole this railway should be built. It will be a sorry day for Australia if it does not get railway communication between the east and the west. Do the opponents of this proposal think that Federation between the east and the west is a mere breath on the atmosphere, or a reality? If it is to be a reality this line must be built. As one who represents a State which has suffered financially from Federation up to the present time, I support the Bill.

Senator FRASER.—Indeed it has not. It has been treated very liberally in the matter of the bonus to the sugar industry, and in one way and another.

Senator DAWSON.—That is quite another matter, and I say to our Queensland friends that when they are opposing this railway to Western Australia, they ought to remember that the people of that State, if vindictive and vicious, could refuse to support the bounty to the sugar industry. As we have been liberally and well treated, we ought to be grateful and patriotic enough to give to Western Australia a chance to prove its case.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I do not think it proper to allow this measure to go to a vote without giving my reasons for my attitude towards it. The Bill provides that the Federation shall exercise the power contained in the 34th article of section 51 of the Constitution—that is, "Railway construction and extension in any State with the consent of that State." It is clearly laid down by the Constitution that before the Federal Parliament can do anything towards the construction of railways in any State, it must have the consent of that State; not merely a telegram from the Premier of the State, or an assurance or a letter from him, but an Act passed by the Parliament of the State assenting to the Commonwealth entering upon the business of construction. Senator de Largie and Senator Matheson insist on the fact that we are not engaged in considering a proposal for construction. What is the meaning of this Bill? Do those honorable senators think that we are a lot of school boys who cannot see an inch before our noses? Is not this Bill a preliminary to construction? My opinion is that the Senate ought not to embark on a policy of railway construction without very serious consideration. In the first place, this question ought to have been prominently brought before the constituencies at the last general election. We are asked to enter on a policy which involves a great many other things. It involves borrowing money. If persisted in, it will interfere with the railway policy of every one of our States. From whatever point of view one likes to regard it, one must see that it is one of the most serious matters that has been brought before the Federal Parliament. Although I, in common with other Queensland representatives, have been accused of coming here with a biased and prejudiced mind, I can assure honorable senators from Western Australia that it would give me the greatest possible pleasure if I could vote with them. I know that they feel that their credit will be impaired in their State if they fail to carry this measure through the Senate.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable senator need not believe that.

Senator STEWART.—They feel that way, rightly or wrongly. Honorable senators have no right to impute motives to those who do not agree with them. I am not imputing motives to any one. I come here to do my duty, first to the Commonwealth, and secondly to the State to which I belong. If Senator de Largie thought more of the Commonwealth than he does of the State of Western Australia, he would not be supporting a proposal of this character. Why should the Commonwealth embark on a policy of railway construction? Is it not incumbent on those who wish us to embark on this policy to give good reasons? The conduct of both Western Australia and South Australia on this question—more particularly of South Australia—has been absolutely contemptible, if I may use such a word with regard to a State. Just look at the dog-in-the-manger attitude of South Australia. That State says, "You can go on, and spend Commonwealth money, but we pledge ourselves to nothing." Apparently it is that State which is conferring the favour of allowing the Commonwealth to build a railway within its territory. Instead of these two States spending their money, one of them—which, as its representatives are fond of telling us, is the richest State in the Commonwealth—asks the Commonwealth to spend the money of all the States. I was over in Western Australia lately, and heard and read glowing accounts of the prosperity of the State. It reminded me of Joseph when he went to Egypt. Joseph was a most successful young man. By-and-by his poor brethren came along, and if Joseph, instead of concealing his identity from them, had taken them round Egypt, and advertised all his magnificent surroundings to them, he would have occupied just the position that the Western Australians occupied towards those who went over from the other States. They said, "Just look at this rich, glorious, magnificent territory of ours! All that we want to make us comfortable is a little railway, which we invite you poor chaps from the other States—who have built your own railways—who have connected your capitals with the capitals of the other States at your own expense—to build for us."

Senator DAWSON.—As a matter of fact, the honorable senator, while in Western Australia, never talked about anything except protection.

Senator STEWART.—I am not saying what I talked about. I read of one mayor in Western Australia who gave as a reason why this railway should be built the fact that the mines in a certain district had paid £20,000,000 in dividends. "Yet," he said, "the Commonwealth is afraid to spend a paltry three or four millions in building a railway for us!" It occurred to me that the Western Australian Government acted very foolishly in not taxing such huge dividends as that, and retaining in its own hands a sufficient sum to build the railway, if they thought it necessary. I do not wish to go into the merits and demerits of the proposal. We know very little about the country through which this line is proposed to be constructed.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator does not want to inquire.

Senator STEWART.—I say that it is not our business. I know that my honorable friends from Western Australia say that it is a national work. When I hear that phrase I think I am back in the State Parliament, where the member for Cow Flat gets up and says that he wants a bridge across a creek, and that it is a national work. Of course it is a national work; and if the member can persuade the people of the State to build the bridge across his creek it is all right. Similarly, our friends from South Australia and Western Australia say that this line is a national work, which ought to be constructed by the Commonwealth.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator says that the sugar bonus is a national work.

Senator STEWART.—Every question should be tested on its merits. The sugar question has nothing to do with the transcontinental railway. I am surprised that honorable senators opposite, whose purity of motive in public life I should be the last to question, should try to play off the one matter against the other. So far as I am concerned, if every member of the Senate who is in favour of this Bill voted against the sugar bounty, it would not influence my vote in the slightest degree. I judge every question on its merits.

Senator PEARCE.—The sugar bounty is the honorable senator's particular parish pump.

Senator STEWART.—It is not my particular parish pump. I have not any parish pump. I try to think continentally. I do not wish to introduce the word parochialism, but if it is to be applied to any one I think I could fix it. If the people of Western Australia and South Australia are really in earnest about this railway, they ought to get the route surveyed themselves. Senator Mulcahy suggested that the Western Australian and South Australian Governments should find the money, and that, so that we should not be accused of having no faith in the survey made under the supervision of those States, they should permit the Federal Government to spend the money for them. I think that is a very fair proposal. My honorable friends from Western Australia sneer at it. Of course it does not suit them. But if they have a good thing, and can show the people of the Commonwealth that it would pay to build the railway, I hold that it is their duty, seeing that they are the people who require the railway, to give reasons why the present policy of the Commonwealth should be departed from. It has been said that those who share my view do not represent public feeling in Queensland. So far as I know that public feeling, I do represent it when I vote against this measure. Whenever I spoke on the question—and that was not very often, because it was not really a burning question with us—opposition to the proposal was displayed. The people of Queensland argue that they have incurred a heavy debt in building their own railways—in fact, that they are so deeply in debt that it is not wise to borrow money even to construct railways that are absolutely necessary. In Queensland, the burden of debt is very serious, and it is not desired to add to it if that step can be avoided. I do not wish to enter into the question whether this railway is necessary from a defence point of view. A great many things are necessary for the defence of Australia. We require harbor defences, and not only a railway to Western Australia but a railway to Port Darwin, and also to the Northern Territory, opposite Thursday Island. In fact, if we had the money we could spend £50,000,000 on works which are necessary—if we put it that way—for the defence of Australia. But we have not the money, and we cannot embark on those works, and for that reason we must be content to go on for some time as we have been going. I have no doubt that some day, probably in the near future, the east and west will be joined by a railway. It is more than likely that the people of ten years, twenty years, or twenty-five years hence will see their way clear to carry out such a work, but it would be folly on our part, situated as we are, to embark the Commonwealth on an expenditure which might reach to even more millions than have been mentioned during the course of the debate. I intend to support the amendment, because I think that we ought to have had the consent of South Australia before we even considered the matter.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—I should not have troubled the Senate again but for the fact that the public opinion of South Australia on this matter has been questioned. I took part in a series of meetings in all the principal towns of South Australia, and at those meetings, and others, resolutions in favour of this railway were passed without, I think, a dissentient voice. South Australian opinion, so far as I can interpret it, is undoubtedly in favour of the proposals in this Bill, and that being so, I regard the amendment as a mere subterfuge.

Senator GIVENS.—When I move an amendment in accordance with the Standing Orders, am I to be accused of subterfuge?

The PRESIDENT.—Senator de Largie is not in order in saying that another honorable senator has been guilty of subterfuge, and the word must be withdrawn.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I withdraw the word, because I do not wish to throw a discordant note into the debate at the last moment. There need be no doubt about the public opinion of South Australia. South Australian public men both in the State Parliament and in the Federal Parliament, are undoubtedly in favour of this survey being made. If the rules of debate had been put strictly in force, I am afraid that many of the speakers, during the debate, would have been called to order for departing from the subject-matter of the Bill. We ought to keep the question of the survey before us; and I am anxious that the matter should be left open for further investigation, if possible. Like other Western Australians, I am not afraid of investigation, though we have had to listen to many remarks to which exception might be taken as to the public opinion of our State on this question.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think that he is discussing the amendment, which has reference to the consent of South Australia?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I am contending that the consent of South Australia is quite unnecessary, but I am prepared to accept the suggestion thrown out by Senator Neild, that a Select Committee should be appointed, as one way out of our present difficulty.

Senator MILLEN.—Is the honorable senator discussing the amendment?

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think the honorable senator is discussing the amendment. I know it is difficult to speak to an amendment without dealing, in some degree, at all events, with the main question. But the amendment is simply to strike out certain words with a view to inserting others providing for the formal consent of South Australia, and that has nothing to do with public opinion in Western Australia or a Select Committee. I do not want to hamper honorable senators or to apply the rules too strictly; but I ask the honorable senator to confine himself, as far as possible, to the amendment.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Senator Fraser has questioned the proof to-night of certain statements put before the Senate, first of all baldly denying that Mr. Deakin ever gave a promise prior to Federation.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator must know that that has nothing to do with the amendment.

Senator DE LARGIE.—When there are interjections, surely an honorable senator is entitled to make some kind of reply. Senator Fraser, further, has questioned whether Mr. Halford took his family across this country. If I were permitted to read as evidence Mr. Deakin's statement delivered at Albany before Federation, I could show that he made a very clear and explicit promise.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator must really confine himself to the amendment.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I wish to show that not only South Australia, but the whole of Australia, is in favour of the Bill.

The PRESIDENT.—It does not matter, so far as the amendment is concerned, whether the whole of Australia is in favour or against the proposal. The amendment simply asks that certain things shall be done by South Australia.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I see no necessity for asking the consent of South Australia. That consent has already been given through the representatives of that State in the Senate, and in the telegram of the present Premier of the State. The consent asked for is also to be found in the resolutions I have referred to as passed at public meetings. The amendment will merely have the effect of causing delay, and I think there ought to be a straight out vote as to whether the Bill should be read a second time.

The PRESIDENT.—Before putting the question, I should like to say a word or two as to the vote I am about to give. I am going to vote for the second reading of the Bill. When I was before my constituents in South Australia I was asked on several occasions whether I would vote for the construction of this railway by the Commonwealth, and I said I would; and I am going to carry that promise into effect. Whether I was wise in making such a promise or not is another question, and whether I should make that promise again after what I have heard in the debate, is also open to doubt. But I made the promise, and I am going to keep it.

In division:

Senator MILLEN.—May I ask, Mr. President, if you have put the amended motion as a substantive motion?

The PRESIDENT.—The amendment has been carried, and I am putting the question as amended.

Senator TRENWITH.—As I understand it, if the motion now submitted to the Senate is carried, there can be no further consideration of the Bill until the sanction of South Australia in the matter is laid on the table of the Senate. In other words, the Bill will practically be thrown out.

The PRESIDENT.—That is so.

Senator MILLEN.—If the motion is negatived, what will be the position?

The PRESIDENT.—Nothing will be carried, and the Bill will be lost.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It will be lost in either case, and it is an insult to South Australia to put these words in the motion.

Senator TRENWITH.—If this motion is lost the Bill will be defeated.

The PRESIDENT.—Yes, and if this motion is carried, the Bill will only be superseded and not necessarily dropped.

Question, as amended, resolved in the affirmative.

SUPPLY BILL (No. 2).

Bill received from the House of Representatives.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I desire to move—

That the Bill be now read a first time.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not know that I would be strictly in order in receiving the motion. We have a standing order under which it is provided that no new business shall be taken after 10.30 p.m.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There must be some motion on the subject. Having received the Bill from another place, we cannot kick it under the table.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator should blame the Standing Orders. Perhaps it would be better for the honorable senator to move that the first reading of the Bill be made an order of the day for to-morrow.

Motion (by Senator PLAYFORD) agreed to—

That the first reading of the Bill be made an order of the day for to-morrow.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I suppose I shall require to move the suspension of the Standing Orders to-morrow for the consideration of the Bill, but there should be no objection, as it is the ordinary Supply Bill.

The PRESIDENT.—By leave of the Senate, the honorable senator can give notice of his intention to move the suspension of the Standing Orders to-morrow to enable the Supply Bill to be carried through all its stages.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I ask leave to give notice accordingly.

The PRESIDENT.—The question is—That leave be granted.

Senator MILLEN.—I object.

Senate adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 23 August, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITIONS.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS presented a petition from the Chamber of Manufactures, Sydney, against the provisions in the Trade Marks Bill relating to union labels.

Petition received and read.

Mr. DEAKIN presented a petition from certain residents of Appin, praying that stringent legislation be enacted to prevent the importation of opium for smoking purposes into the Commonwealth.

Mr. BATCHELOR presented a similar petition from certain residents of South Australia.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON presented three similar petitions.

Mr. GLYNN presented two similar petitions.

Mr. HUTCHISON presented three similar petitions.

Mr. POYNTON presented forty-one similar petitions.

Petitions received.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMS AND AMMUNITION.

Mr. CROUCH.—Yesterday I asked the Minister representing the Minister of Defence a question with regard to the manufacture of guns, small arms, and cordite within the Commonwealth. The Minister promised that information would be afforded later on. I wish to know whether he can give me an answer to-day?

Mr. EWING.—I regret to say that I cannot give the honorable and learned member a reply to-day. Upon consideration, the matter has disclosed some amount of difficulty, and it is not possible to furnish a reply at a day's notice. The honorable and learned member will be fortunate if the Minister of Defence is able to furnish a reply within a week—I do not think it can be done within that time.

RETIRING GRATUITIES.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I wish to ask the Treasurer whether he has ascertained that he was correct in stating last week that the case of Messrs. Bartholomew and Frizzell, in which claims were made for retiring gratuities, had been settled by him?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have not yet ascertained, but I shall do so to-morrow.

MILITARY CLERKS.

Mr. HUME COOK asked the Attorney-General, upon notice—

Are the military clerks who were in the employment of any State at the establishment of the Commonwealth, eligible for appointment to a position in the corresponding division of the Public Service of the Commonwealth under section 33 of the Commonwealth Public Service Act?

Mr. DEAKIN.—On behalf of the Attorney-General, I have to inform the honorable member—

This question involves the consideration of the Public Service Acts and the Defence Acts of each of the States prior to Federation, as well as the Commonwealth Public Service and Defence Acts. It also necessitates precise information as to the status of the military clerks referred to under State laws prior to the Defence Departments being transferred. Inquiries are now being made for the purpose of ascertaining the position, and if the honorable member will be good enough to further postpone his question an answer will be given as soon as possible.

WORK PERFORMED FOR STATES GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. WATKINS asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Whether he will approach the various State Governments with a view to recompensing those officers of his Department who have performed State work referred to in a question asked by Mr. Watkins yesterday?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—In reply to the honorable member—

This is one of the questions which was discussed at the Conference between the Commonwealth and State Ministers held in Hobart in February last; no decision was, however, arrived at, and the matter is still under consideration.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed—

That the House, at its rising, adjourn until a quarter-past three o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS (Barrier).—I have no objection to the motion, but I should like to know whether the time lost owing to our meeting at a later hour than usual will be deducted from that usually devoted to the consideration of private business. I think it is only fair that any deficiency should be made good, say, after the adjournment for tea. The first three motions on the notice-paper are of extreme importance, and I think that my suggestion might fairly be adopted.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—If the time at our disposal to-morrow afternoon proves insufficient for the first motion, I shall take care that an extra three-quarters of an hour is allowed for further discussion at some time during the evening.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

SUPPLY BILL (No. 2).

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S RETAINER FROM SOUTH AUSTRALIAN GOVERNMENT:
RIFLE RANGES AT TOOWONG AND SANDGATE: POST-OFFICES AT DRYSDALE AND GEELONG: IMPORTATION OF OPIUM: TELEGRAPH EMPLOYEES:
PUBLIC SERVICE CLASSIFICATION:
DIVISIONAL RETURNING OFFICERS:
TREASURER'S ADVANCE ACCOUNT.

In Committee of Supply:

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan—Treasurer).—I move—

That a sum not exceeding £363,283 be granted to His Majesty for or towards defraying the services of the year ending 30th June, 1906.

The last Temporary Supply Bill, for the month of July, provided for £418,751, made up of £356,751 for ordinary votes, £12,000 for refunds, and £50,000 for the Treasurer's Advance Account. The present Bill provides for ordinary votes amounting to £283,283, refunds amounting to £10,000, and for £70,000 for the Treasurer's Advance Account. Honorable members will notice that the sums appropriated towards the Treasurer's Advance Account in the last Supply Bill, and in the present measure, together represent a total of £120,000. It is customary to provide on the Estimates for £200,000 for the Treasurer's Advance for the year. It may strike honorable members that we are now asking for an excessive sum, but I would point out that £50,000 is required for the purpose of making progress payments in connexion with new works and buildings which were commenced before the end of the last financial year, and are still being carried on, and £25,000 for the construction and extension of telegraph and telephone lines, which are still in progress. Payments in connexion with the purchase of Defence material will absorb £10,000, and a margin of only £35,000 will be left until the Appropriation Bill is passed and the various votes are recouped. No provision is made in this Bill for the payment of any increases under the Public Service Classification Scheme. None of these will be paid until Parliament has authorized them, and that cannot be said to have been done until the Appropriation Bill is passed. I think that that is a reasonable and proper way of dealing with increases generally, whether under a classification scheme or otherwise. There is nothing in the Bill that calls for special comment, because it merely provides for the expenditure upon the public service in accordance with the votes of last year.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I presume there will be no objection to this Bill. I accept the statement of the Treasurer that the Bill provides merely the necessary instalment for the ordinary expenditure of Government, and there being in it no special items of a debatable character, I know of no reason why it may not be allowed to pass. But I wish to take this opportunity to raise a question which concerns the Attorney-General chiefly, and I very much regret that that honorable and learned gentleman is not in the Chamber. That, however, is not my fault, as I sent him word by the Government whip that I proposed to raise this question.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think that the information has only just reached him.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The question to which I wish to draw attention is, as I view it, of very serious importance, affecting, as it does, the relation of the Attorney-General to the judicial powers of the States and the Commonwealth. As honorable members know, the South Australian Hansard is not the equal of our publication, because the reports of debates have to filter through the newspaper offices before becoming part of the permanent record. I have tried to get the latest issue of the South Australian Hansard, recording certain statements which were made in the House of Assembly there, but as it has not yet arrived, I will quote a newspaper report—I think of the Adelaide Advertiser—which, I believe, generally gives an even better account of the business transacted in the local Legislature than does the official record. At any rate, I think that the report in this newspaper is substantially correct. The statements to which I wish to draw attention read as follow:—

In the House of Assembly on Thursday afternoon Mr. McDonald asked if the Treasurer could give the House any information as to the present position of the Murray waters question. Mr. Peake, in reply, said the Government were trying to get that matter pushed on as fast as possible. The small retainer paid to Mr. Isaacs would expire within a day or two, and he had authorized the continuance of his retainer. With the object of getting the matter dealt with as soon as possible, he had arranged to hold a consultation with Mr. Glynn on Monday morning. In the meantime Mr. Glynn had informed him that he had consulted counsel in Melbourne, and he was hoping that Mr. Glynn would be in a position to advise him definitely as to when the case would be taken up. It was thought the High Court would before long be sitting in Adelaide, and he would like to arrange, if possible, that the case should be taken then. . . . Mr. Rounsevell asked on whose advice Mr. Peake was acting as to the South Australian riparian rights at the present time—that of Mr. Glynn, Sir Josiah Symon, or Mr. Isaacs. Mr. Peake said the position was that Mr. Glynn was acting as solicitor for the Government, and Sir Josiah Symon and Mr. Isaacs, King's counsel, had been retained by the Government. The three lawyers named were acting in conjunction.

My point is that the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth ought not to be retained by a State Government on any such important matter as this.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Against the Commonwealth Government.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not necessarily, but possibly, against the Commonwealth Government.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The Attorney-General of the late Government was similarly retained.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That does not alter my view of the case.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Why did not the honorable member raise the question then?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I expected some such objection as that from honorable members seated on the corner benches, and it has come. Surely the Attorney-General might have been left to make that kind of apology. Whoever may be involved, my view of the case is the same. My point is that the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth ought not to be in a position in which his functions as the representative of the Commonwealth Government may conflict with obligations which he has undertaken to a State Government. There are innumerable possibilities for conflict arising in connexion with this very thorny question of the control of navigation and irrigation, and I submit that, in regard to it, the Attorney-General should not hold his present anomalous position.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is not a question arising between a State and the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The question of the control of rivers and water rights is intimately connected with the question of Inter-State commerce, and to show how thorny it is, and how very readily points of conflict may arise between the Commonwealth and States authorities. I should like to direct the attention of the House to a short statement in Quick and Garrahan's Annotated Constitution. Speaking of the concurrent powers of the States, they say—

The navigation power being part of the trade and commerce power, is not "exclusively" vested in the Parliament of the Commonwealth, and, therefore, the concurrent power of the States to deal with Inter-State navigation and with navigable waters will continue, subject to be ousted in part or in whole by Federal legislation.

Later on, they say—

A State may not only, in the absence of Federal legislation, improve the navigability of rivers, but may even obstruct navigability.

The trend of the statement there made is that in the absence of Federal legislation the States may take their own course with regard to the waters running through their territories. The only power that may say them nay is the power of the Commonwealth Government, interposing in the interests of unrestricted freedom of trade and commerce. The quotation continues—

It would seem therefore that, in the absence of Federal legislation, the States may exercise concurrent control over all navigable waters within their jurisdiction; subject, of course, to all the constitutional conditions, such as the prohibitions against interfering with freedom of trade and against discriminating against the citizens of other States by which the exercise of State power is controlled.

The States having these large powers over their waterways, it is quite clear that we may at any time come into direct conflict with any of them in regard to the question of the navigability of the waterways, and also with regard to a possible interference with trade as between one State and another. As this Federal power stands thus related to the States, the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth ought to hold himself free to exercise it at any moment which may be necessary. In other words, he is the watchdog of the Commonwealth with regard to the question of Inter-State freedom of intercourse, and the preservation of the navigability of the waters of the various States. It is quite clear, however, that he cannot be our legal watchdog, and, at the same time, the legal watchdog of the South Australian Government. The old saying that no man can serve two masters applies in this case.

Mr. MALONEY.—Lawyers are an exception.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not think that lawyers should be an exception in an important matter of this kind. It is quite clear that the Attorney-General cannot be for us against South Australia, and for South Australia against us at one and the same time, unless he has a dual personality like that of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. I know that at times lawyers do very strange things, but I think that we should keep the domains of these functions very clear, and should see that our law officers are in a condition of absolute independence. If the Attorney-General has advised the South Australian Government on this matter, as I understand from the newspaper report he has, the procedure laid down is that the honorable and learned member for Angas, a respected member of this House, is acting as solicitor for the South Australian Government in the case.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Is that proper?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I see a very great distinction between the position of the Attorney-General and that of a private member of this House. It might happen at a later stage that the honorable and learned member for Angas might be somewhat fettered in dealing with these questions when they come before the House for discussion and decision, but that is a very different thing from the position of the Attorney-General, to whom is intrusted the prime responsibility of safeguarding the judicial powers of the Commonwealth. Whether it is right or wrong, proper or improper, for a private member to be concerned in this matter has nothing to do with the point which I am discussing. If the Attorney-General has advised the South Australian Government on the questions of the navigability of rivers and of water rights, as they affect South Australia, he ought not to continue to hold his present office in the Government, because he will not be in the independent position which he ought to occupy in dealing with conflicting rights should any question happen to arise respecting them.

Mr. PAGE.—Perhaps the honorable member would like to see the Attorney-General out of the Government?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have not the slightest wish to see him out of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Surely this is a legitimate point to raise.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is a very strange thing that these actions are defended by members of the Labour Party. I admit that the caucus can do with impunity any kind of political wrong, so long as it is solid; but if any set of men in creation should raise a matter of this sort it is those who are deriding me for my present effort to see that the question is set right. I am not going to labour the subject. I shall be very much interested in hearing, after I have sat down, the defence of the Attorney-General by those who are now interjecting. The honorable and learned member has bound himself by oath to guard the judicial power of the Commonwealth, and, therefore, he should not be retained by a Government whose interests may conflict at any given point of time with those of the Commonwealth. I remember a somewhat similar case in New South Wales, in which two members of the local Legislature, who are now Justices of the High Court, were involved. They had accepted retainers against the Railway Commissioners of New South Wales, and the New South Wales Legislative Assembly censured them for doing so in the severest terms that it could use. As a consequence, they resigned Ministerial positions to save the Government to which they belonged. This is a somewhat similar question. I submit that the Attorney-General ought to be able to tell the House that he is absolutely free and untrammelled in his office—which I venture to say he will have some difficulty in doing in view of the facts as we know them—or he should no longer retain his position as supreme guardian of the rights of the Commonwealth against the States. I have no word to say of the honorable and learned gentleman in his private relations. He is as free as any other member of the Chamber to conduct his private business in his own way, and no one has a right to cavil at him for pursuing his private avocations so long as they do not conflict with his public duties. In this case he appears to be exercising a dual function for two public bodies, the Parliament of a State, and the Parliament of the Commonwealth, and he cannot serve them both with independence and without limitations. I do not impugn his honour in any way. My own impression is that he is committing an error of judgment in accepting these retainers. I understand that he has not accepted a retainer since he assumed the position of Attorney-General. The newspaper statement is to the effect that his retainer will expire in a few days.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Has he not already relinquished his retainer?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not that I am aware of.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Why should he?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If that is the view entertained by the Prime Minister, I shall be glad to hear the reasons which he has to assign for it. I say that where the States are guaranteed such large powers of control in respect of the rivers of the Commonwealth, and where the Federal jurisdiction may, at any moment, clash with the State jurisdiction, the Attorney-General ought to be free from any State engagements in dealing with the question from a purely Federal stand-point. He cannot be said to be free so long as he is in the pay of a State Government.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The honorable member did not discover that fact when Senator Sir Josiah Symon filled the office of Attorney-General.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What has that circumstance to do with the matter? The facts were only published in the newspapers last week.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They have been known for months.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I assure honorable members that the statement which I saw in the newspapers last week was the first intimation that I had of the facts, and I do not hesitate to say that if I had known that Senator Sir Josiah Symon, when Attorney-General, had been retained by the South Australian Government in such a matter, I should have instantly brought it under the notice of the House. If the honorable member for Hindmarsh and the Prime Minister have been cognizant of the facts they have failed in their duty by neglecting to bring them immediately before this Chamber.

Mr. THOMAS.—Surely the right honorable member for East Sydney could not have failed in his duty. He knew the circumstances of the case when he was Prime Minister.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—May I say to the honorable member that I do not know what the right honorable member would or would not do. In this matter, fortunately, I am not like the honorable member for the Barrier. I have not to consult the caucus before coming here. The moment that I saw this announcement in the newspapers I decided to bring the facts before the House, and, in the discharge of what I conceive to be an obligation upon my part, I am making these remarks. I should be very glad indeed to hear the Attorney-General's statement upon this matter. If he can show that there is no possibility of a conflict arising between his duty to the South Australian Government—a duty for which he is being paid—and his duty as the defender and guardian of the judicial power of the Commonwealth. I shall have no more to say upon this subject. In my judgment, however, he cannot simultaneously accept payment from a State Government and from the Federal authorities, and still retain his independence absolutely. I understand that the honorable and learned gentleman is being instructed in this matter by the honorable and learned member for Angas. It is not difficult to imagine the Attorney-General having this same matter presented to him subsequently by our own Solicitor-General, and I venture to say that, on the presentation of the case by the honorable and learned member for Angas, and its presentation by the Solicitor-General of the Commonwealth, a very different opinion might be pronounced. That is the fact which we have to face. After being advised by the honorable and learned member for Angas, and after having furnished an opinion to the South Australian Government upon this matter, the identical question may again come before the Attorney-General on the presentation of a case by the Solicitor-General of the Commonwealth, and the honorable and learned gentleman will then be confronted with the statement which he has previously made to the South Australian Government, and for which he has received their pay. I say that the Attorney-General is paid a salary by the Commonwealth for the especial purpose of keeping him free and untrammelled from retainers from any other quarter. I submit that, so long as he holds his position as Attorney-General, he has no right to be in the pay of any State Government, or to give them any legal opinions whatever.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member's remarks are very severe upon Senator Sir Josiah Symon.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I cannot help who they are severe upon. I regret it if they are. The honorable member might be at a little less trouble concerning Senator Sir Josiah Symon. This is not a question as to who is affected. I believe that a great principle is at stake in this seemingly simple matter, and, believing that, I take this opportunity of bringing it before the House at the earliest possible moment. I understand that the Prime Minister knows all about the case. At any rate, from his interjection, I opine that he is entirely in accord with the Attorney-General in this matter, and sees no reason why that honorable and learned gentleman should separate himself from the South Australian Government. In other words, he sees no reason why the Attorney-General should not occupy the dual position of adviser to the South Australian and the Federal Governments upon a matter which at any moment may bring his duties as between that State and the Commonwealth into conflict. In bringing this question under the notice of honorable members, I feel that I am discharging a simple duty—a duty in the interests of the purity of the administration of the judicial powers of the Commonwealth. I hope that we in this House shall always be sensitive upon matters which relate to the purity of the administration of justice. I wish that the Attorney-General himself had been present, and I shall be glad indeed to hear what he has to say upon this important matter. I should be pleased to learn that he has decided not to accept any other retainer from the South Australian Government. If that were the case, I should have no more to say upon the subject. The retainer which he at present enjoys is, I understand, just about to run out, and if he declares that he will accept no further retainer from that Government I shall be satisfied. It seems that he accepted this retainer before he became Attorney-General.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—But he is still acting for the South Australian Government.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—My own impression is that the moment he became Attorney-General he ought to have ceased to have the slightest connexion with the South Australian Government upon this matter. However, he has chosen to take another course, and I can only leave the matter to the judgment of the House.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Minister of External Affairs).—My own knowledge of this matter is not absolutely complete, but I suppose that, like the bulk of newspaper readers, I have been acquainted for more than a year with the fact that Senator Sir Josiah Symon and the honorable and learned member for Angas, as well as my learned colleague, have been retained by the South Australian Government in connexion with the claim of that State to the use of the Murray waters. Of course, my honorable friend, the deputy-leader of the Opposition, is not to be censured for using terms, in the course of his argument, which occasionally apply to a case at law, which occasionally apply to the offering of an opinion, which sometimes apply to the action of the Attorney-General as Attorney-General, and at other times to him as a member of this House who happens to practise at the Bar. I do not pause to disentangle these matters, although they are capable of conveying false impressions, unless they are discriminated. The retainer from the South Australian Government, I understand, was not given to the Attorney-General as a preliminary to any judicial proceeding. No judicial proceeding has commenced, and no judicial proceeding need follow. That retainer is one to furnish an opinion to the State of South Australia in relation to its claims to the waters of the Murray as against the States of New South Wales and Victoria.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is a question in which the Federal jurisdiction may be involved at any moment.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I will come to that matter in an instant. In the first place, these retainers were given, I think, before Senator Sir Josiah Symon accepted office. I do not think that they were granted during the time that he held office as Attorney-General.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—He should have retired too.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Perhaps those who do not clearly understand what is the nature of the facts or the duty to be performed should not be so ready to pass judgment. They would not venture to do so if they were summoned to act as jurors, and were called upon to decide as to the life or reputation of a fellow citizen. Because they are members of Parliament they are not relieved of their obligations in relation to another member of Parliament, even if they are politically opposed to him. Before passing judgment they ought at least to know the facts.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No one has impugned the honour of the Attorney-General.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Then what do the remarks of the honorable member mean? I communicated with the Attorney-General the moment the honorable member for Parramatta rose to address the Committee, and informed him of the fact that this matter was about to be brought forward. He stated in reply that he would be here as soon as the engagement upon which he had entered would permit. I would point out that the three learned members to whom I have referred are engaged in framing an opinion upon behalf of a State with regard to its riparian rights as contrasted with the rights of other States. I only know in a general way to what that opinion relates. It may be framed in such a way as to render any consideration of the relations of the Commonwealth to the States almost impossible. It may be framed in such a way as to render a consideration of Commonwealth rights highly improbable, or it may be framed in such a way as to involve them. But the fact remains—a fact to which I should not have called attention had it not been already referred to—that the Attorney-General of the late Government during the whole period that he occupied that office, remained one of the advisers of the South Australian Government on this matter without recognising that, in so doing, he was guilty of any dereliction of duty.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS. — He should have resigned. If Parliament had been sitting he would have been compelled to do so.

Mr. DEAKIN.—As I have already said, I deprecate the judgment of the honorable member upon the late Attorney-General as not being justified by the knowledge which he possesses. If an opinion is asked upon a question of riparian rights—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have passed no judgment.

Mr. DEAKIN.—But judgment has been passed by those all round the honorable member. If an opinion has been asked by the South Australian Government, not in relation to any case, but merely as a piece of legal advice, it need not involve any consideration of the rights of the Commonwealth, and if it does not, nobody can suggest that any of these three honorable gentlemen have taken a course which is not perfectly open to all of us. The honorable member for Parramatta is not capable of deciding. I am not capable of deciding, nor is any one, except the three gentlemen themselves. I am perfectly sure that if the present Attorney-General or the late occupant of that office had found in the course of giving an opinion to the South Australian Government that they were in any way hampering their absolute freedom of action in regard to the Commonwealth they would at once have ceased to advise that State or to hold a retainer upon its behalf.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—It would have been a different thing if they had accepted a brief.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Exactly. But whether such a point has arisen we cannot decide. The question of Commonwealth rights may never be raised, and under such circumstances it would be preposterous to say that, in a dispute between different States, any honorable member is not justified in advising a State Government upon its rights just as much as he is warranted in advising a private client upon a private question. The only objection that can be urged by any honorable member who criticises their action is that possibly in some unknown way the rights of the Commonwealth may be prejudicially involved, and that the Attorney-General may then conceivably be prevented from taking that complete view of Commonwealth interests which he otherwise would do. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that under such circumstances both the present Attorney-General and the late Attorney-General would at once have placed their duty to the Commonwealth before that of any client, even if that client happened to be a State Government. In these circumstances the matter requires no argument upon my part. Every member of this House, except one or two, must have been aware that the gentlemen to whom I have referred were being consulted upon a matter of opinion—upon a very difficult question, and one involving a great many considerations of a strictly legal character—questions as between the States which require solution. Until it is shown in some way that the public duty of these honorable members or any one of them clashes with his professional duty to his client, this debate is quite beside the mark. When that position arises it will not be necessary for anybody to call attention to it.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—But if it did arise would it be advisable for the Attorney-General to be mixed up in it?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It would be perfectly immaterial. He is merely asked to give an opinion. If he finds that he is called upon to deal with the rights of the Commonwealth it will be an easy matter for him to refrain from offering that opinion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—An opinion which he is paid to give?

Mr. DEAKIN.—He accepted this retainer long before he became Attorney-General. How can this House discuss the question on the simple assumption that, because the rights of certain States are in dispute as between themselves, the rights of the Commonwealth are necessarily involved? No one can say that, and until it can be said there can be no foundation for the argument that the rights of the Commonwealth are in any way involved. If the position of the Commonwealth is not affected, this discussion has no meaning, and can have no issue.

Mr. KELLY.—Is not the action of the Attorney-General tantamount to the acceptance of an office of profit under the Crown?

Mr. DEAKIN. — When any conflict does arise, we can rely on the Attorney-General, or any other honorable member who is placed in a like position, dealing with it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It will then be too late to deal with it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is absurd to say that. It is not a judicial proceeding of which complaint is made, but the giving of an opinion, and it is open to the Attorney-General to stop at any point he pleases. He may not believe that a Commonwealth issue will arise, and such an issue may never be raised. The whole matter is merely one of speculation. It would be absurd to call upon the Attorney-General to do, because of his office, what the late Attorney-General did not feel called upon to do; both have as keen a sense of honour as any members of the profession.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—We have just listened to an appeal made by one member of the legal profession in defence of another, but I hold that the honorable member for Parramatta has performed a patriotic duty in bringing this matter before the House. I would inform those who have suggested that the leader of the Opposition, while holding office, once acted in a case against the State Government, that he did not do anything of the kind. When he held the brief, to which reference has been made, he was not even a member of the Government. As a matter of fact, he refused to accept a retainer against the Railway Department, holding that, as a public man, his hands would be tied if he were to do so. As to the charge which has been made by the honorable member for Parramatta, are we to understand that because a distinguished lawyer occupies a distinguished office in the Government we are to consider that the allowance attaching to that office is not sufficiently lucrative, and that he is to be at liberty to accept briefs in cases against the Commonwealth.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—No retainer was involved in the case in point.

Mr. WILKS.—I contend that a public man's first duty is to his country. I am astounded that the Labour Party should defend the action of a distinguished lawyer who, while acting as Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, is prepared to advise a State in a matter involving Commonwealth issues. The Prime Minister said that the mere giving of an opinion was a different matter altogether from the acceptance of a brief against the Commonwealth; but I would point out that the opinion in question may lead the State to take action against the Commonwealth. In that event the Attorney-General would have to advise the Commonwealth Government to adopt a certain course. The experience of all Parliaments is opposed to the action taken by the Attorney-General. The late Sir Henry Parkes laid it down, in connexion with a similar case that arose in the Parliament of New South Wales, that an honorable member's first concern should be to see to the right government of the country, and that a member of the legal profession, while acting as Attorney-General or Solicitor-General in a State Government should not take part in any proceedings that might ultimately involve the Crown. The Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General of Great Britain are not even members of the Cabinet, yet they never think of accepting briefs in cases against the Crown. I do not take the view of the honorable member for Parramatta as to the position of the honorable and learned member for Angas. I believe that he is only in a degree less blameworthy than is the Attorney-General. He has given an opinion regarding the position of South Australia in a certain matter, and when that question comes before the Parliament he will be unable to deal with it as a representative of the people. If the position of Attorney-General is not sufficiently lucrative the honorable and learned member for Indi should resign it; if, on the other hand, it is, he should refuse to accept a retainer in any case against the Crown, and should decline to act in such a case even when, as a private member, he had accepted a retainer. The Attorney-General may be called upon at any time to act in defence of the Government, or of any of the Departments of the Commonwealth, and his professional interests must not be allowed to clash with the discharge of his public duties. Why should an honorable member, simply because he is a prominent member of the legal profession, be allowed in the morning to advise a private client contemplating proceedings against the Crown, and in the afternoon to attend in this House and contend that a certain course of action should be taken relating to those proceedings? If honorable members are anxious to secure large incomes, they should resign on finding that their public duties interfere with the carrying out of that desire. It may be said that if that course of action were insisted upon, we should have but few lawyers of distinction in the House; but even if that were the result, the Commonwealth would not suffer great loss. I am satisfied, however, that members of the legal profession are as anxious to serve the public as are any other members of the community, and are prepared to make sacrifices in order to gratify their desire. Although it has been pleaded that the Attorney-General has done no more than give a certain opinion to the Government of South Australia, it must be recognised that that opinion may induce the State to take action against the Commonwealth. In that event, the Attorney-General would have to defend the Commonwealth, and would find himself in a curious position. I trust that the Labour Party will accept my assurance that the leader of the Opposition has always refused to appear in cases involving the interests of the Government.

Mr. PAGE.—The interests of the Commonwealth are not involved in the case in point.

Mr. WILKS.—They certainly are. The question of the navigability of the Murray may arise at any time, and in that event the Commonwealth would be at once involved in any proceedings by one State against another. We might have to take a stand in the interests of Victoria and New South Wales as against South Australia. The Attorney-General of South Australia has said distinctly that he desires to bring a case before the High Court to determine questions affecting the waters of the Murray, and no doubt he will institute proceedings at no distant date. In that event, South Australia will defend what it believes to be its rights, as defined by the honorable and learned member for Angas, the Attorney-General, and the late Attorney-General of the Commonwealth.

Mr. PAGE.—I see nothing criminal in that.

Mr. WILKS.—I remember a time when the Labour Party had no very friendly feeling for the lawyers, but it appears that they have developed a desire to pose as the defenders of members of the legal profession in this House. We are not asking that the Attorney-General shall sacrifice his private practice while in office, but merely that he shall not act in any case that may involve Commonwealth issues. I heard of his position in this matter for the first time this morning, and although I spoke to eight or nine honorable members about it, I found that it had not previously come under their notice. We are assured, however, by the Prime Minister, that he knew of the position occupied by the honorable and learned member for Indi at least twelve months ago. All I can say is that we have brought the case before the House at the first opportunity, and have discharged what we conceive to be the true duty of an Opposition. Surely this is not a mad rush for the shekels on the part of the Attorney-General? Surely he is not so strongly imbued with the desire to accumulate wealth that he is prepared on the one hand to be paid by the Commonwealth for the discharge of certain public duties, and on the other, to accept fees for giving opinions relating to a case that may involve Commonwealth issues. I have yet to learn that the private interests of an honorable member are to be considered paramount to his public duties.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—Honorable members of the Opposition appear to have forgotten an incident which took place in New South Wales, when the then Premier of the State acted for a ship-owner against the Newcastle Marine Board.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He did not.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is useless for the honorable member to deny my statement, because the matter was discussed in the State Parliament. I should not have referred to it, but that the name of the right honorable gentleman in question has been mentioned during this debate. It has been said that he would not be guilty of such an action as that for which the Attorney-General has been blamed, but I know that his connexion with the Newcastle case was considered by some honorable members to be improper.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable gentleman was amongst the number.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Probably I was, but I do not think I said a word against him at the time.

Mr. WILKS.—He threw up his brief.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No. He appeared in Court, and it was in this way that the matter came under the notice of the State Parliament.

Mr. WILKS.—Even if he did, that does not justify the action of the Attorney-General in this case.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Certainly not. But I fail to see why it should be said or inferred that the leader of the Opposition would not do such a thing as the Attorney-General and the late Attorney-General have done.

Mr. THOMAS.—The case in which the right honorable member for East Sydney appeared for a ship-owner was a very small one; it was only a two-guinea job.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It was more than that. He appeared for a ship-owner in proceedings against the Newcastle Marine Board; and the point was raised that that Board was really in the same position as the Railways Commissioners of the State, and was part and parcel of the Government of New South Wales.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—He should have stood out of it.

Mr. WILKS.—Has the Attorney-General acted rightly?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think that he has acted rightly in that, as the Prime Minister has said, he need not, even at the last moment, do anything likely to clash with the interests of the Commonwealth. The question of navigation is the only one affecting the waters of the Murray that could give rise to issues affecting the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The fact is that the Attorney-General is under contract to the Federation, as well as to the State of South Australia.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Only in the matter of giving opinions. Even if he gave an opinion against the Commonwealth, it would not be compulsory for him to take any action inimical to the interests of the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does not the honorable gentleman know that the Attorney-General has been retained to accept a brief for the South Australian Government?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No. All that I know is that he has been retained to give a legal opinion. It is a singular thing that the honorable member for Parramatta did not raise any objection when the late Attorney-General adopted the same course. So far as I can see, no harm can result from the action taken by the honorable and learned member for Indi. The Opposition attack the Attorney-General, forgetting that the right honorable member for East Sydney, whilst Premier of New South Wales, actually appeared in an action against the State.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I think that the honorable member for Parramatta has referred to a very important principle which cannot be too carefully observed; but in this case the principle does not apply to the facts. It appears that before the Reid Government took office, Senator Symon, the Attorney-General, and the honorable member for Angas, were retained by the South Australian Government, and were also asked to furnish them with an opinion upon the Murray waters question. Nothing has been done by way of legal proceedings, but counsel have merely been asked to give their opinion. I understand that that opinion was prepared before the present Attorney-General took office.

Mr. WILKS.—It is not completed yet.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is not in writing, but I understand that for the last two months counsel have experienced difficulty in meeting to finally settle and commit their opinion to writing. Practically the whole of the work was done before the present Attorney-General took office. Honorable members may hardly know the practice, but I have no doubt that as soon as the Attorney-General finds that there is the least conflict between the interests of the Federal power and those of the State of South Australia he will stop. That is our practice.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I say that it ought not to be left to the judgment of the Attorney-General.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We must leave such matters to the judgment of an honorable man.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not at all.

Mr. HIGGINS.—At all events, I prefer to trust the experience and honour of the Attorney-General, who knows the facts, rather than the experience and honour of men who are not acquainted with the circumstances. I appreciate the jealousy of the honorable member for Parramatta in these matters.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We all share it.

Mr. HIGGINS.—And so do other honorable members, and we are glad to have the rule enforced. I do not believe, however, in raising such principles unless they apply to the facts. We have to remember that nothing was done in this case by way of legal proceedings, either before or since the present Government took office. Nothing has been done even in the way of writing an opinion, but the Attorney-General is perfectly entitled to write his opinion if he thinks fit. It is strictly allowable for counsel to give an opinion to one person and afterwards to be retained by another person. At the same time, so far as my experience has gone, counsel do not proceed that far. At one time, when I was a member of the Victorian Parliament, the proprietor of a certain industry consulted me, and I advised him. I afterwards found that the matter was to be brought before the Victorian Parliament, and I said, "I am your adviser, and I cannot speak or vote in Parliament upon that question." That is the action we take as a matter of course, without being told that we are making our private interests conflict with our public duties.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member disfranchised his electors in that case.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes, but I was not aware at the time that I began to advise the gentleman referred to that his case would come before Parliament. I agree thoroughly with the honorable member for Parramatta, that if public duties conflict with private duties the former should be regarded as supreme. If censure can be appropriately applied to the Attorney-General, it can with equal force be directed to the honorable and learned member for Angas. He has a duty to honorable members of this House, and he has acted perfectly in accordance with the dictates of principle. Honorable members have no right to make a dig at the Government in this case. I am confident that if the Attorney-General finds that there is any conflict between his duty to the South Australian Government and to the Federal power, he will stop dead and say, "I shall deal no more with South Australia." Questions constantly arise which call upon counsel to decide which of two conflicting retainers they shall accept, and the ordinary course is to accept the first one. In the case, however, of conflict between public duty and private duty, the former must, as I have said, be supreme.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—I think that the honorable member for Parramatta should be complimented upon bringing this matter forward, because it is one of the greatest importance. I am convinced, from the remarks of the Prime Minister, that he regards the situation as very serious. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne stated that the position of the honorable and learned member for Angas was analogous to that of the Attorney-General, but I cannot agree with him, because the honorable and learned member for Angas is in the position of a solicitor acting for the South Australian Government, and stating a case to counsel for their opinion. Counsel have been retained for several months to give an opinion upon a question involving the interests of several States, and in which the Federal Government may have to interfere. The South Australian Government could not act on the opinion of counsel unless such counsel prepared a case prior to the institution of a suit. If the counsel at present retained were to resign their positions as advisers, no case could be filed. The Attorney-General says that he will continue to act under his retainer for several months to come. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said something with regard to the responsibility of counsel, but they have no responsibility. They act for fees, for the recovery of which they cannot sue.

Mr. HIGGINS.—They can in Victoria.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—In New South Wales counsel cannot sue for the recovery of their retainers. The Attorney-General says that he will earn the retainer, to which he will not be entitled until the full period covered by it has expired. He is acting for one of the States against other States in the matter of a distinctly Federal character, in which the Commonwealth authorities may be involved at any moment. He may, therefore, be called upon to act for the Commonwealth as well. It has been laid down by that great constitutional authority, Sir Henry Parkes, that such a state of affairs should not exist in Australia. Justice Sir Edmund Barton and Mr. Justice O'Connor had to resign their Ministerial offices owing to their having accepted retainers in actions which were being brought against a State Government. We are on the eve of a crisis. Either the Attorney-General must resign from the Ministry, or the Ministry should go down. The members of the Opposition have a very serious responsibility cast upon them, namely, to direct a motion of censure against the present Government. We must bring the Attorney-General to his feet on the floor of the House immediately, in order that he may make an explanation. The Minister has, however, said that he will put off his explanation until he has fulfilled a minor engagement in one of the Courts. This is flaunting the House. The Government would be treated very generously if they showed proper consideration to honorable members. Members sitting on this side of the House are perfectly free to support non-contentious measures, and they could render the Government independent of any clique or section of their own supporters. The Attorney-General, instead of fulfilling his duty to the whole Commonwealth and paying proper deference to this Parliament, the supreme Court of Australia, has stated that he will fulfil a minor engagement in possibly a lower Court in the State of Victoria before he meets us to answer a grave charge. The question involved is one which has caused the resignations of members in times gone by. We are told by members of the Labour Party that because Senator Symon, when Attorney-General, held a retainer, the present Attorney-General is equally entitled to do so. I venture to say that if honorable members on this side of the House had been aware of the position occupied by Senator Symon at the time that he was a member of the Reid Government they would have taken action similar to that adopted on the present occasion. The fact that Senator Sir Josiah Symon has done wrong does not make the action of the Attorney-General right. The Minister of Trade and Customs positively admitted that the Attorney-General had accepted a brief, and he justified that acceptance because he said that a similar thing has been done in one of the States.

Mr. ROBINSON.—But he disapproved of it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Yes; he expressed disapproval of it in the local Parliament. Therefore the Government are condemned on their own admissions. I hope that the acting leader of the Opposition will take another course, and communicate with the leader of the Opposition, so that we may have the matter thrashed out, and the Attorney-General compelled to give a satisfactory explanation to the citizens of Australia. If such an explanation is not given, either he or the present Administration must go. That this House should be sent to the country is of very little importance compared with a matter of vital constitutional consequence such as we are now discussing. I hope that the leader of the Opposition will act definitely and firmly in this matter.

Mr. McWILLIAMS (Franklin).—I cannot be accused of personal feeling in this matter. It is only to-day that I learned of the positions which the late Attorney-General and the present Attorney-General occupy, and I make no distinction between them in regard to this case. It would have been infinitely better if Senator Sir Josiah Symon had retired from the case when accepting office as Attorney-General in the late Administration, and the honorable and learned member for Indi should, before becoming Attorney-General, have immediately freed himself from any legal entanglements which might afterwards make his position a difficult one. The Prime Minister censured honorable members on this side of the Chamber for taking up a case of which, he said, they knew nothing; but, after telling us that it was perfectly right for the Attorney-General to act as he is doing, he admitted that he knew nothing whatever of the case. The Attorney-General should be in his place to reply to the charge which has been made against him. As a member of a State Parliament, and as a member of the Commonwealth Parliament, I have objected to the legal members of a Government assuming a position different from that of non-legal members. Ever since I have been in this House I have seen that the legal members of Governments neglect their Ministerial and Parliamentary duties for their private business, and I understand that the honorable and learned member for Indi is not here to-day to reply to the charge which has been made against him, because he is conducting a private case in one of the minor courts of the State. When a legal gentleman accepts the office of law adviser to the Commonwealth of Australia, he should not allow his private business to interfere with the performance of his public duties to the extent to which some of our Attorneys-General have done. If there is one question which, more than another, is likely to bring the Commonwealth into conflict with the States, it is that affecting the control of the waters of the Murray River. More feeling has been created in connexion with that question amongst the people of the three States concerned than in connexion with any other public question that has arisen in Australia, and it is generally believed that one of the first contests between the Commonwealth and the States will arise in connexion therewith. The control of the navigation and the preservation of means of commerce on the Murray River is absolutely vested in the Commonwealth. South Australia's claim affects the control of the navigation of the Murray, and it will be almost impossible for the subject to be thrashed out to the bitter end without the Commonwealth being brought in. I therefore ask the Attorney-General to consider whether it would not be infinitely better for his own sake that he should be quite free from any entanglements created by the acceptance of a retainer from the State of South Australia. I should not have had any objection to his completing the work which he had in hand at the time of his acceptance of office, and to his placing before his employers the opinion for which he has been paid. But he should then have retired from his position as legal adviser of South Australia on all questions in regard to which the State and the Commonwealth may some day be in conflict. The less legal members of the House mix themselves up in questions which may afterwards cause conflict between the Commonwealth and the States the better it will be for the interests of the Commonwealth and for their own interests. I am not going to say a harsh word about the Attorney-General. If he had been a private friend of mine, and I had known that he was interested in this case, I should have used all the personal influence I possessed to induce him to retire from his entanglement, with the South Australian Government, and I hope that his good sense will yet lead him to do what he should have done immediately he accepted office as Attorney-General.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—He must do it. The country will not stand this kind of thing.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—If the facts of this case had been known a few months ago, and the late Attorney-General had been charged—

Mr. PAGE.—The Prime Minister showed that the late Attorney-General is just as guilty as the present Attorney-General.

Mr. WILKS.—Then the honorable member and his party should have charged him with the offence.

Mr. PAGE.—We put him out of office directly we had the opportunity.

Mr. McWILLIAMS. — No one would have been more indignant, or would have said more about the injury likely to result to the public interest from the present state of things, than would honorable members who are now trying to turn this matter into ridicule, supposing the facts had been made known when the late Attorney-General held office.

Mr. THOMAS.—We would have supported the Opposition if they had raised this objection in regard to Senator Sir Josiah Symon's occupancy of the Attorney-Generalship.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I have always understood that the honorable member's political standards are not very high, but if he publicly admits that he would have hounded down one man for doing that which he is prepared to defend in another, because the one was in opposition to him while the other is acting at his dictation, I make him a present of his morality. I hope that we shall not have much conduct like that in this House. The matter deserves serious consideration, and I hope that in the interests of good government the Attorney-General will retire from such professional engagements as may bring his duties to his clients into conflict with his duties as watch-dog of the rights of the Commonwealth.

Mr. FISHER.—Every one agrees as to that.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Every one does not agree as to that. Lawyer after lawyer has told us that the Attorney-General is doing what is perfectly right, although they are not acquainted with all the circumstances of the case.

Mr. FISHER.—He should not accept briefs the holding of which conflict with the performance of his duties as Attorney-General.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The Commonwealth will almost certainly be dragged into litigation in regard to the control of the navigation of the Murray, and all Attorneys-General should refuse to act as private advisers in cases in which they may have to act in a public capacity. I am sure that the deputy leader of the Labour Party must see that that position is the correct one. No Minister should, for his personal ends, perform duties which may be in conflict with his public duties. It is certain that, sooner or later, the Commonwealth will be involved in regard to the control of the navigation and preservation of the waters of the Murray, the question upon which the Attorney-General has given an opinion to the State of South Australia. I hope that honorable members generally will give the matter more serious consideration than some of them seem inclined to give to it, because, if ever the Commonwealth comes into conflict with the States, it will be very disadvantageous to us if the Attorney-General of the day—Whether Senator Sir Josiah Symon, the honorable and learned member for Indi, or any one else—has been acting on behalf of a State instead of on behalf of the Commonwealth, whose paid servant he is.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—The point raised by the honorable member for Parramatta is a perfectly plain one, though it is questionable whether it applies to the present state of affairs. He contends that it is inadvisable for an Attorney-General to act on behalf of any State or person when the opinion given in that relation may be brought into conflict with the opinion he may have to give to the Commonwealth on some future occasion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I say not merely that it is inadvisable, but that it is grossly wrong.

Mr. CONROY.—If at the time he undertook work for the State of South Australia the honorable and learned member for Indi knew that it would conflict with the performance of his duties as Attorney-General, the strictures which have been passed upon him would have been justified. What has happened is that he has been asked for his opinion. He has not been retained to fight for or against a particular view, but to state exactly what his opinion is in regard to certain questions, and in arriving at an opinion he must act as judicially as he can.

Mr. WILKS.—The Prime Minister said that he need not give his opinion.

Mr. CONROY.—I think that what the Prime Minister meant was that an opinion has not been given in connexion with a judicial proceeding.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Attorney-General has not given an opinion in connexion with any judicial proceeding.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Judicial proceedings are evidently contemplated, because there is a proposed reference to the High Court.

Mr. CONROY.—The obtaining of legal opinions often prevents legal proceedings. A lawyer who is asked to state an opinion assumes, so far as he can, the functions of a Judge. He argues both sides of the question at issue, and endeavours to find out what opinion would be likely to be given by the Court before whom the question would be tried.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We pay the Attorney-General not to be a Judge for the State of South Australia, but to look after our interests.

Mr. CONROY.—Does not the honorable member see that he is now raising another point? He surely does not wish to debar barristers who are members of Parliament from taking legal work. In a case of this kind a barrister acts practically as an arbitrator. The honorable and learned member for Angas has been referred to as the solicitor for South Australia; but I understand that he is really junior counsel in the matter. It has long been a practice, not only in the States, but in England, where a very high standard of action has been set up, that legal work of the kind under consideration is not within the ordinary scope of an advocate's duties. Before giving an opinion, counsel dissociates himself as much as possible from an advocate's methods, and assumes rather the judicial functions of an arbitrator. That is exactly the work which counsel is doing for the time being. I admit that in cases involving Commonwealth issues, if a member of this House who happens to be a barrister is called upon to give a legal opinion, it is desirable that he should refrain from doing so. But if a barrister refused to have anything to do with any case merely because somebody happened to mention it in Parliament, I do not know where the members of the legal profession would land themselves. The real point is that there is a substantial difference between a member of this Parliament—who happens to be a barrister—accepting outside work, and the Attorney-General, acting as the chief legal adviser of the Commonwealth, taking similar work. It appears, however, that the Attorney-General accepted this retainer, went into the case very thoroughly, and gave his opinion upon it, many months before there was any prospect whatever of his assuming Ministerial office. I understand from at least one honorable member who is engaged in this case, that the three gentlemen who have been retained by the South Australian Government have practically agreed upon their opinion, and that the whole reason why any charge can be laid against the present Attorney-General is that they have not had sufficient time, apart from their parliamentary duties, to meet together and formally sign that opinion. Nevertheless, I think that the honorable member for Parramatta acted rightly in bringing the matter under the notice of the House, because the position of Attorney-General should be very jealously guarded. We should guard against our chief legal adviser becoming engaged in a case in which there might be a conflict between his duty to the Commonwealth and his duty as adviser to some other litigant. It seems to me, however, that the circumstances of this case are not such as to call for reprobation, unless we decide that no barrister who is a member of the Commonwealth Parliament should accept work of any kind whatever. I do not think that I need dwell any further upon the case. As far as I can see, no conflict of interests has arisen, and perhaps sufficient good has been accomplished by calling attention to the matter.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—The honorable and learned member who has just resumed his seat, like other members of the legal profession, is very anxious that no bar should be placed by any action of this Committee in the way of their obtaining outside work. He stated that if the Attorney-General had known at the time he was asked for this opinion that the Commonwealth, in which he occupies so high a position, might in time be brought into conflict with that sovereign power which was seeking his advice, all the strictures which have been passed upon him for the action which he has taken would have been thoroughly merited. That obviously refines his case down to a consideration of whether the Attorney-General did or did not know or think at the time he accepted his retainer that the Commonwealth would eventually be brought into conflict with the State of South Australia upon this matter.

Mr. KNOX.—No. The question is whether he thought that he would become Attorney-General.

Mr. KELLY.—At any rate, the honorable and learned gentleman has not yet offered an opinion, so that it is not too late for him to withdraw from his anomalous position. In view of the most valuable assistance to this debate which the presence of the Attorney-General might give—for he alone can tell us his opinion as to whether or not the Commonwealth will be likely to be brought into conflict with the State of South Australia—it is infinitely to be regretted that he has not seen fit to come within the precincts of the House to explain the exact position of this matter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why should he do so? He is earning money.

Mr. KELLY.—I should be the last to suggest that the Attorney-General should take his place in this Chamber every afternoon of the week—I think that that would be too awful a sacrifice for him to make. But when the Committee are entering upon a debate of supreme constitutional importance, it is at least due to us that he should attend, and render all the help that he possibly can. Recently the House, and particularly the Opposition, have been subjected to a series of insults at the hands of the Government. Day after day we have seen the Chamber empty, whilst important public questions have been under discussion. That condition of affairs has been aggravated this afternoon by the absence of the Attorney-General. We are discussing his action, and under the circumstances it is only proper that he should be present to explain it. For that reason I suggest most respectfully to the Prime Minister that this debate should be adjourned until such time as it will be convenient for the Attorney-General to attend here for the purpose of rendering a true account of the circumstances under which he was asked to give this opinion, and of stating whether it will bind him in the future.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—The honorable member for Wentworth has suggested that the debate should be adjourned. I propose to put that request in the form of a definite proposal, and I therefore move—

That the proposed vote be reduced by £1.

I think that will bring the Attorney-General to the table. If ever a legislative body has been contemptuously treated upon a high constitutional question, certainly this Chamber has been so treated by the Attorney-General. The honorable and learned gentleman was apprised by the Opposition whip at one o'clock to-day of the intention of the honorable member for Parramatta to bring this matter forward, and, according to the Prime Minister, he was again notified when the deputy leader of the Opposition rose to speak. His reply was that he was engaged in Court practice. Surely that is evidence that a high and distinguished lawyer regards his private practice—his own interests—as of paramount importance. My proposal will test not only the feeling of the Committee, but also that of the Labour Party. For years past that party has been preaching the gospel of one man one billet; but to-day we find them defending the lawyers.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Everybody is becoming a lawyer nowadays.

Mr. WILKS.—According to the interjection of the honorable member, those who are not in favour of lawyers are fast becoming lawyers. As was stated by the honorable member for Parramatta, the course followed by the Attorney-General involves a principle which is dangerous to the credit of Governments, and perilous to the security of great public interests, and I cannot conceive of any House allowing this matter to pass in the way that it appears to be doing. To me it is apparent that the Opposition have been too easy-going in their attitude towards the present Government. As regards the position of the Attorney-General, his duty is clear; either he should resign his Ministerial office or relinquish his position as counsel for the South Australian Government. The dangers attaching to the dual position which he holds have already been emphasized. The Prime Minister has admitted that the honorable and learned gentleman enjoys a retainer to give an opinion to the South Australian Government. Should he refuse to do so, in the event of Commonwealth rights becoming involved, he will fail in his duty to his client. Surely the Prime Minister will not place the Attorney-General in that position? Because the rights of the Commonwealth are endangered, is he not to act faithfully to the South Australian Government? If he does offer an opinion upon State rights, or upon the navigability of the River Murray — a matter in which South Australia is vitally interested, and in which the adjoining States are even more interested—we shall find his duties as counsel upon one side and as Attorney-General upon the other in conflict. Instead of being the custodian and guardian of our highest rights, he is treating us in a most contemptuous manner. Was any Chamber ever flouted more than this Chamber has been flouted by him? No more serious attack could be made upon any public man than has been made upon the Attorney-General this afternoon. Does he imagine that that attack is prompted by mere caprice or whim? I ask honorable members to note that, although lawyer after lawyer has been defending the Attorney-General, not one has excused the course which has been adopted by him. We find the legal fraternity true to their union rules. Every lawyer who has addressed the Committee has defended the Attorney-General, but not a single member has declared that the course which he adopted is a good one. The Vice-President of the Executive Council, the Minister of Trade and Customs, the honorable member for Riverina, and others, who were formerly members of the New South Wales Parliament, must have a vivid recollection of the great fight which was made in connexion with the Proudfoot case, in which two of the present Justices of the High Court were engaged. In this instance, the Attorney-General has been retained on behalf of the South Australian Government to give an opinion upon the Murray waters question. That Government desires to appeal to the High Court, which is composed of three Justices, two of whom were censured for having engaged in a similar practice.

Mr. CONROY.—But that was a case in which litigation had absolutely commenced.

Mr. WILKS.—Where is the difference between the two?

Mr. CONROY.—In one case, counsel was asked for an opinion; in the other, counsel appeared as an advocate.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member for Werriwa says that in one instance there was litigation, whereas in the case under discussion there has been none. I fail to see where the distinction comes in. The South Australian Government has retained certain gentlemen, presumably because of their distinguished legal ability. The whole of these three gentlemen are members of the Commonwealth Parliament. When they furnish their opinion, the South Australian Government will act upon it. What is the use of a State incurring expense to obtain an opinion if it is not to be acted upon?

Mr. CONROY.—Legal opinions frequently prevent proceedings being taken.

Mr. WILKS.—From the newspapers we learn that the South Australian Government has been asked to decide whether they will refer the matter in dispute to the High Court or to the Privy Council. Apparently they are in favour of remitting it to the former tribunal. In these circumstances the Commonwealth will probably come into conflict with the Government of South Australia, and the Attorney-General, as principal law officer of the Crown, will not only have to advise what action shall be taken by us, but, as a representative of the people, will have to take part in any discussion that may arise in this Chamber in regard to the question. I hold that the honorable and learned member for Angas, in a less degree, has also committed an offence.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member mean to say that no barrister in the House should accept any brief whatever?

Mr. WILKS.—He should not accept a brief against the Crown.

Mr. CONROY.—But in this case the Attorney-General has not accepted a brief against the Commonwealth. It is simply a States matter.

Mr. WILKS.—The Attorney-General must decide once and for all whether he is to sacrifice his private practice or neglect his public duties. The honorable member for Parramatta has brought forward one of the strongest complaints that could be made against a Ministry, and, although it has been pleaded that the late Attorney-General when in office acted for the South Australian Government, I can only say that the then Opposition failed in their public duty by neglecting to bring his conduct before the House. As soon as I learned of the position of the Attorney-General in regard to this case I brought it under the notice of honorable members. When the action of two law officers of the Crown in New South Wales, in connexion with the Proudfoot case, was discussed in the State Parliament of New South Wales, it was condemned by the honorable member for Riverina, although he said that he would not vote against the Government.

Mr. CHANTER.—The honorable member is entirely in error.

Mr. WILKS.—I shall be able to support my assertion by quoting Hansard.

Mr. CHANTER.—If the honorable member turns to Hansard he will find that he is mistaken.

Mr. WILKS.—I should not have submitted an amendment but for the flippant way in which the Prime Minister has dealt with our complaint. I shall test the Labour Party. If they believe in "one man one billet"—

Mr. WATKINS.—The honorable member should test his own party.

Mr. WILKS.—I refer to the position taken up by the Labour Party, because in the early stages of the debate they interjected most persistently in opposition to the opinions expressed by the Opposition. The honorable member for Barrier, and also the honorable member for Maranoa, said that if the action taken by the late Attorney-General had been brought before the House at the time they would have voted against the continuance of such a practice.

Mr. PAGE.—I said nothing of the sort.

Mr. WILKS.—I understood the honorable member to interject that he would have done so. Does he think the practice is a proper one?

Mr. PAGE.—I ask the honorable member to give notice of his question.

Mr. WILKS.—We shall test the question. Those who vote against the amendment will signify their approval of the practice, whilst those who vote for it will show that they consider that the members of the legal profession in the House should not allow their professional interests to clash with the discharge of their public duties. If ever a party has been treated with contempt the Opposition has been today. The Attorney-General's desire for the "shekels" is so strong that even to-day he is neglecting his public duty, and is earning a fee by appearing in one of the lower Courts. If honorable members support him on this occasion they can never complain if others adopt the practice which the Opposition have condemned.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY (Darwin).—I regret that so much purely artificial warmth should have been generated by honorable members opposite in dealing with this question. It seems to me that there was no necessity for the severe castigation to which the Attorney-General has been subjected. The honorable and learned member for Indi was for several years Attorney-General in a Victorian State Government.

Mr. WILKS.—And the people of Victoria know him very well.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Every one who is familiar with the history of Victorian politics knows that the honorable and learned member made great financial sacrifices in his desire to serve the people of this State.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not know that he made great sacrifices. The honorable member should tell us what they were.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—We know that he succeeded in passing some of the best measures that have ever been placed on the statute-book of Victoria to put down the ill practices of boodlery.

Mr. WILKS.—He has been after the boodle ever since.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—There is a vast difference between the position of the Attorney-General and that of counsel in the Proudfoot case, to which reference has been made by the honorable member for Dalley. The Attorney-General months ago accepted a retainer from the South Australian Government to give a certain opinion, and that opinion may be the means of obviating the threatened litigation.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It may have the opposite effect. The honorable member does not know what may be the result of it.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The honorable member for New England is in the same position. It is unfortunate that so many honorable members should be so full of latent superstition, or something else, as to cause them without evidence to jump to certain conclusions. They are prepared to condemn others to the uttermost depths of Hades without any justification whatever. Whilst they attack the Attorney-General—

Mr. JOHNSON.—Why is he not here?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Because he has to appear in a case in which he was retained probably months ago. If the honorable member had retained the Attorney-General before he took office to appear for him in a certain case, and he failed to carry out his agreement, what would he say?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Is the discharge of a private duty more important than the fulfilment of a public one?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—We must be reasonable. To attempt to reason with a man who possesses no reason is like giving medicine to a dead rat. I do not wish to administer the medicine in this case, but if honorable members opposite are anxious for it they can have it from me. It is much to be regretted that honorable members of the Opposition should be constantly attacking the private characters of others in this House, who have made honorable reputations which will live when their antagonists are forgotten. In the Proudfoot case, two honorable gentlemen were retained to appear in Court against the Government. When the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth decides to appear in Court in an action against the Commonwealth Government it will be time enough to attack him, and I may say at once that in such an event I should not hesitate to condemn him.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That might happen just as readily as in the case now before the House has occurred.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—That is the position. The peach is blooming and rosy, but it may be rotten. Are honorable members to be expected to depend solely on the paltry starvation allowance they receive, and to refrain from doing any private business?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Does not the Attorney-General receive a very fair salary?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Why is the leader of the Opposition absent—why is he in New South Wales to-day?

Mr. CHANTER.—He is away earning fees.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Because he cannot afford to remain day after day in this House.

Mr. JOHNSON.—He is not Attorney-General.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—He is the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. JOHNSON.—But he is not in receipt of a salary as such. He simply has an allowance as a member of the Parliament.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—He is receiving £400 a year, just as I am. It is all very well for honorable members opposite to use a boomerang argument, but when they do they must expect it to recoil on them.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Every honorable member is expected to be in attendance.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Just as honorable members of the Labour Party attend from day to day. It is a disgrace that the Commonwealth—which was shown by the Treasurer yesterday to be one of the richest countries in the world—should keep 111 members in Parliament on starvation wages.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Why does not the honorable member and his party induce the Government to take steps to increase the allowance?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—We cannot force the Government to do anything of the kind. Is the Attorney-General to stand condemned because he is absent fulfilling an engagement which was entered into, perhaps, six months ago? The attacks that have been made upon him are unrighteous and unchristianlike. Is the House to be turned into a bear garden? Is it to become a pugilistic establishment, at which honorable members are to attend and slog each other? That is really what honorable members opposite have been attempting to do for the last month. The members of the Labour Party sitting here in the corner have lately been acting as umpires. The Opposition and the Government have been slogging each other, whilst we have been seeing fair play, and, lifting up the fallen ones, have placed them on their feet again. I shall vote against the amendment, and I call upon the honorable member for Wentworth to show his patriotism by moving that the allowance to honorable members be increased by £200 per annum. I trust that honorable members will pursue a more reasonable course, so that we may conclude the business which lies before us by the end of October.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—The question before us is not whether the Attorney-General should now be in attendance at the Law Courts or carry on a private practice, but whether he should be retained by the South Australian Government to advise them on a question in which the Commonwealth may become very deeply involved. He was perfectly entitled to accept his retainer at the time when he was merely a private member of this House; but in view of the fact that before his opinion was given, he became a member of a Ministry which has control over the rivers question, matters have become complicated. He has been retained by one of the parties interested in a question in which the interests of three or more States may conflict, and in which the Commonwealth may have to intervene. I contend that when he became Attorney-General, it was his duty to withdraw from his position as counsel for the South Australian Government as soon as the work upon which he was engaged was completed. There should have been no need for the display of heat in this matter, but the House has been flouted by the Attorney-General. Information was conveyed to him that this matter was to be brought forward, and if he had attended this afternoon there is very little doubt that the whole question would have been settled in a few minutes. The Government, however, having a strong majority behind them, or, rather, having umpires who are prepared, even at the sacrifice of their own opinions, to help the side that is in, have no hesitation about dealing cavalierly with members of the Opposition.

Mr. WATKINS.—Why was not this question raised when Senator Sir Josiah Symon held the position of Attorney-General in the Reid Government?

Mr. LONSDALE.—Nothing was known about the matter. The only knowledge I had upon the subject was conveyed to me by the honorable and learned member for Angas, who told me that he was acting for the South Australian Government, and I was surprised afterwards to hear that Senator Sir Josiah Symon had anything to do with the matter whilst he was Attorney-General. If the then Opposition were aware of the facts at that time, they failed in their duty in not calling attention to them. The dual position occupied by the present Attorney-General should not be tolerated, and if this House has any respect for itself, or a proper conception of its dignity, it will insist upon the Attorney-General either resigning his position as counsel for the South Australian Government as soon as his present work is completed, or retiring from the Ministry. He cannot now be in a position to do justice to all parties in the event of the Commonwealth becoming involved. No man should stand as counsel for both sides, and no Court in the world would permit of that being done, and yet this, the highest Court in the land, intends to permit such a state of things. Honorable members opposite know that the present position is an improper one, and yet they do not dare to vote as their consciences direct them. I should not have said a word against the Attorney-General if he had attended in the House and stated that he must complete the work which he had begun, but that when it was finished, he would withdraw entirely from the position. I should have been perfectly satisfied with that explanation.

Mr. KELLY.—Has the Attorney-General been sent for?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I understand that word was sent to him that this matter was to be brought up. If he had even sent a letter explaining the circumstances, I should have been satisfied. However, he has not only abstained from attending in the House, but has given no reason for his continued absence. The Proudfoot case has been referred to, and I may mention that in connexion with that matter I took the same view that I am expressing to-day. When a member of Parliament accepts a position as a member of the Ministry, he should at once retire from every case in which the Government is likely to become interested. I shall certainly vote for the reduction of the vote, in order to show my sense of the treatment to which honorable members have been subjected.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—After the trivialities with which the Committee has been occupied this afternoon—

Mr. CONROY.—I would ask, Mr. Chairman, whether the honorable and learned member is in order in referring to any discussion as being made up of trivialities?

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable and learned member is scarcely in order in using that term.

Mr. CROUCH.—If the honorable and learned member for Werriwa considers that I have been offensive to him personally, I cheerfully withdraw the remark so far as he is concerned. I think the time has arrived when we should deal with matters of national importance, and I therefore propose to direct attention to the case of the Drysdale Post-office. The honorable member for Wentworth has occupied a considerable time in discussing a matter regarding which he acknowledged his ignorance, and I think I shall be justified in speaking upon a subject with which I am thoroughly acquainted. Drysdale, which is the centre of a very large farming district in the constituency of Corio, is situated on the road to Queenscliff. It is one of the oldest settlements in Victoria, and principally on that account, has had to put up with a post-office which was built many years ago for the purposes of a private dwelling. The consequence is that the accommodation at present provided is entirely inadequate, and particularly unsuitable. Persons using the telephone inside the wooden building, can be distinctly heard by others standing on the footway, and recently a local clergyman said that he was able to hear tips for the Melbourne Cup being communicated by persons at Drysdale to their friends elsewhere. The present premises are being rented by the Postal Department, and in view of their utter unsuitability, the residents of Drysdale are highly indignant. I trust the Postmaster-General will endeavour to meet the desires of the residents. A stone building at present occupied by one of the banks would be suitable for the purposes of a post-office, and I believe the rental would not be very high. If that building cannot be secured, I hope the Postmaster-General will endeavour to provide other suitable accommodation. The late Postmaster-General of Victoria promised that a new post-office should be built.

Mr. TUDOR.—Was it in his electorate?

Mr. CROUCH.—No; but he was able to recognise the very proper demand that the residents were making, and a promise made by a State Postmaster-General should be kept by his successor, the Commonwealth Postmaster-General. The district is one of great importance, and we are not asking for the expenditure of a large sum of money. I also wish to direct the attention of the Postmaster-General to the need for placing a clock in the tower of the Geelong Post-office. The building was erected ten or twelve years ago, and four vacant spaces are left in the tower for the clock faces. These are at present boarded in, and are a standing disgrace to the town. There is a section in the Postal Act under which, if local subscriptions are raised for any purpose of this kind, the Postmaster-General is empowered to find the balance needed for the work; and I can make the proposal to the honorable gentleman that, if he will promise to place a clock in the Geelong Post-office tower, the local residents will subscribe £200 towards the cost.

Mr. KELLY.—What would the cost be?

Mr. CROUCH.—About £600. I understand that this will be the first occasion on which the section to which I refer has been given effect to. There are several other matters to which I should like to direct attention, but I feel that it would be unwise to ask too much on this occasion.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—I am surprised that the honorable and learned member for Corio thinks that the Drysdale post-office is more worthy of the attention of the House than is the question whether the Attorney-General owes a certain debt of courtesy to the Chamber.

Mr. WILKS.—This is a lawyer's way of evading the question.

Mr. KELLY.—I understand that the honorable and learned member has tried to raise new issues—such as the advisability of importing a clock from England to place in the Geelong post-office tower, although, one might think, such a clock might easily be made in Australia, and the money kept in the country—in order to take our attention from the fact that the Attorney-General has accepted from the State of South Australia what practically amounts to an office of profit. For he has been asked to give an opinion on matters connected with the control of the navigation of the rivers of the Commonwealth; and he will be paid for that opinion in hard, solid coin of the realm. Honorable members of the legal profession always regard questions of fees as of the supremest importance. No one's opinion on a legal point is worth more than that of the Attorney-General; but, inasmuch as that honorable and learned gentleman is paid in solid cash for advising the Government of the Commonwealth on matters of law, it should not be possible, in the event of a conflict arising between the Commonwealth and South Australia, or any other State, for his opinion to be quoted against the Commonwealth. For him to occupy two positions in a matter of this kind is not in the best interests of the Commonwealth. It has been stated by the honorable member for New England, and not contradicted by Ministers, that the Attorney-General has been sent for to answer the grave charges which have been made against him, and there can be only two explanations of his refusal to come. Either he thinks it safer to stay away and refuse to answer the charge, or he is contemptuous of this House; and we should not stand such contempt or such evasion from any servant of the House. The Attorney-General is paid, as Attorney-General, a certain salary—and no one is better worth it than he—for the discharge of certain services to the Commonwealth, and when the House demands that he shall attend to explain his actions, he has no right to stay away.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The House has not said that he shall attend.

Mr. KELLY.—The right honorable gentleman may not want him to attend, though I am surprised at that, because no one has stuck so devotedly to office, or more loyally to his party—his late party—than has the Treasurer.

Mr. WILKS.—No man sticks to office better.

Mr. KELLY.—Either the Attorney-General is flaunting this House, or he has no explanation to make; and it is our duty to keep the discussion going, to give him an opportunity to come here to make his excuses. The fact that he has lucrative employment elsewhere is no proper reason for his absence. I do not contend that he should be kept pinned to the Treasury bench, but when the House wants him, he should attend. The honorable member for Darwin told us that the principle of one man one billet is not intended to apply to members of Parliament, and we have known for a long time past that members of the Labour Party in New South Wales do not so apply it. They used to march under a banner inscribed "One man one job," and they still insist that humbler people shall do so. But personally they take as many jobs as they can lay their hands on.

Mr. CHANTER.—So do other honorable members.

Mr. KELLY.—Yes, but other members do not protest that no man should do more than one thing. Those who sit on the corner benches do not care twopence for their catch cries when their own private interests are affected; and they are ready to take two or more jobs if they can obtain increased emoluments, in which respect they are only human like the rest of us. But, as to their present attitude, is it to be expected that a party whose members are frantically anxious to become lawyers should be other than careful not to curtail—I shall not say the prerogatives—but the claims of the legal profession? In New South Wales, where there are so many Labour lawyers, there are unions which, though a short time ago immensely wealthy, are now very poor. Will the honorable member for Newcastle tell the House that a union in his district which had a great amount of money to its credit has now as much as it had before the Labour lawyers and the Arbitration Court simultaneously made their appearance?

Mr. WATKINS.—They have as much money as ever.

Mr. KELLY.—The labour lawyers, or the union?

Mr. WATKINS.—The union.

Mr. KELLY.—I think that if the honorable member consults the facts he will see that his statement is open to correction. Honorable members who sit on the corner benches were at one time bittered to having lawyers in politics, position of responsibility; but I have begun to realize the important positions which they may some of the legal world; and, not with shortening procedure in the courts the benefit of the unions for which I fear, but for their own private advantage, hope to become lawyers and to under a self-created class prejudicial to the legal business of the Commonwealth.

Mr. WATKINS.—Some men have enough brains to become lawyers.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member is one of the few men in the parliament who have not attempted to become a lawyer.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He set out

Mr. WATKINS.—No, never.

Mr. KELLY.—Am I to understand when he said that some men had not enough brains to become lawyers, he was referring to the fact that he himself had tried and had failed?

Mr. WATKINS.—The honorable member for Parramatta had better withdraw his statement. He must know that it is true.

Mr. KELLY.—I at once withdraw the horrible charge that the honorable member had any ambition to become a lawyer. I am more than glad to see that the Attorney-General has at last recognised the responsibility which he owes to this Chamber. I deeply regret that immediately upon entry he should deem the present discussion of so little importance that professional and private matters can completely claim his attention. I can assure him that this is no laughing matter. One of which this Committee has taken notice, and of which the country tomorrow will take notice. Members of the House are asking the country whether the gentleman who accepts the high office of Attorney-General owes his first duty to the House and the Government, or to himself and his professional position in this city.

Mr. WILKS.—First and last, it is a conflict of self with the Attorney-General.

Mr. KELLY.—The Attorney-General is under an obligation to the House, and I deeply regret that he has not recognised that fact any more than he seems to recognise the common courtesy which he owes to this Chamber when devoting itself to his administration. I hope that he will not leave the chamber, because we have been waiting for him patiently since half-past two o'clock. Will he admit that he received a telephone message this afternoon asking him to be present in his place in Parliament?

Mr. ISAACS.—I did not receive it until fairly late—until I was engaged in Court.

Mr. KELLY.—Did the Attorney-General receive that message before 3 o'clock?

Mr. ISAACS.—Yes; but I could not then leave the Court.

Mr. KELLY.—Could not the honorable and learned gentleman have "trusted" the Court? We have heard a lot of talk recently in that connexion. Besides, I presume that in all cases he has the assistance of junior counsel—

Mr. ISAACS.—This is most unreasonable. The honorable member could have mentioned the matter long ago had he wished to do so.

Mr. KELLY. — The honorable and learned gentleman states what is incorrect. I had no knowledge that any previous Attorney-General had ever accepted any office of profit under the Crown.

Mr. GROOM.—To what does the honorable member refer?

Mr. KELLY.—I presume the Attorney-General will admit that this retainer is being paid. When a man receives a certain sum for performing certain work, I ask any layman in this Chamber whether that work is not one of profit. Although I may not be fully seized of these legal refinements, I say that the Attorney-General has accepted a certain payment, and that the opinion which he has to give in return may eventually bring the high office which he holds into conflict with a State.

Mr. ISAACS.—Not at all. The question involved is merely one as between States, not as between the Commonwealth and any State.

Mr. KELLY.—If two States quarrel about their rights and the interpretation of the Constitution—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Over the locking of a river, for instance.

Mr. KELLY.—Exactly. Let us assume that one State locks up a river, or demands for irrigation too great a supply of water to permit of the navigability of the stream, who is eventually to decide the matter in dispute? Is it not the Commonwealth? Will the Attorney-General deny that?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We are bound to preserve freedom of trade.

Mr. KELLY.—We are bound to see that each State observes the right of every other State under the Constitution. The Attorney-General knows that, and he knows that the South Australian Government would not ask him for an opinion if they did not afterwards propose to state a case for decision by the High Court. When that case is stated, the matter in dispute will be contested. The Attorney-General's statement is a mere quibble which is unworthy of the honorable and learned gentleman. It is the veriest quibble to declare that the Federal authority will never be brought into the question. I bitterly regret that the Attorney-General has seen fit to place his own professional business before his duty to this House. If he had been present this afternoon to make his explanation, we could have pressed on with what he has been pleased to term "men's business." Now that the honorable and learned gentleman is present, I trust that we shall have his explanation forthwith.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I have no desire to prolong this debate, but interjections have been made by honorable members concerning what the leader of the Opposition would do in the matter of neglecting his private practice if he found it more lucrative than attending to his parliamentary duties. I would point out that there is an essential difference between the position of a private member and that of a member of the Government. Private members are not in receipt officially of a salary. Members of the Ministry receive special salaries for the offices which they fill, obviously with the object of enabling them to devote the whole of their time to public business without incurring any personal loss. And there is this to be said in reference to the leader of the Opposition—that whilst in office he did not attend to his legal practice. He gave it up entirely, and devoted himself solely to the duties of his position as Prime Minister.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He is suffering to-day as the result.

Mr. JOHNSON.—When he occupied that distinguished position, the right honorable member for East Sydney resolved that his private interests would have to give way to his public duties. I do not say that the Attorney-General should be expected to abandon the whole of his private practice, even for the emoluments of office, but I do say that in a special case of this kind, in which a specific charge was made against him—a charge of a very serious character, and one affecting his position in the Ministry—it was an act of gross discourtesy on his part not to explain in answer to the telephone message which he received, why he could not attend here, or not to ask to be excused from attendance at the Court for the short period necessary to explain his position.

Mr. ISAACS.—That was impossible.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not wish to condemn any person unheard. I admit that it is fair to await the Attorney-General's explanation for his absence. I can only say that by reason of his absence public business in this Chamber has been delayed, and to that extent the honorable and learned gentleman must be held responsible. One of the peculiarities of this debate has been the appearance of the Labour Party in a new rôle. In the past we have been treated to peculiar exhibitions of their capacity for changing their principles and tactics. Their attitude upon the present occasion, however, constitutes one of the most extraordinary somersaults that we have witnessed. Hitherto, they have always posed as the opponents of practices of the kind which form the subject of the present protest from the deputy leader of the Opposition. Now, however, we find them suddenly going back upon all their previous professions, and becoming apologists for the Attorney-General in his position of accepting a retaining fee on behalf of a State which may, as a result of his advice, be brought into conflict with the Commonwealth Government. It will be interesting to watch future developments, and to see the attitude which they adopt under similar circumstances towards any Ministry to which they hereafter are opposed. The present debate will be interesting as a record for future reference in that connexion, and honorable members opposite may rest assured that it will not be forgotten. Now that the Attorney-General is present, I trust that we shall hear some satisfactory explanation from him.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi—Attorney-General).—It is all very well for my honorable friends opposite to declare that time has been wasted by reason of my absence from the Chamber. This is a matter which has been before the public for a very considerable time. Certainly it has been before honorable members for some months, and I should have thought that if any honorable member intended to refer to it the least he could have done was to give me timely notice, instead of waiting till I was actually engaged in the transaction of business in Court, it being then utterly impossible for me to leave or, in fact, to do more than I did. What I did was to telephone to the Prime Minister, asking him to make the explanation which I understand he made for me.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned gentleman had notice of the intention of the deputy leader of the Opposition to bring this matter forward at 1 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member must not say that. His statement is not correct.

Mr. WILKS.—Pardon me. The Government Whip had the information at 1 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. ISAACS.—I can only assure the honorable member that I did not receive it until very much later. As soon as I did I put myself in communication with the Prime Minister, with the result that I have mentioned. What is the position? Some months ago I received a retainer from the South Australian Government—a retainer that I was bound to accept as an ordinary practising barrister. It is not for me to choose my clients. I accepted that retainer, and I hold it still. The question which was put before me was one of riparian rights between States, and did not concern the Commonwealth in a single particular. As far as I am able to judge, there is no Commonwealth right involved. The Commonwealth is well protected as regards its powers over navigation. Section 100 of the Constitution Act provides that—

The Commonwealth shall not, by any law or regulation of trade or commerce, abridge the right of a State or of the residents therein to the reasonable use of the waters of rivers for conservation or irrigation.

Under that provision "States" and "residents" are put upon exactly the same footing, and if I could not accept a retainer for a State I could not hold one for an individual who might complain that his riparian rights had been interfered with. If Commonwealth rights were involved, I can only say that I should instantly retire from my position as adviser of the South Australian Government. I should not hold that position one moment, if directly or indirectly the rights or interests of the Commonwealth as a whole were involved. But until that occurs—and it has not occurred, and I fail to see how it can possibly occur—I am not only justified, but am bound to hold my retainer, and do my duty to my client.

Mr. LONSDALE. — Until the honorable and learned member has discharged his obligations under the existing retainer.

Mr. ISAACS. — But the case is one which does not affect the Commonwealth. My predecessor in office, Sir Josiah Symon, held his retainer, in the very same way as I have done, throughout the existence of the Reid-McLean Government. Why was no complaint then made?

Mr. WILKS.—We did not know of it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have asked three of his colleagues, and they did not know of it.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY. — The Labour Party knew of it.

Mr. ISAACS.—I shall not venture to contradict the honorable member for Parramatta, but the fact that the late Attorney-General did hold that retainer was absolutely public property, and it is astonishing that any one could have remained ignorant of it. I hold that my predecessor was absolutely justified in the course he adopted. All that he was required to do was to advise whether New South Wales or Victoria was acting wrongfully to South Australia in regard to the diversion of water. That was the whole question between these States, and it might have been one raised as between individuals. Such a case might occur between a resident of New South Wales and a resident of South Australia.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—But was it not a Federal matter?

Mr. ISAACS.—No.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS. — Not a Federal matter as among the States themselves?

Mr. ISAACS.—A question as between the States would not be a Federal matter. My honorable friend will pardon me for saying that there is a clear distinction between a right as a Commonwealth right and a right as a State right. There are certain powers retained by the States, and in that regard the question at issue between South Australia and certain other States stands as if there had never been a Federation. It seems to be absolutely absurd, therefore, that any question should be raised as to my action. I can only say that the whole matter rests upon two considerations—first of all, that up to the present—and so far as I can see it will be the same in the future—no question affecting the Commonwealth has arisen or can arise.

Mr. CONROY.—At all events, no such question is before the honorable and learned member as counsel in the case.

Mr. ISAACS.—Certainly not. In the next place I can only say that I shall always do as I did when Attorney-General of Victoria—that the instant my duty to a client conflicts with the interest of the Commonwealth, that instant I shall return my retainer and have nothing to do with the case. That is the whole position.

Mr. WILKS.—Why did the honorable member not return his retainer when he took office?

Mr. ISAACS. — Have I not explained that the position in which it would be my duty to do so has not arisen, and is not likely to arise? I venture to say that no lawyer in this House will say that I am not right.

Mr. KELLY.—Here we have the union once more.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am prepared to appeal to the honorable and learned member for Wannon and to the honorable member for Werriwa to support the position I have taken up.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The Attorney-General is absolutely right.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is a lawyer a better judge of political propriety than is a layman?

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not say that he is a better judge of political insinuations, but a lawyer is in this case necessarily cognisant of the line of distinction existing between Federal law and interest and a State's law and interest. I am ready to abide by the decision of the members of the legal profession sitting on the Opposition benches, as well as by that of the legal members on this side of the House, as to the course I have taken.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I wholly resent the statement we have just heard that there is one aspect of the judging of affairs of this kind which is peculiar to lawyers, and another that is peculiar to laymen. Looking at the history of like cases, we find that the judgment of laymen has always proved to be sounder than that of members of the legal profession. I have yet to learn that the laymen in this House are not at least as well able as are the lawyers to judge of political propriety.

Mr. ISAACS.—Will the honorable member pardon me? I did not observe the honorable and learned member for Corinella in the Chamber, or I should have added his name to those of the honorable and learned member for Wannon, and the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, when I appealed to them as to the propriety of what I had done.

Mr. McCAY.—I have not spoken.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the honorable and learned member may appeal only to the lawyers of the Chamber to pronounce judgment, he has a very bad case. If he cannot appeal to the sound, solid, common sense of the House, apart from any professional knowledge, his case must rest upon a very poor foundation. I altogether resent the imputation that has been put upon the laymen of the Chamber by the Attorney-General's specific appeal to the professional opinion of the House.

Mr. CONROY.—I thought that the Attorney-General appealed to the lawyers on the Opposition benches as those most likely to be opposed to him.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have listened to the honorable member's explanation. He says that it has been a matter of public notoriety for months that the late Attorney-General was retained by the South Australian Government while holding office, and that it is surprising that we did not take this action while the Reid-McLean Government was in office. I can only say that the first that I learned of the honorable and learned member's action in this regard was from the newspaper, whilst on my way home on Friday last. I have asked three of Sir Josiah Symon's late colleagues whether they had any knowledge of his holding a retainer from the South Australian Government, and they all deny that they had.

Mr. ISAACS.—Does not the fact that the late Attorney-General acted as I have done, afford proof to the honorable member that my position is a correct one?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not necessarily. May I remind my honorable and learned friend that two of the present Justices of the High Court defended the legal and constitutional propriety of a similar action taken by them when they were members of the State Parliament of New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS.—It was quite a different matter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—A very similar case.

Mr. CONROY.—It was quite different. The opinion of the whole Bar at the time was against them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I repeat that it was a very similar case. Both those honorable gentlemen defended their position, but the State Parliament sent them to the rightabout, and they were deprived of their offices and their seats in the Legislature. This Parliament as a whole is just as well able to judge of what is an act of political propriety as any individual member of the legal profession in the Chamber. The Attorney-General says that the case in which he has been retained is one which stands as if no Federation existed. I can only imagine that view to be the outcome of a legal mind.

Mr. ISAACS.—Does the honorable member desire an illegal mind?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No. I want a bit of common sense on this matter.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member needs a great deal of it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I shall not go to the honorable and learned member for any, nor shall I go to him to acquire a sense of what is public propriety and decency. I shall be the judge of my own actions in that regard. Before the honorable and learned member came into the Chamber I quoted from Quick and Garran, upon the very question of the riparian rights of the States, to show that in the absence of Federal legislation a State might interfere with the navigability of a river, or remove any impediment from it, in pursuance of what it deemed to be its riparian rights as a State. Surely the honorable and learned member will recognise that Inter-State commerce might be involved in the blocking of a river. If a State chose to interfere with the navigability of a river, in the prosecution of what it believed to be its riparian rights, would he not, as Attorney-General, have to advise the opening of that river?

Mr. ISAACS.—But no such question has arisen.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned gentleman should not place himself in a position which involves the possibility of such a thing.

Mr. ISAACS.—I quite agree with the honorable member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member has no right to accept a retainer from a State Government, which makes it possible that he may have to retire from such a position. It is too late to retire when the trouble has been created. I respectfully submit that the very trouble which the Attorney-General says has not occurred might arise in consequence of an opinion which he submits to one of the States and for which he is paid; his opinion might provoke the very trouble which, as Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, he might subsequently have to correct. The honorable and learned member cannot serve two masters in this respect, and since there is the possibility of conflict always inhering in the relations between a State and the Commonwealth—and to none of those relations more closely and clearly than it does in matters affecting the water rights of the various States—the honorable and learned member ought not to place himself in such a position. The House has the first right to his services. He is the servant of Parliament, and it should have some voice in determining whether or not he should take up such a position as he has done. It is not a matter of legal interpretation, but one of which Parliament, in its corporate capacity, is the best judge. We have had some further statements on the part of the Prime Minister, who has deprecated the passing of judgment in this matter. In my opening remarks, I was extremely careful not to pass judgment on the Attorney-General. I simply said that I regarded his position in this regard as a grave constitutional anomaly, and asked for an explanation. That has been my attitude up to the present moment. The honorable and learned gentleman's intimation to the House that he will continue to hold the retainer from the South Australian Government, until he finds that to do so will be to come into conflict with his Federal duties, is surprising. His position is absolutely untenable. Many a Parliament has visited punishment on those whom it has found taking up such an anomalous attitude. The honorable member for Darwin is the only member of the Labour Party who has spoken in defence of the Attorney-General, and he has certainly given some very strange reasons in support of his contention as to the propriety of the Attorney-General's action. Among other things he said that the honorable and learned gentleman by taking this action might really be preventing difficulties arising as between the Commonwealth and the States. If the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth is in a position to prevent trouble between the States and the Commonwealth by taking a fee from a State Government, he must also be in a position to create trouble between them, and I, therefore, say that he ought not to be found placing himself within even the possibility of such a contingency. The very fact that his action as between the State and the Commonwealth may prevent trouble, only serves to illustrate the delicacy of the position in which he stands. Suppose that a solicitor for a private railway were engaged by a competing railway—and in this matter the interests of the States and the Commonwealth are possibly of a competing character, or they may so develop—would any one say that it would be proper for him to give an opinion upon a question as to which the two companies were fighting, or upon which they might fight? That is the position here; but the doctrine is laid down that there must be one code of legal morality outside, and another code inside this House. I recognise no difference whatever. The Attorney-General ought to be defending the interests of the Commonwealth, and ought to have nothing whatever to do with an outside body which at any moment may come into conflict with this Parliament. He is paid to do our work. He has entered into an obligation to do it. As I have already said, he is the legal watchdog of the Commonwealth, and has no right to undertake to act as legal watchdog of any of the States. I regretted exceedingly to hear that he does not intend to discontinue to accept retainers from States Governments, because, if he takes one from the Government of South Australia, there is no reason why he should not accept one from each of the States Governments. He is under a contract to two bodies, which may at any moment come into conflict, and he may be asked to supply each of them with the legal material upon which they may carry on a fight. We ought not to permit any Minister to occupy such a position. I have done what I regard to be my duty in this matter, and I regret that the House does not take a sufficiently serious view of the question. I have seen Parliaments before to-day treat a matter such as this as one of the gravest concern, but all we can get now from those who ought to be the last to shower it upon us, is contempt for our efforts to preserve a proper constitutional attitude towards the States.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I did not feel able to say anything in regard to this matter until I had heard the exact facts of the case. I have now learnt them from the statement of the Attorney-General, and I do not know that I should have said anything, but for the fact that the Minister was good enough to mention my name. Much as I usually agree with my honorable friends in the questions they raise with regard to the action of Ministers, I am quite unable to understand the exact fault the Attorney-General has committed in connexion with this retainer, for which he is being blamed. I say frankly that I agree with those honorable members who have expressed regret that the Attorney-General is unable to be here more constantly, because I think it is desirable that he should be in closer attendance at the House.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am here a great deal.

Mr. McCAY.—Perhaps so, I am only expressing my own opinion in the matter. I may say that, as one of the colleagues of Senator Sir Josiah Symon in the Reid Government, I was not aware that he had a retainer in the case to which reference has been made.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—We were aware of it in the labour room.

Mr. McCAY.—If I were in the labour room, I should know a great many things of which I am at present ignorant; a great many things that I should be glad to know; and, if I were not under a pledge of secrecy, a great many things I should be glad to make known to the public. I understand that the Attorney-General has accepted a retainer from one of two suitors in a matter which does not concern the Commonwealth, and which is not likely in itself, to concern the Commonwealth, but which may lead to some other matter in which our interference will become necessary. He is retained in this matter only, and holds no general retainer from the South Australian Government in regard to all its suits, some of which might involve action against the Commonwealth. He has a retainer in a matter involving two individuals, and a case in which the Commonwealth is not directly concerned. If he were not competent to act in such a matter it would not be open to him to accept a retainer from any suitor, because he could not feel assured that the Commonwealth might not ultimately become involved in the case.

Mr. ISAACS.—I have a general retainer in this subject-matter.

Mr. McCAY.—That is as I understand it. The Attorney-General holds a general retainer upon the question of the rights of the various States with regard to the waters of streams that flow through more than one State—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Upon a question in which the States and the Commonwealth stand closely related to each other.

Mr. McCAY.—The general question of riparian rights is undoubtedly one in which the Commonwealth is interested; but it seems to me to be impossible for the Commonwealth to become a party to the particular suit referred to. Consequently, it seems to me that we have no concern in this particular matter, or in what an honorable member of this House, who happens to be a barrister, may do outside, so long as his action does not conflict with his duty to the Commonwealth. If the Attorney-General were to accept a retainer from a State in a case to which the Commonwealth might fairly be expected to become a party, that would be a different matter.

Mr. ISAACS.—I would not even give an opinion in a matter to which the Commonwealth might become a party.

Mr. McCAY.—The Attorney-General would act wrongly if, whilst holding his present position, he gave an opinion to another party in a matter that might affect the Commonwealth. I do not see, however, how this case could affect the Commonwealth. So far as I am able to judge—and I say frankly that I watch carefully everything that is done by the Attorney-General and his colleagues—I do not see how his position, as counsel for the South Australian Government in this particular case, can affect his judgment as a member of this Parliament, or of the Ministry. What he would do, as counsel to the South Australian Government, would be to give an opinion upon, or argue, the law as it is, or the facts as they are, and that would not prejudice his opinion as to what the law ought to be in regard to the right of interference of the Commonwealth in riparian matters. It is only fair to the Attorney-General that I should say that it appears to me that the case in which he is concerned as counsel has nothing to do with the Commonwealth as a matter of litigation, and that therefore we cannot fairly take exception to his action in connexion with it.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—An interjection made by me during the time that the honorable member for Wentworth was speaking, was replied to by him, with the remark that the Labour Party used to object to lawyers. I may say that at the same time they also objected to publicans. I think it would have been a good thing if they had adhered to that line of conduct. I desire to bring under notice a question affecting the interests of my constituents, namely, the proposal to abandon the rifle range at Toowong, which fails to meet present requirements, and to construct a new range at Sandgate. I think that the new range will be much safer and more convenient for the members of rifle clubs, and I trust that its completion will be facilitated as rapidly as possible.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—I listened with very great interest to the remarks of the Attorney-General, who appeared to attempt to justify his action in flouting this Parliament. He had an insignificant engagement down town which he regarded as of more importance than the necessity of answering the charge made against him by members of the Opposition—a charge which might have involved the very existence of the Government. Not only did the Attorney-General flout this Parliament, but, knowing that a majority was at his back, he said that he would continue to accept retainers from the States Governments. He has been supported by his brother lawyers in this House, who admit that the Commonwealth may become involved in the case in which the Attorney-General's advice has been sought, although they do not think it probable that it will be. That admission is quite sufficient to justify the attitude assumed by members of the Opposition. If the Attorney-General were retained as counsel for a State Government, and a suit involving the Commonwealth were entered upon, the Attorney-General would be required to give us the benefit of his advice. He practically admitted his guilt when he pointed to the fact that a position similar to that occupied by himself had been filled by Senator Sir Josiah Symon. The late Attorney-General was no more justified than is the present occupant of that office in holding a brief from the South Australian Government, and although the Government may weather the present storm, they cannot claim that they have achieved any great victory. The Attorney-General has acted most indiscreetly, not only in flouting honorable members, but in expressing his determination to continue to accept retainers such as those which he now holds, whilst he is receiving high fees as the legal adviser of the Commonwealth. He has appealed to his brother professionals in this House, and none of them have dared to say that he has done wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON.—We should not be frightened to say so, if we thought so.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—As a matter of fact, that interjection shows that the honorable and learned member, and other honorable and learned members are frightened. They have upheld the Attorney-General in working for two masters for the sake of the "shekels." Honorable and learned members are subject to intimidation. Even the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who was disposed to take the view that the Attorney-General was not justified in retaining his present position, expressed an opposite opinion after he had been taken by the ear by the Attorney-General. I am not permitted to say all I know, but the honorable and learned member for Corinella knows that had he been called upon to speak before the Attorney-General had made his explanation, he would have expressed views very different from those which he uttered. It was not until the Attorney-General had taken him by the ear that he came forward and spoke in the subjunctive mood as to what may or may not occur. But it is most unjust that the legal members of the House should band themselves together in support of the Attorney-General instead of speaking on behalf of the interests of the Commonwealth. The honorable and learned gentleman has been called upon to advise one of the States, and he has told us that he would advise one or all of them against the interests of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS.—I did not say that.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—If the honorable and learned gentleman advises a State upon a matter affecting the Commonwealth, is he not advising it as to the position which it should take up against the Commonwealth? Would he be called upon to advise for any other reason? The honorable and learned member for Angas has made himself famous for his advocacy of the rights of his State in regard to the waters of the Murray River system, and he has stated a case for the opinion of the Attorney-General and Sir Josiah Symon. These gentlemen have given their opinions, for which they have drawn fees.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Why should they not do so?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It is the shekels that they think of. No one has a higher opinion of the Attorney-General than I have. But I am thoroughly disgusted to hear him reiterate that he will continue to accept retainers and fees from individual States against the interests of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS.—I have not said anything of the kind.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The honorable and learned gentleman has stated that he will continue to accept retainers to advise individual States in regard to these conflicting interests, which, as the honorable and learned member for Corinella said, may not concern the Commonwealth, thereby admitting that they may concern the Commonwealth. The Attorney-General, because he has a majority at his back, has flouted Parliament.

Mr. THOMAS.—He is only flouting certain members of the Opposition.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The wires are already at work, and to-morrow the newspapers of the Commonwealth will fire the public with indignation at what has been done. Honorable members may jeer in their fancied security, but were it not for the fact that Senator Sir Josiah Symon has also been culpable, and that the leader of the Opposition is absent, there would be something like a crisis on this occasion. I am familiar with Constitutional authorities, and I know that Governments have gone down on questions of this character. That I admit was in days when we had in Parliament men who were constitutionalists. They would not have suffered Parliament to be flouted by the Attorney-General, who caused the House to waste hours while he was earning shekels in a Court down the street. The laughter of honorable members does not disconcert me; it only shows how satisfied they are in their ignorance. The country will not stand this kind of thing, and the fact that we who object to it are in a minority in this Chamber should make our opposition all the stronger. Had the Attorney-General been alive to his responsibilities as a Minister of the Crown, he would have thrown up his brief and the fees attached to it, and come here at once to explain matters to Parliament. If he had done that, the debate might have ended in five minutes.

Mr. CONROY.—If I were a client, no lawyer should treat my brief in that way.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—A citizen who sat in the gallery for hours this afternoon commented on the strangeness of the fact that this discussion should go on so long while the Attorney-General was down the street earning fees. The honorable and learned gentleman has appealed to the legal members of the House, as if they were the men best able to judge of his position.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Any one with a clear head can judge of it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I would not go to the honorable and learned member for clearness of head, notwithstanding his precocity. However, I am well satisfied with the turn the debate has taken. Two or three victories of this character will mean the downfall of the Ministry. I know that the Attorney-General will not accept another fee of the same character, and to that extent the debate has done good. But he has no justification for allowing Parliament to discuss a matter for hours when it could have been decided in five minutes, if he had not been down the street earning fees.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am not responsible for the conduct of the honorable member in wasting time.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The seriousness of the situation appealed to the Prime Minister, who told us that he had rung up the Attorney-General, and said to him, "You are wanted in Parliament," and that his reply was, "I will come when this case is finished."

Mr. ISAACS.—That is not so.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The Prime Minister stated that he had rung up the Attorney-General, who said that he would not come. I am glad to learn that the Attorney-General did not give that reply.

Mr. ISAACS.—And nobody said that I gave it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The action of the Prime Minister showed that he was alive to the seriousness of the situation. The Attorney-General has flouted his own leader, and the Government, which I thought stood pretty firmly upon a rock, is standing on sand when a Minister can do that. The Labour Party cheer the Government now, but they would cheer us to-morrow if they thought that it was necessary to support us to prevent a dissolution. For their own safety, they support a Government which will bring in measures which will enable this Parliament to spin out its existence as long as possible. I do not usually speak so warmly, or at such length, but this is a serious matter. If the Government continue to ignore the Opposition, they will find that, instead of being on a bed of roses, they will be on a bed of thorns. Their punishment will come from without, rather than from within, as all reforms come. It is only so long as we have the public with us that we can be secure of our positions, and it is because the members of the Opposition feel that the public will be indignant at the advising of the States by the Attorney-General against the interests of the Commonwealth that we so strongly resent his action.

Mr. MALONEY (Melbourne).—I think that the debate is not altogether a waste of time, because it will show the House how to avoid a similar occurrence in the future. Let us make a change by providing for an elective Ministry, and requiring that every Minister shall give up private practice.

Mr. CONROY.—If I were a Minister, how would the honorable member make me sit in a room with men with whose opinions I was not in accord?

Mr. MALONEY.—The honorable and learned member will never be a Minister. As a member of the State Parliament, I always held strongly, and still hold, that there should be elective Ministries and permanent occupancy of portfolios, with the giving up of private business. So long as the game of the ins and the outs continues, any Attorney-General would be foolish to give up his private practice. But if the leader of the Opposition will move for the election of Ministers and require elective Ministers to give up their private practice, I shall vote for the motion. Any one who has seen the large volume of type-written matter upon which the Attorney-General has been called upon to advise, knows that he has not had time since he has been in office to attend to the case, and that the matter is one which has been the subject of his consideration for over a year. He could not afford to give up his private practice under present circumstances, because he may at any time lose his office by reason of a change of Ministry. But if he had security of tenure—and his abilities would warrant him in holding the office for life—I have no doubt that he would be willing to give up his private practice. But until that occurs, or until we adopt a common-sense method of electing Ministers, I trust that he will continue to act as he has been doing.

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra).—I agree with a great many of the remarks of the honorable member for Robertson in regard to the time which has been consumed this afternoon as the result of the absence of the Attorney-General from this Chamber. The absence from the House, not only of the Attorney-General, but of Ministers generally, is a matter of public scandal from one end of Australia to the other. If the Attorney-General cannot find it convenient to attend here whilst the Court is sitting—if he prefers to neglect the business of the country—

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not neglect it. I venture to say that I have done even more than my fair share of work.

Mr. FULLER.—The Attorney-General has admitted that he received a telephone message before 3 o'clock this afternoon, requesting him to attend in his place in the Chamber. Had he been present, time would not have been wasted in discussing this matter, and money would thus have been saved to the country. To my mind, that circumstance furnishes another strong reason for our removing to the permanent Seat of Government as speedily as possible. The sooner we are all placed upon the same level in the discharge of our legislative functions, the better it will be for Australia as a whole. I know that there are members in this House representing New South Wales constituencies—and in this connexion I may mention the right honorable member for East Sydney and the honorable and learned member for Werriwa—who have been compelled to sacrifice a large portion of their professional practice since they entered this Parliament. I abandoned my practice the moment I was returned to the Commonwealth Legislature, realizing that I could not attend to it and at the same time efficiently perform my parliamentary duties. But there are some representatives who are not able to live upon their parliamentary allowance, and who are compelled to seek some additional source of income. The sooner the representatives of the other States are placed upon an equality with those of New South Wales, the better will it be for the Commonwealth. I cannot agree with all the remarks of the honorable member for Robertson. I am sure that the Attorney-General has not endeavoured to intimidate any member of the legal profession. Moreover, if any such intimidation were attempted, there is no body of men who would more keenly resent it than would the members of that profession. The members of the Australian Bar are, in all probability, the most independent set of individuals, so far as character and opinions are concerned, to be found from one end of the Commonwealth to the other. I hope that the ear of the honorable member for Corinella has not been very seriously hurt by the pulling which it received from the Attorney-General, according to the description of the honorable member for Robertson. I take a different view from that of my fellow lawyers of this matter. I regard the position occupied by the present Attorney-General and by his predecessor in office as one which is open to very serious objection. As far as I am personally concerned, I did not know that the question was to be raised until the deputy leader of the Opposition spoke to me about it just before I entered the Chamber; but I recognise that the Attorney-General is the legal watchdog of the Commonwealth, and I think that the anomalous position occupied by the honorable and learned member for Indi calls for very serious consideration on the part of the House and the country. I should like to refer the Attorney-General to page 885 of Quick and Garra's Annotated Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth. Under the heading of "Concurrent powers of the States" appears the following:—

The navigation power, being part of the trade and commerce power, is not "exclusively" vested in the Parliament of the Commonwealth, and, therefore, the concurrent power of the States to deal with Inter-State navigation and with navigable waters will continue, subject to be ousted, in part or in whole, by Federal legislation.

Lower down on the same page I find—

And a State may not only, in the absence of Federal legislation, improve the navigability of rivers, but may even obstruct navigability.

In the present instance, we find that the Attorney-General, according to his own statement, is advising the South Australian Government upon a question affecting the riparian rights of that State and some other States.

Mr. ISAACS.—Not as affecting navigability.

Mr. FULLER.—A decision as to the rights of the different States to the waters of a river may easily result in a question affecting its navigability. A State may not only improve, but may even obstruct navigability.

Mr. ISAACS.—Will the honorable and learned member permit me to say that the only question involved, so far as I am aware, is as to whether other States have a right to take as much water from South Australia as they have done.

Mr. FULLER.—A sufficient quantity of water may be diverted from a river to block its navigation, and consequently to interfere with Inter-State commerce, which is a matter that comes under Federal jurisdiction, and one with which the Attorney-General would have to deal.

Mr. ISAACS.—If such a question could possibly arise, in acting on behalf of South Australia and endeavouring to prevent it, I should actually be acting in the interests of the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That does not affect the question of the propriety of the Attorney-General acting as adviser to a State Government.

Mr. FULLER.—Exactly. It does not affect the possibility of the Attorney-General in his official position advising a State Government as to an obstruction of navigation. I was a member of the New South Wales Parliament when a similar matter was raised affecting the position of two of the present Justices of the High Court. I think that the course followed by the Attorney-General seriously affects him in his official position. I was very sorry to hear him speak in such a confident way, and with so little regard to the strong opinions which have been expressed in this House. I regret that he intends to continue to hold a retainer from the South Australian Government.

Mr. ISAACS.—I did not say that.

Mr. FULLER.—I think that the honorable and learned gentleman has been very indiscreet in this matter. I wish that he had been more gracious to the Committee, and to the Opposition in particular. I sincerely trust that in future when great matters of this sort do arise, he will allow his private interests to give way to those of the public.

Mr. ISAACS.—If I had had any fair intimation at all I should have been present in the Chamber this afternoon. The honorable member for Parramatta said that he knew of the matter on Friday, and yet I never heard of his intention to take action until to-day.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The whip went away to ring up the honorable and learned gentleman at a quarter to 1 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. HUME COOK.—But the whip did not get him on the telephone.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I could thoroughly sympathize with the honorable member for Robertson in the strong language which he has used, if the facts were as he represented them to be. It seems to me, however, that they are not. Indeed, I think that even the honorable member for Parramatta has misunderstood the position. If this were a case in which the Attorney-General, in his official capacity, had undertaken to give an opinion which might conflict with his duties as chief legal adviser of the Commonwealth, I should have indorsed every condemnatory word which has been uttered regarding his action. Probably I should have said a great deal more. But the honorable and learned gentleman said in effect, "My case is of such and such a nature, and I appeal to the honorable and learned member for Wannon, the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, as to whether I have not acted rightly." I interpreted that statement differently from the honorable member for Parramatta. I submit that the Attorney-General knew that we were so opposed to him generally, that if he had acted wrongly, we should have been the first to wipe him out. When the honorable member for Robertson suggests that, because we are members of the legal profession, we would side with him in an iniquitous course, I am absolutely surprised. If the case were as the honorable member represented, I should agree with every word that he uttered.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The House is just as able to judge of a matter of political propriety as is a lawyer.

Mr. CONROY.—I think so, too. I wish that there were a little more political propriety and morality in this House. New South Wales would not then be denied the Federal Capital, or her right to an additional representative. The Attorney-General was asked for his opinion by the South Australian Government before he accepted Ministerial office. If his opinion had conflicted with his present duties, I should have expected him to throw up his retainer at once, and he says that he would have so acted.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The ground I take is that he has no right as Attorney-General to put himself in a position in which there is a possibility of that occurring.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member is perfectly right in the position which he takes up. But the facts are that the South Australian Government wish to know whether they have certain remedies against

Victoria, or New South Wales, or Queensland, if any of these States interfere with certain waters. That applies not only to the States themselves, but to the residents of those States. Surely a lawyer is entitled to give his opinion upon such a question. In my opinion it is better that lawyers should abstain from practice rather than incur the risk of conflict with their duties as members of Parliament. Since I entered the Commonwealth Parliament I have absolutely refused to deal with any cases in which the Crown is concerned, either upon one side or the other. But what does it entail? The sacrifice of the whole of my professional practice. That is why I complain so bitterly—

Mr. LONSDALE.—Of the inadequacy of the parliamentary allowance?

Mr. CONROY.—Quite so. It is absolutely impossible for an honorable member to attend both to his parliamentary and professional duties. A barrister who happens to be a member of Parliament is perfectly justified, however, in undertaking any duty in his professional capacity that does not conflict with his position as a representative of the people. The case, as presented to us, is that the Attorney-General has been asked to advise what are the riparian rights of South Australia as against, not the Commonwealth, but Victoria, New South Wales, or Queensland, which is a very different thing.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It might be against the Commonwealth.

Mr. CONROY.—Does not the honorable member recognise that that position might arise in the very near future?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And, therefore, the Attorney-General should keep aloof from the case.

Mr. CONROY.—It has not yet arisen. The only provision in the Constitution dealing with this question is section 100, which provides that—

The Commonwealth shall not, by any law or regulation of trade or commerce, abridge the right of a State or of the residents therein, to the reasonable use of the waters of rivers for conservation or irrigation.

Mr. ISAACS.—That preserves the rights of the States.

Mr. CONROY.—The point is that we have not made any regulation or passed any law affecting these matters.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That being so, the Attorney-General may have to step in at any moment.

Mr. CONROY.—There can be no conflict at present between the States and the Commonwealth. All that the Attorney-General has been asked to do by the South Australian Government is to give an opinion as to the rights of that State in the case of a conflict with another State.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I hold that, as a possible umpire, he should have referred the question to some one else.

Mr. McCAY.—He cannot possibly become an umpire.

Mr. CONROY.—Does not the honorable member for Parramatta see that a different position altogether would be created if such a thing were possible? As a matter of fact, however, the High Court, and not the Parliament, must deal with these questions. It is the decision of the High Court—and not the decision of the Parliament—which is vital, so far as the rights of the States in this respect are concerned.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Attorney-General might have to place before the Court a case in which one State had locked a river, and interfered with trade.

Mr. CONROY.—That case would have to come before the High Court, and not before the Parliament.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But the obligation is placed on us under the Constitution to preserve the freedom of trade.

Mr. CONROY.—The moment any law or regulation abridging the right of a State to the use of the waters of rivers was passed, the Attorney-General would be able to deal with questions of this kind. He might then have to state a case for the opinion of the High Court. If the position were, as some honorable members of the Opposition have suggested, there could be no question as to what ought to be done. But the case is very different from what they suggest. When the Attorney-General appealed to the members of the legal profession in the House, I had to say, in all fairness, what, in my opinion, was the real position. I should be very glad to turn the whole Ministry out of office, and wish that I could have found some excuse for doing so in the complaint now under discussion; but in justice to the Attorney-General I must say that at present, if the facts be as he has stated, I see nothing in his conduct in this case that calls for condemnation. While I think it is a matter for regret that he was not in attendance a little earlier in the afternoon, let me tell honorable members that clients will not always allow their counsel to leave a court at a moment's notice—

Mr. WILKS.—Should not the public be considered?

Mr. CONROY.—Was not one of the public being considered in a most vital matter by the absence of the Attorney-General from the House? Was he not seeking to help a member of the public to obtain justice?

Mr. ISAACS.—How much has the public been considered by this waste of time?

Mr. CONROY.—If the position were as suggested by some of my honorable friends of the Opposition, I should say that time had not been unduly occupied in dealing with it. But I feel constrained to say that I think the Attorney-General has not acted improperly.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That it is right for him to retain his retainer?

Mr. CONROY.—If the case is one relating only to a dispute between States, he certainly is right; but if it were a matter affecting a dispute between a State and the Commonwealth, his position could not be justified.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Would it be proper for him to accept a retainer from every State in any matter affecting State rights?

Mr. CONROY.—He could not do that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why?

Mr. CONROY.—Because such a position could arise only in an action by the States against the Commonwealth. The Attorney-General tells us that he has simply been asked to advise what are the riparian rights of South Australia as against other States.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—And the Commonwealth may be dragged at any time into the dispute.

Mr. CONROY.—I wish the honorable member could show me that that is so.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—If there be a possibility of the Commonwealth becoming involved in the dispute, would it not be better for all concerned that the Attorney-General should be perfectly free?

Mr. CONROY.—In my opinion, the allowance attached to the office of Attorney-General should be such that on taking that office an honorable member ought not to accept briefs of any kind.

Mr. WILKS.—That is what we are contending.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—If he had any security of tenure in those circumstances, he ought not to accept briefs.

Mr. CONROY.—That is so. At present no such security exists, and, therefore, I do not think it would be right to expect members of the legal profession to sacrifice their practice at the bar on assuming office.

Mr. ISAACS.—Are business men required to give up all their business on taking office?

Mr. CONROY.—They are not.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Many of them have to do so.

Mr. CONROY.—In the present circumstances, no one expects them to do anything of the kind. A time will come, however, when it will be recognised that the duties of a Parliamentarian, if properly carried out, are such that no remuneration earned in the ordinary walks of life could be too high for him. As some reference has been made to certain cases that have arisen in New South Wales, I may say that the one now before us is absolutely different from them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is only legally different from them.

Mr. CONROY.—No. There is a vital difference. In the Proudfoot case, proceedings were taken against certain Railway Commissioners, and the subtle point was raised that the Railway Commissioners were not the Crown.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The question actually arose which may arise in this case.

Mr. CONROY.—In the present circumstances, the case suggested by the honorable member cannot arise. Does he mean to say that I should not appear to-morrow as counsel in a case, because a year, or twenty years hence some one might mention in the House that there was such a case?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is not an analogous case.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member assert that if the honorable member for Darwin did not receive his parliamentary allowance for a month, he would not be at liberty to bring an action against the Commonwealth to recover it, and that a member of Parliament ought not to accept a brief to appear in his behalf? Would the honorable member say that if a member of this Parliament were injured by a Commonwealth law dealing with navigation, he should not be allowed to bring an action to secure redress? Does any honorable member say that if a State, or even the Federal Parliament, imposed an income tax to which he objected, he would not be at liberty to fight in the Law Courts against its application to him?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable and learned member say that the Attorney-General would be justified in appearing for a State in an income-tax case against a member of this Parliament?

Mr. CONROY.—He would be justified if he were a private member. If he were called upon as Attorney-General to deal with a case of that kind, the position would be entirely different. If the New South Wales Government decided to bring an action against the Federal Parliament, because it had declined to carry out the provisions of the Constitution in regard to the representation of the people, and the Attorney-General accepted a retainer on behalf of that State, we should certainly do our best to turn him out of office at the first opportunity.

Mr. ISAACS.—I quite agree with the honorable and learned member.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—Does the honorable and learned member think that any lawyer in the House would do anything so indecent?

Mr. CONROY.—I do not think he would.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—All that I say is that the Attorney-General should not accept a retainer from a State in proceedings against the Commonwealth.

Mr. CONROY.—There is no doubt that in that respect the honorable member's contention is correct; but in fairness to the Attorney-General, I must say that there is no connexion between the case now before us and the supposititious one raised by the honorable member for Parramatta.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—Before the Attorney-General made his statement to the House, I expressed my view that there was no objection to the Attorney-General completing the work he had engaged to do for the South Australian Government under the retainer accepted by him, but that, as a matter of political propriety, he should retire from his present position as counsel for the Government of that State immediately his present obligations had been discharged. I still hold that view. The Attorney-General has declared his intention to continue to accept retainers from the States Governments, and I think that he is adopting an altogether wrong attitude, because he should be absolutely free from anything that would create suspicion in the public mind.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member heard me say that if anything should arise which might directly or indirectly affect the Commonwealth I would retire immediately.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I understood so, but I think that the Attorney-General would consult his own dignity and the political proprieties if he broke off his present relations with the South Australian Government at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What would be the position if he stood by the South Australian Government until the time for action came, and then left them?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I say that that would be wrong.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member for Parramatta entirely misconceives the position.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The Attorney-General says that the interests of South Australia and those of the Commonwealth cannot come into conflict in connexion with the matter in which he has been retained, because the interests of South Australia would be those of the Commonwealth in the event of any dispute arising. I do not know that that is quite the correct view to take. I can imagine a dispute arising owing to the diversion of waters from the rivers by New South Wales and Victoria, and a question being asked in this Parliament with regard to it. The Attorney-General would then be called upon to express his opinion, and if it were in conflict with the views expressed by the legal advisers of New South Wales and Victoria, it might be suggested that the Minister was influenced by his connexion with the South Australian Government.

Mr. ISAACS.—The probability is that I should not answer the question, because it would not be a proper one to ask.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The mere refusal to answer the question might create suspicion that the Attorney-General was shirking his duty, and I think that everything calculated to operate in that direction should be avoided. I do not wish to set myself up as a pattern in this respect, but I may say that I have always declined to do anything that might create suspicion in the public mind with regard to my conduct or character as a public man. I do not suggest that the Attorney-General would do anything wrong, or that he would allow his retainer to influence him one way or the other, but I think we should at its very inception express our strong objection to anything that would tend to prejudicially affect the character of Ministers, or suggest a divided allegiance on their part.

Mr. ISAACS.—I quite agree with that.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It may be urged that the case in question is one of small importance, but it is better for us to take action in the right direction now rather than to wait until some momentous occasion arises. I quite agree that the Proudfoot case in New South Wales stands on a footing entirely different from that which has been under discussion, but I would point out that the complications which arose over that case would never have occurred if objection had been taken at an earlier stage to Ministers acting as counsel for claimants against the Government. Mr. Justice Barton and Mr. Justice O'Connor would never have accepted briefs in connexion with the case referred to, but for the fact that similar action on the part of others had been allowed to pass without question. I would urge upon the Attorney-General that, as a matter of political propriety, he should set a good example for the future, and withdraw from his present position at the very first opportunity. I am sure that he would not be involved in any great loss.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is not the question. If it were wrong for me to continue to act as counsel for the South Australian Government, I should not hesitate to retire from that position whatever the loss might be.

Mr. LONSDALE.—That may be so, but I still think that the Attorney-General would consult his own dignity if he were to take the course suggested. I feel very strongly in this matter, and I shall certainly vote in the direction I indicated when I first addressed the House, because I think we should be very careful to avoid the slightest inroad upon the sphere of duty of Ministers.

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports).—I wish to direct attention to a matter of considerable importance to a very large section of the community, namely, the prohibition of the importation of opium. I had hoped that the Government would have declared their policy upon that subject, and I trust that it will receive their earliest and most careful consideration. Another matter I desire to mention relates to the Department of the Postmaster-General. A very serious accident recently occurred to a workman who was engaged in painting telegraph poles, and I would urge the Postmaster-General to take all the steps in his power to secure the safety of the men occupied in this work by providing them with belts and scaffolding.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—Before alluding very briefly to the subject that has occupied most of the time of the Committee this afternoon, I should like to say that so far we are without information as to whether the Government have accepted the Public Service Classification Scheme. I am surprised that the Government have not announced their intention in regard to the matter. I understand that no provision is made in the Estimates for the increases in the salaries provided for under the Classification. That might be taken as an indication that the Classification had not been accepted, and I think that we are entitled to some announcement on the subject. The Watson Government stated definitely what their attitude was, and I think—

Mr. GROOM.—Did the Government with which the honorable member was associated indicate its attitude?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—We had not brought the matter forward. We promised that an opportunity would be afforded to discuss the Classification Scheme, and when matters had reached that stage we should most certainly have indicated our attitude. I stated most distinctly that, so far as I was concerned, I was prepared to accept the scheme, but I am not sure whether the Prime Minister made any definite announcement on the subject.

Mr. PAGE.—He practically accepted it.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Certainly, if an opportunity had been afforded to the Government with which I was connected to bring the matter forward, we should have regarded it our duty to declare our attitude with regard to it. I do not propose to prolong the debate that has taken place with regard to the propriety of the Attorney-General continuing to act as counsel for the South Australian Government in the matter of the Murray waters question. Up to the stage of his announcement that he intends to accept a renewal of the retainer, I agree with those who found no exception to the action of the Attorney-General. He, with other members of the Parliament, when not in office, undertook to give a legal opinion to the State of South Australia on the important matter of the rivers question. If that work had not been completed when he took office, I would not have objected to its completion, especially as during the brief period for which the retainer had to run there was no likelihood of any serious question arising in the matter which would affect the Commonwealth. So far as the honorable and learned member for Angas, against whom some reflections were made, is concerned, I think that he was right in accepting a retainer. He was, and is, a private member of the House, and I hold that a private member may fight a question, as he has fought that question, in Parliament, out of Parliament, in his State, or constituency, and, if he sees fit, in the law courts of the country.

Mr. TUDOR.—What about the action of the Attorney-General of the late Administration?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The statement in the newspaper the other day was the first knowledge I had that either the honorable and learned member for Indi or Senator Sir Josiah Symon had been retained by South Australia, though I understood that the honorable and learned member for Angas had been so retained. I learn from what has been stated<sup>1</sup> that Senator Sir Josiah Symon, like the Attorney-General, when a private member accepted a retainer to give a legal opinion to the State of South Australia. How far he did anything for that retainer while a member of the Ministry, I cannot say.

Mr. ISAACS.—He occupied the same position as I do.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I would have no objection to the Attorney-General acting in this manner until he had completed the task which he undertook, and I have exonerated the honorable and learned member for Angas from any impropriety. But it is another thing for the Attorney-General to announce to Parliament his intention to renew his retainer. An entirely new situation now arises. I do not say that it is actually wrong for him to do this, but it is getting near the borderland, and it is highly desirable, in my opinion, so that there may be no cause for suspicion, that he should come to another decision. It is all very well for the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, and other honorable members, to say that the questions arising between the two States concerned are not such as will affect the Commonwealth. The honorable and learned member for Werriwa stated that the only power given to the Commonwealth in the Constitution in regard to these river matters is contained in section 100, which says that—

The Commonwealth shall not by any law or regulation of trade or commerce, abridge the right of a State or of the residents therein to the reasonable use of the waters of rivers for conservation or irrigation.

Mr. ISAACS.—That does not give a power; it restricts the power of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It implies a power. Quick and Garran say at page 874 of their Annotated Constitution—

The power to regulate commerce is the basis of the power to regulate navigation and navigable waters and streams.

To me it is evident that some of the questions affecting the Commonwealth must come up in any suit that is entered upon between the States with regard to the waters of the Murray.

Mr. ISAACS.—If a question arose between two citizens of the Commonwealth regarding their riparian rights, would it be improper for a Minister to accept a brief from one of them?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not say so.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is a similar case.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Even in such a case, if the Minister knew that under the Constitution questions might arise in regard to which the powers of the Commonwealth would be brought into consideration, and possibly into action, he should say, "I must hand back my retainer."

Mr. ISAACS.—If the interests of the Commonwealth were in any way involved, directly or indirectly, it would be my duty, and I would carry it out at once, to return the retainer.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It might be, as often happens in law cases, that the Commonwealth would have to be represented by counsel in the case, and who would direct counsel if the Attorney-General were briefed for one of the parties?

Mr. ISAACS.—That situation is impossible.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is not impossible. I have shown what large powers the Constitution gives to the Commonwealth in connexion with navigable rivers and streams.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Commonwealth has power to regulate bills of lading. Am I, therefore, not to appear in a dispute between two merchants arising out of a bill of lading?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That is not a case of the same sort. The Commonwealth is not the trustee of the States in that matter.

Mr. ISAACS.—It is not the trustee of the States in this matter.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Commonwealth must see that there is equality between the States.

Mr. PAGE.—Would the Commonwealth have to interfere if there were a dispute about water rights between Victoria and South Australia?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It might. The questions raised might trench on the trust of the Commonwealth, in which case the Commonwealth might have to interfere.

Mr. ISAACS.—It could not.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I think it undesirable that a Minister should be bound to one of the parties of a suit by which Commonwealth interests may be affected. The proper attitude of the Attorney-General is to stand by, ready to interfere at any moment when he sees the rights of the States which have been committed to his trust trenching upon. The honour of a Minister is to a certain extent his own, but it is also in the possession of Parliament, and we should be particular to see, not only that it is not smirched, but that there is no appearance of evil. The consideration of this matter should be above party influence, but with all due respect to the Minister, without saying a word against him personally, or impugning his motives, I think that he has not come to the wisest decision. I do not blame him for undertaking, before he became a Minister, to give an opinion.

Mr. ISAACS.—I have not completed the work yet.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The task I know requires much learned research, tremendous labour, and grave consideration, and if the Attorney-General says, "I have not completed it," I, for one, will not find the slightest fault with him for going on with it until he has brought it to a completion. But, to renew, the retainer is a different thing. The reason for which a retainer is given is that his services may be called upon by the State.

Mr. ISAACS.—But not against the Commonwealth.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—There might be a danger of a decision being given which would be against the interests of the Commonwealth, unless the Commonwealth intervenes.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is quite impossible.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It may be improbable, but it is not impossible. Under the circumstances, I think it highly desirable that the Minister should keep his hands free.

Mr. CHANTER.—Should not other members do so, too?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I see no objection to a lawyer, who is a private member, taking a brief against the Commonwealth, if he sees fit.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Under the Constitution, he cannot accept a brief for the Commonwealth.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member for Riverina, who, like myself, is a layman, has fought questions in this House, and outside, and if he thought right, and had the opportunity and the means, it would be open to him to pursue the matter in a suit at law.

Mr. CHANTER.—Not if my personal interest were concerned.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am speaking of matters affecting the interests of constituents. Similarly, a man may accept a brief for his State against the Commonwealth if he thinks that the Commonwealth is exceeding its powers. But the Attorney-General, whose business it is to look after the interests of the Commonwealth, especially in regard to legal matters, occupies a different position, and should have his hands perfectly free. He should not be tied to any party in connexion with litigation which may affect the Commonwealth interest.

Mr. ISAACS.—I quite agree as to that.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I shall not vote for any motion moved in regard to this matter, because I do not say that the honorable and learned member's action is absolutely wrong, but it is near the border line. Unless the Minister alters his decision, we shall have to await later developments; but the time occupied in this discussion will not have been wasted if it leads Ministers to exercise care in guarding their actions, so that the interests of their professions or business may not, in any case, overlap those of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ROBINSON (Wannon).—My apology for making a few remarks is that my name has been mentioned once or twice during the debate. In this matter, I cannot follow the lead of the honorable member for Parramatta. So far as I have been able to gather from the facts which have been stated to the Committee, no blame or impropriety whatever attaches to the Attorney-General. He has merely given an opinion upon certain matters. He has not appeared in any judicial proceeding. He has simply been asked for an opinion in reference to the rights of two States to the waters of a river which flows through them. The interests of the Commonwealth are not attacked or concerned by the conflict between those two States, and to my mind the Attorney-General is perfectly justified in accepting a retainer from one of them, and if necessary in appearing in court, and arguing upon its behalf. If we are to take up the position that he is not to act for any State, simply because upon some future day the Commonwealth may be concerned in a dispute, we shall make the acceptance of Ministerial office a great bar to men capable of filling the position of Attorney-General. If honorable members accept that doctrine, there is scarcely a transaction in ordinary business in which by a parity of reasoning the Commonwealth may not be affected. For example, an auctioneer, if he were a member of Parliament, might be prevented from giving a valuation of any land, because possibly at some future time that valuation might come before the Commonwealth Government as a basis of purchase. If that doctrine were pressed to its logical conclusion, not only members of the legal profession, but a great many others would be prevented from engaging in any occupation whilst carrying out their parliamentary duties. I think that the attitude taken up by the Attorney-General is the correct one, and that it is entirely within the bounds, not only of legal, but of ordinary propriety. The particular ground of the attack made upon the honorable and learned gentleman is that he has given an opinion regarding the rights of two States. The Commonwealth, at any rate, is not yet concerned in that dispute. How can any honorable member say that he has been guilty of any impropriety in accepting the responsibility of offering an opinion upon that question?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Nobody has suggested that.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Then why has he been attacked? As honorable members are aware, a case as to riparian rights might easily arise, not between two States, but between two individuals. The very same question as would be considered if two States took action would then be debated. Indeed, most of these important cases are decided, not as between States, but as between individuals in two States. If a person in South Australia sought to ascertain what were his rights in connexion with the waters of the Murray, the Attorney-General would be quite justified in accepting a retainer from him, and in appearing in court upon his behalf. That being so, I hold that the honorable and learned gentleman has acted perfectly within his rights. His position is entirely in accord with professional propriety. Possibly honorable members may overlook the fact that under the Constitution lawyers labour under many disabilities. For instance, they are debarred from accepting any brief on behalf of the Commonwealth Government.

Mr. PAGE.—And a good thing, too.

Mr. ROBINSON.—It may be a good thing for those who are suing the Commonwealth, but it deprives the latter of the services of all the lawyers in the Commonwealth Parliament, and they include some of the ablest in Australia. That is a consideration which should not be overlooked.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Constitution also debars mercantile men from contracting with the Government.

Mr. ISAACS.—It does not debar them from contracting with the States Governments.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I should like honorable members to recollect the discussion upon this very question which took place in the House of Commons some years ago. The result of that debate was that the salary of the Attorney-General was raised to £10,000 a year, in addition to which he receives fees upon all Crown briefs. The latter average about £8,000 a year.

Mr. THOMAS.—Does the Attorney-General in England receive a salary of £10,000 a year?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Yes. Altogether his emoluments run into about £18,000. All that has been said upon this question has merely confirmed my belief that the Attorney-General has not done anything for which he can be blamed. I make that statement as one who has a perfect detestation of the honorable and learned gentleman's political methods. Nevertheless, I am bound to say that he has acted in this case with strict propriety, and if he continues to hold a retainer from the South Australian Government, he will be justified in appearing in Court upon its behalf, so long as the case possesses its present complexion. We must rely upon his good sense to relinquish that retainer when he thinks that his duties as counsel will clash with the interests of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS.—Even when I thought that there was any possibility of the two things clashing, I should relinquish it.

Mr. ROBINSON.—If the honorable and learned gentleman does not resign then, we have the power in our own hands to deal with him. I should be one of the loudest in my denunciation of any Attorney-General who accepted a brief in opposition to the interests of the Commonwealth Government.

Mr. MCCAY.—The honorable and learned member will denounce the Attorney-General when the offence has been committed.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I shall not be a party to debar any man—irrespective of whether he be in a large or a small way of business—from obtaining those rewards to which his ability and his merit entitle him. But while I say this in support of the Attorney-General's attitude, there is one matter to which reference has been made, and to which I desire briefly to address myself. I think that during the past few weeks, the Attorney-General has not paid honorable members upon this side of the House that courtesy to which they are entitled. Only the other day, we had a very important discussion upon the Trade Marks Bill. Some very subtle and learned criticisms of that measure were indulged in by the honorable and learned member for Angas, and the honorable and learned member for Corinella—criticisms that we had a right to expect the Minister would have listened to carefully, making notes upon them, and preparing to answer them. The whole of that criticism, however, by gentlemen whose abilities are well known, was delivered in the absence of the Attorney-General. I felt very keenly upon that matter, and I trust that conduct of that sort will not be repeated. If the same thing occurs again I shall assist in whatever steps may be taken to check the practice of which I complain. Upon the main question, however, I see no impropriety in the conduct of the Attorney-General, or in his continuing to act for the South Australian Government until such time as the interests of the Commonwealth may be threatened.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I quite agree with the remarks of the honorable member for North Sydney regarding the attitude of the Government with respect to the Public Service Classification scheme. There is no doubt that a promise was made by previous Administrations that nothing would be done in that matter until an opportunity had been afforded this Chamber of discussing it, and of arriving at a definite decision. We all know that it is open to this Parliament to make any suggestions which it may deem desirable, and we may rest assured that those suggestions will receive consideration at the hands of the Public Service Commissioner. I claim, however, that it is due to the House that the Government should come down with some definite statement regarding their views upon that scheme. So far we have not had any intimation from them as to their attitude upon it. As a rule, I think that the Government should be the leaders of the House. In this connexion I was very much surprised at the action of the Treasurer last night. In the course of his Budget deliverance, when speaking of quite a number of matters, he failed to intimate the opinions of the Government upon them, and when pressed for those opinions, he replied that the Cabinet had not had an opportunity of considering the matters referred to.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What were the questions to which the honorable member alludes?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I shall deal with them when the Financial Statement is under discussion. The Government appear to be waiting till they can ascertain what are the views of honorable members before committing themselves to any definite opinions.

Mr. FISHER.—What are the questions to which the honorable member refers?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Public Service classification scheme is one. Then I understand that the Treasurer entertains a certain opinion in regard to the Braddon section of the Constitution. Upon important questions like these we should be told what is the attitude of the Government.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There are a good many years to run yet. It will be five years before the Braddon section expires.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The time is rapidly approaching when it will be necessary for us to take some steps in that matter, especially in view of the small surplus in excess of the three-fourths of the Customs and Excise revenue which will be returnable to the States during the current year. As a matter of fact, that amount will be practically absorbed by interest upon the transferred properties, and by the establishment of a sinking fund. I think that the Government should submit some policy to the House upon matters of this sort.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why did not the Government, of which the honorable member was a member, submit a policy last year?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Through the treachery of my right honorable friend and a few others we were denied an opportunity of so doing. We came into office when most of the money provided for on the Estimates had been spent.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—And the appeals against the classification had not been heard.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That is so. Since then the present Government have had an opportunity to consider the report of the Commissioner. The Treasurer knows that he hardly expressed a definite opinion on any one subject with which he dealt in his Budget statement. I have no hesitation in saying that the late Government would have clearly intimated its intention with regard to the Public Service Classification if it had had an opportunity to do so. These are matters, however, with which I shall deal more fully at a later stage. I am surprised that the Attorney-General should have intimated his determination to continue to advise the Government of South Australia in matters affecting the other States. No one could have taken exception to his holding a retainer for the South Australian Government as a private member, but there is great danger of the interests of the Commonwealth being neglected when its chief law officer acts as adviser to a State on a question that may ultimately affect the powers of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS.—How could the powers of the Commonwealth be affected by this case?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That has been fully explained.

Mr. ISAACS.—No one has yet explained it.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—When an honorable member has made up his mind in regard to any matter, it is difficult to bring forward any facts calculated to induce him to take up a different attitude. The honorable member for North Sydney agreed that the Attorney-General had acted rightly up to a certain point, but that his determination to continue to advise the Government of South Australia in certain questions was unwise, as it might result unfairly to the Commonwealth. I indorse that view. I wish it to be clearly understood that in speaking in this way I am not influenced by any party spirit. The fact that we do not regard the matter from that stand-point is shown by the readiness with which some members of the Opposition have expressed their concurrence with the attitude of the Attorney-General.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The legal members of the Opposition.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Quite so. Although the Attorney-General has merely accepted a retainer to advise the Government of South Australia on certain questions, the acceptance of that retainer may lead to his holding a brief for that State.

Mr. ISAACS.—Not in any matter affecting Commonwealth interests.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Attorney-General might advise the State on certain matters, and his advice might be eventually used against the Commonwealth. He ought to keep himself free from complications of this kind. The honorable and learned gentleman has said that if at any time he found that his acceptance of a retainer from the Government of South Australia imperilled the rights of the Commonwealth he would at once give up that retainer. But it might then be too late for him to withdraw. Proceedings might subsequently be taken by the State, on advice tendered by him, with very serious results to the Commonwealth. When I was a member of the State Legislature of New South Wales, two members of the then Government accepted a brief against the Crown, and the Parliament did not hesitate, notwithstanding that the Government of the day had a majority, to pass a resolution condemning their action. The result was that those members had to retire from office.

Mr. CHANTER.—Was not that a very different case from the one under notice?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I admit that it was, and have referred to it only to show that there is a danger of a time arising when the Attorney-General may find himself in almost the same position that those members of the State Parliament occupied. As trustees of the people, we are expected to keep ourselves free from anything that may conflict with our duties to the Commonwealth. I do not take exception to an honorable member acting for a State while he is not in office, but as soon as he takes office the position is different.

Mr. PAGE.—The Commonwealth is not involved in the case with which the Attorney-General is connected.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The rights of the Commonwealth may become involved at any time. There is a great deal of feeling between the Governments of South Australia, Victoria, and New South Wales relative to the waters of the Murray and the uses to which they may be put. The Attorney-General's own constituents are anxious that the rights of Victorians living near the banks of the Murray should be preserved, and yet the honorable member for Maranoa would allow him to continue to advise the South Australian Government, and eventually perhaps to accept a brief on behalf of that State in a case that might give rise to Commonwealth issues and result in great injury to the other States. I hope that even at this late stage the Attorney-General will withdraw from the position he has taken up. I express the hope with no feeling of hostility towards him. I have always held strong views on this question, and took a prominent part in the debate in the New South Wales Parliament relative to the case to which reference has been made.

Mr. THOMAS.—Why did not the honorable member call upon the late Attorney-General to return his retainer?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I was not responsible for his action, and should like to hear what he has to say with regard to the matter. I first heard of this case last evening, when the honorable member for Parramatta showed me a newspaper paragraph dealing with it. I do not for one moment impugn the honesty of the Attorney-General, but hold that he should withdraw from the case.

Mr. THOMAS.—Why did not the honorable member deal in this way with his late colleague?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He could not. What could he have done against his colleague?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I was not aware at the time that he held a retainer from the South Australian Government. The Treasurer says that I could have done nothing against a colleague. It was no doubt a feeling of that kind that led him to remain a member of a former Administration, although, as he has told us, he had to eat a lot of dirt.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I never said anything of the kind, and the honorable member ought to withdraw the statement.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I accept my right honorable friend's denial, but I know that he ate a lot of dirt while in office on a previous occasion.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I could never eat as much as the honorable member has done if I lived a hundred years.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have been twenty-four years in public life—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Eating dirt all the time.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I defy the honorable member to point to any case in which I acted improperly.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member has been grovelling all the time.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! These interruptions must cease. I also appeal to honorable members to restrain their hilarity as far as possible, as it is difficult for the honorable member for Macquarie to proceed.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have been in public life for twenty-four years, and no one can say that there is a mark against me.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I defy the right honorable member to point to any act of mine during my public career that reflects in any way upon me.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—And so with me.

Mr. THOMAS.—Will the honorable member for Macquarie—

The CHAIRMAN.—Will the honorable member for Barrier be good enough to observe the request I have just made? I must also ask the honorable member for Macquarie to address himself to the question before the Chair.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am not going to allow any honorable member to impugn my honesty. The Treasurer must not think that he is in the Parliament of Western Australia. When he was a member of that Legislature he used to tell honorable members that if they did not do what he desired they would be thrown out of Parliament.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If we had the honorable member in Western Australia we should make him "sit up."

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I think that the people of Western Australia will make my right honorable friend "sit up" when next he goes before them.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the honorable member throws stones at me he must expect me to throw some at him.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The fact that I have always been returned by large majorities, and that no one has been able to say anything against my character, enables me to hurl the insinuation back at the right honorable gentleman. I shall have something to say with regard to him when the debate on his Financial Statement is continued, and I shall postpone any further criticism I may have to offer until then. I only regret that the Minister lost his temper.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If I did so, it was the honorable member's fault.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Let the Treasurer alone; he now has to obey the caucus.

Mr. THOMAS.—As the honorable member for Parramatta used to do.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Honorable members in the Ministerial corner are very ready to gird at the honorable member for Parramatta. I have had a long association with him, and I have found that at all times he has had the full courage of his opinions, even to the point of objecting to sign the labour pledge in New South Wales. The respect in which the honorable member is held by the working classes is shown by the fact that he represents Lithgow, one of the strongest labour centres in New South Wales. It must be admitted that those with whom I have been associated in politics have done as much as have the members of the Labour Party for the working classes of New South Wales. We differ from members of the Labour Party as to methods, but we are as anxious as they are to further the interests of the people whom we represent. I rose for the purpose of entering my protest against the action of the Attorney-General in continuing to act as counsel for the South Australian Government. I believe that the Minister would best serve his own interests and those of the Commonwealth if he determined to give it the benefit of his best abilities. The Murray River question seriously affects the interests of New South Wales and Victoria, as well as those of South Australia, and the Attorney-General should undoubtedly keep himself entirely free from all connexion with any particular State, in order that he may give the Commonwealth the very best advice upon this important matter.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—Some hours have elapsed since I moved my amendment, but the delay that has occurred may fairly be attributed to the absence from the Chamber of the Attorney-General during the early stages of the debate.

Mr. ISAACS.—I have been here for some hours, and yet the discussion has not closed.

Mr. WILKS.—That is because the Attorney-General was not only discourteous to his own leader, but, when he did attend here, flouted the House.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is not correct.

Mr. WILKS.—The Prime Minister informed us that he had telephoned to the Attorney-General, and that he expected him to reach the House very soon, but several hours elapsed before his appearance.

Mr. MAUGER.—On a point of order, I desire to know whether it is in order for an honorable member to indulge in vain repetitions. The statement now being made by the honorable member for Dalley has been repeated over and over again.

The CHAIRMAN.—Tedious repetitions are undoubtedly out of order, but I cannot say that the honorable member for Dalley has been guilty in that respect since he has risen on this occasion.

Mr. WILKS.—I am not in the habit of repeating my statements, and I can only attribute the interposition of the honorable member for Melbourne Ports to the influence of his romantic imagination. The debate has been distinguished by one or two striking features. Every honorable and learned member, except the honorable and learned member for Illawarra, has supported the position taken up by the Attorney-General, whereas, with one exception, every lay member of the House has condemned it. The question as to the position of the Attorney-General has not been raised as the result of any concerted action on the part of the Opposition. That has been definitely shown by the divergencies of opinion amongst its members. By introducing this matter, the honorable member for Parramatta has performed a most valuable service to the Commonwealth, because it is important that we should adhere strictly to constitutional practice and procedure, and that the purity and proprieties of public life should be maintained in this Parliament as in the British Parliament. In England, the Attorney-General has not even a seat in the Cabinet, but is expected to act as the legal adviser of the Crown and the public of England. The Attorney-General of the Commonwealth should occupy a similar position. The honorable member for North Sydney showed that there was great probability of the interests of the State of South Australia and those of the Commonwealth overlapping in connexion with the Murray waters question, and urged that the Commonwealth should not be deprived of the advantage of an absolutely unbiased opinion from its principal legal adviser. It seems to me that the Attorney-General cannot, in justice to himself or the Commonwealth, retain his present position. It is important that we should preserve the purity of Government, and insure the proper conduct of public business. The Attorney-General has stated that if anything wrong occurred he would retire from his present position as counsel for the South Australian Government.

Mr. ISAACS.—I did not say that. What I said was that if there was any possibility of Commonwealth interests being affected, I would retire at once.

Mr. WILKS.—That amounts to an admission of the possibility of Commonwealth and State interests overlapping, and, surely it is important that the Attorney-General should be perfectly free to act in the best interests of the Commonwealth. If Senator Sir Josiah Symon was knowingly permitted to occupy a position similar to that now filled by the present Attorney-General, honorable members then in Opposition were to blame. It has been pointed out by the honorable member for Wannon that the Constitution precludes members of the legal profession, who are also members of this Parliament, from accepting briefs for the Commonwealth. There must have been some strong reason for inserting that provision, and equally strong arguments can be advanced in favour of prohibiting members of Parliament, and especially Ministers, from accepting briefs on behalf of those who are taking action against the Commonwealth. The Attorney-General holds a high and distinguished position at the Bar, but he also occupies a high and distinguished position in this House, and I would ask him which position he respects the more?

Mr. ISAACS.—I respect both.

Mr. WILKS.—The Attorney-General must respect one position more than the other, and I take it that his greater respect is due to the position he holds here.

Mr. ISAACS.—I agree to that.

Mr. WILKS.—To my mind, there is imminent danger of a conflict between the public and private duties of the Minister. In moving the reduction of the Estimates by £1, I am merely imitating the action of the honorable and learned member for Indi some months ago, when he moved a reduction of 1s., so I am going 19s. better. I intend to force a division on the amendment. Those who are indorsing the action of the Attorney-General seem to look upon this as a mere party attack, whereas what we are contending for is the proper observance of right constitutional principles. The amendment is a protest against the action of the Attorney-General in continuing to hold a retainer for the South Australian Government. What he did anterior to his acceptance of office is no concern of mine.

Mr. WATKINS.—The honorable member moved the amendment before he heard the statement of the Attorney-General.

Mr. WILKS.—I moved it after I had heard the statement of the Prime Minister, and the speech of the Attorney-General gave me no reason for withdrawing it. Throughout the debate, we have been met with hostile interjections from the labour corner, but the honorable member for Darwin is the only member of the Labour Party who has addressed the Committee against the course which I am taking. The honorable member for Melbourne condemned the action of the Minister, and advocated the election of Ministers. He said that he was in accord with the honorable member for Parramatta.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member is mistaken.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member for Melbourne said that he would support the action of the Attorney-General while the present system lasted.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He invited me to move a motion.

Mr. WILKS.—He probably thought that he could not vote for the amendment, as it was a party one, but he is prepared to vote in condemnation of the action of the Attorney-General on a definite motion. I do not think that the deputy leader of the Labour Party has grasped the importance of the position.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member for North Sydney said that he would not vote for the amendment.

Mr. WILKS.—That shows that the Opposition are not governed by cast-iron rules, and that the amendment was not prompted by party motives. The members of the Labour Party will shortly have reason to seriously regret their action if they vote against the amendment.

Mr. CHANTER (Riverina).—I should not have risen had it not been for what fell from the honorable member for Macquarie, in regard to the rights of my constituents in respect to the River Murray. As I understand the position, it is this: A dispute has arisen between the States of South Australia and Victoria as to the right of Victoria to divert a certain volume of water from the Goulburn River. There is no probability of any conflict with the Commonwealth Government. The honorable and learned member for Werriwa quoted section 100 of the Constitution in support of this statement, but sections 99 and 101 also deal with the powers of the Commonwealth in this connexion. The Commonwealth may deal only with the navigability of rivers, which is to be controlled by a body—the Inter-State Commission—which has not yet been called into existence. The Attorney-General has been asked by the State of South Australia to give a legal opinion as to the rights of that State—not with the object of coming into conflict with the Commonwealth, but so that it may ascertain from the High Court of Australia what its position really is. I will read the sections of the Constitution to which I have referred, to show that there is no probability of any opinion given by the Attorney-General to the State of South Australia affecting at any time, in the slightest degree, the interests of the Commonwealth. Section 99 says—

The Commonwealth shall not, by any law or regulation of trade, commerce, or revenue, give preference to one State, or any part thereof, over another State, or any part thereof.

The Commonwealth has not enacted any such law or regulation, and there is at present no intention to introduce legislation of that kind. Section 100 says—

The Commonwealth shall not, by any law or regulation of trade or commerce, abridge the right of a State or of the residents therein to the reasonable use of the waters of rivers for conservation or irrigation.

The Commonwealth has made no attempt, and is making no attempt, to interfere in this direction. As I have stated in my constituency, and my electors are in agreement with me in regard to the matter, the true solution of the difficulty lies in the taking of power by the Commonwealth to deal with the whole question.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Commonwealth cannot do that, so far as the diversion of water is concerned, without the consent of the States.

Mr. CHANTER.—The Commonwealth has power over the water, but not over the banks. No doubt the work of his office demands as much time as the Attorney-General can give to it; but if he is to be denied the right to practice his profession, the same rule should apply to every member. In this matter there is, in my opinion, no difference between a member who does not happen to be a Minister, and one who is a Minister. It is very strange that, although the late Attorney-General received a similar retainer some months ago, we did not hear a word about the matter from the members of the Opposition until the present occasion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We did not know of it. I cannot find any one on this side who knew of it.

Mr. CHANTER.—The circumstances seem very peculiar; but I do not wish to engender any more heat. I cannot see the probability of the action of the Attorney-General in this matter conflicting with the interests of the Commonwealth. If I did, I should say that he should retire from office; but, under the circumstances, he is the best judge of his own conduct.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He is the servant of Parliament.

Mr. CHANTER.—Yes; but while there may be a conflict as to their rights between the States of South Australia, New South Wales, and Victoria, I do not see how it can affect the Commonwealth. I hope that the debate will shortly close, so that we may get on with business.

Mr. LIDDELL (Hunter).—I knew nothing about this matter until I entered the Chamber to-day; but having listened carefully to the opinions expressed, I have formed an opinion of my own, to which I now think it my duty to give utterance. I know nothing about the particulars of the dispute in question, and wish to sweep away all legal technicalities. In my opinion, there are too many lawyers in the House, and too few medical men. Lawyers look at questions from a point of view which differs from that of laymen, and by their subtle arguments, are apt to confuse those who have not studied law. I have endeavoured to look at this matter from the point of view of a layman. I gather that there is a dispute between two of the States, and that the Attorney-General—a gentleman of great eminence in his profession, with a reputation for legal learning second to none—has been retained by one of them; but, inasmuch as he is paid an exceedingly handsome fee to advise the Commonwealth on legal matters, I think that he should act for the Commonwealth alone, and not for any State. I regret that the average member receives by way of remuneration what is no more than a pittance—£400 a year. But a Minister of the Crown receives the handsome sum of £2,000 per annum. I do not consider that that sum constitutes merely a reimbursement to him, as does the smaller amount, which is received by a private member.

Mr. ISAACS.—The amount mentioned by the honorable member is a little more than a Minister gets.

Mr. LIDDELL.—It is not more than he deserves. A Minister should regard his salary as a payment for his services, and when he accepts office—whatever his position in life—he should be prepared to devote the whole of his time and energies to the service of the Commonwealth. I regret that, under existing conditions, many of the representatives of other States, who are poor men, are obliged to abandon their means of livelihood, because they have to reside in Melbourne during the parliamentary session, whereas the Victorian representatives are able to carry on their ordinary vocations. I merely desire to point out to the Attorney-General that, as he is retained by the Commonwealth his first duty is to the Commonwealth. In the action that he has taken he is establishing a precedent which will be quoted in the years to come. This amendment will be pressed to a division. Of course the Attorney-General will be supported by the members of the Labour Party, who realize that if the division went against the Ministry they would be compelled to face their constituents. It is a singular fact that all through this debate members of the Labour Party have practically remained dumb. Only one or two of them have had the courage to express their opinions, notwithstanding that throughout the length and breadth of the country this discussion is being watched with the keenest interest. I hold that the Attorney-General, like Cæsar's wife, should be above suspicion, and if only two, three, or four members vote for the amendment, I trust that he will retire from his position as legal adviser to the South Australian Government.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moira).—Honorable members opposite seem to experience some feelings of annoyance because those sitting upon this side of the Chamber have not regarded the question that has been raised very seriously. The charge levelled against the Attorney-General is simply a reflection upon their own intelligence and "up-to-dateness," because full publicity was given to this matter in the press some three months ago. At that time paragraphs appeared in the Melbourne newspapers mentioning the names of the counsel who had been retained on behalf of South Australia in this particular case.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Was not Parliament in recess at that time?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Parliament was not in recess when the late Government were turned out of office. It was prior to that time that the announcement appeared in the public press, and it is a singular circumstance that members of the Opposition only discovered the facts of the case to-day. I am of the same opinion now as I was when I first read the statement in the newspapers concerning the position occupied by the present Attorney-General and his predecessor in office. I see nothing wrong in their acceptance of a retainer to advise the representatives of a State in regard to its claims upon another State. The same conflict of opinion might arise in respect of the riparian rights of a private individual. I regard the exhibition which has been indulged in this afternoon merely as a waste of time that has been promoted for party purposes. That is my candid opinion.

Mr. WILSON.—Then the honorable member agrees with the Attorney-General.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yes. It is strange that not one legal member upon the opposite side of the Chamber is to be found supporting the action of the deputy leader of the Opposition. Of course, the honorable member for Robertson is prepared to discount all their opinions, but upon constitutional questions, to whom must we look for light and leading? Undoubtedly, to the legal members of the House. As I understand it, the position is that a question has arisen between South Australia and Victoria regarding an alleged improper diversion by the latter State of water from the river-bed of the Murray. South Australia has objected to that diversion, and has sought legal opinion as to the rights of the Victorian Government under its Constitution. It may be that the rights of New South Wales will also come under consideration. As I understand the situation, there is no possibility of the interests of the Commonwealth being involved in the diversion of those waters, except so far as the navigability of the river is concerned, and that question has not arisen up to the present time.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Does not the Constitution say something about the "reasonable use" of the waters?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yes. The rights of the States, or of individuals must not be abrogated for irrigation purposes, except so far as the "reasonable" use of the waters is concerned. The language is necessarily vague.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That is where the trouble comes in.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But that trouble has not arisen. It is a disadvantage to all the States that up to the present time they have not come into line upon this particular question. Although various attempts have been made to bring them into line by placing the water for irrigation purposes under the control of the Commonwealth Government, no finality has been reached. The position is that South Australia has eventually decided to resort to the Courts to determine once and for all what are her rights in respect to the waters of the Murray. Until that judgment has been obtained, there can be no possibility of Commonwealth interests being concerned. Until there is a conflict of interests between the States and the Commonwealth I see no justification for any charge being levelled against the Attorney-General for accepting a retainer for his advice. It would be equally just to level a charge against him for accepting a retainer from an individual whose riparian rights were concerned. There is not the remotest probability of any Commonwealth interest being threatened whilst this question is under consideration. Consequently I have no sympathy with the charges which have been directed against the Attorney-General, and I regard the present debate as a pure waste of time which has been prompted only by party considerations.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I wish to say one or two words before the Committee goes to a vote upon this question. Honorable members have been talking all round it to-night, and particularly the legal members who take sides with the Attorney-General. Nobody has made any charge against the honorable and learned gentleman.

Mr. ISAACS.—This motion is intended as a vote of censure upon me.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—My position is that if the honorable and learned member had not stated to-night that he intended to accept a further retainer from the South Australian Government, I should have taken no steps whatever in the direction of pressing this amendment to a division. But since he has declared his intention to accept a further retainer from the State of South Australia, I presume that he is at liberty to accept one from any State in the Commonwealth. The matter therefore becomes a very serious one, and I will show why. Honorable members will recollect that some time ago this question was raised in the House by the honorable member for North Sydney in connexion with the scheme which is being carried out at Waranga Basin. He put some questions to the then Minister of Home Affairs relating to the very matter which we are now debating.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Who was the Minister of Home Affairs at the time?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Hume. The first question reads as follows—

Mr. ISAACS.—What is the reference?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The question is to be found upon page 16060 of Hansard for 1902. The first question reads—

Whether in the preservation of navigation it is not the right and the duty of the Commonwealth to inquire into and approve or oppose, as inquiry may justify, State enterprises for the storage or abstraction of the waters of navigable rivers or their affluents?

In reply, the Minister said—

I believe it is the constitutional right, and it the navigability was to be interfered with it is the duty.

Then in answer to a second question, the Minister said—

There is no necessity for inquiry unless it is apparent that the effect in No. 1 question will be produced.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is exactly the position which I have been putting.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It was laid down by the Minister who answered these questions, that it was possible that circumstances might arise in connexion with these States schemes which would justify the Government in making inquiries upon their own account, and possibly opposing or approving any of the schemes. That is the whole case I have to put against the Attorney-General. In the very scheme now under discussion, as between the States there may come a point, and that speedily, at which the navigability of the river may be interfered with, and then, according to the dictum already given by this Government, it will be the obligation of the Attorney-General to interfere, and either to approve or oppose that scheme. I hold that the Attorney-General, if he accepts fees from one of these contending parties, cannot be in a position of absolute independence to take action on behalf of the Commonwealth, and in defence of its rights. That is the whole case. No one wishes to make any charge against the Attorney-General. My sole object is to prevent any such scandals arising as have already occurred in the history of Australia. It will be too late when this conflict of opinion does arise for the Attorney-General to shape his course. He would then be in this position: that he had taken a fee from and consented to be retained by the South Australian Government, and had acted for them right up to the point at which it was sought to give effect to the object for which that retainer had been given. Then, when the State was on the point of taking the action in respect of which they had retained him, he would leave them in the lurch. From the purely personal point of view that is a position from which the honorable member ought, if possible, to escape. If he accepts retainers from the States and acts for them until proceedings in the Court become necessary, he incurs a moral obligation to stand by them, after taking their hard cash.

Mr. FISHER. — The honorable member ought to ask the lawyers about that moral obligation.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No doubt they would express a different opinion. The Attorney-General will probably say, in reply, that he has been retained only to give an opinion. We have to remember, however, that the action of the State of South Australia may be shaped on that opinion—that the action taken upon that opinion may be one that will bring the States into conflict with the Federal Government.

Mr. KELLY.—For what reason is the State seeking the opinion of counsel?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—As the honorable member reminds me, the very opinion itself may give rise to an action between the States, which may lead to the Commonwealth Government coming into the issue at any time. In order to escape from that position the Attorney-General ought not to accept retainers from the States. He cannot be in an independent position, so far as the Commonwealth is concerned, so long as he is in the power and the pay of the Governments of the States.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi—Attorney-General).—I have listened for a good many hours—

Mr. WILKS.—For an hour and a half.

Mr. ISAACS.—It seemed like a week and a half, especially when the honorable member was speaking. But I have listened for hours to observations by a very few honorable members in opposition to the views I expressed this afternoon. There is one matter that is very evident. It is a perfectly hollow pretence for honorable members to assert that had I been here at an earlier stage the discussion on this question would have been concluded long ago. I have been in the Chamber for hours, and the matter is still under discussion. It is a mere pretence for honorable members opposite, who are responsible for the waste of public time that has taken place, to hold up as an excuse for this prolonged discussion the fact that I was not here this afternoon when the question was first raised. This is an attempted vote of censure on myself, and so strongly do I feel that that is so, that I shall not vote upon the question. It is also an attempt to injure the Government to which I belong, although I have to express my indebtedness to most honorable members opposite who have spoken—I cannot say this of all—in that no element of personal feeling has been introduced by them. I wish to acknowledge that fact. The matter has been put very fairly indeed—although erroneously, I think—by most honorable members who have challenged my position. I make that statement with unaffected sincerity. Some honorable members, like the honorable member for North Sydney, have spoken more than fairly—they have spoken generously; but I do not wish to take shelter behind any good feeling that has been exhibited or any sentiments of personal regard for myself. I desire to deal with this question on its merits. It is the duty of every public man to be prepared to meet any such challenge as this; but the honorable member for Parramatta, who admits that he learnt of this matter last Friday, would have acted more fairly towards me if he had drawn my attention to his complaint at an earlier date, so that I might have been in my place to-day when the question was raised. As a matter of fact, I did not hear a word about it until 2.35 this afternoon, when I could not possibly leave the Court in which I was engaged. I wish to say that my constituents and my colleagues know full well that I am not in a position to give up the whole of my practice at the Bar. I cannot do it. When we hear of the Attorney-General of the United Kingdom refusing to engage in private practice, we ought not to forget that he receives many thousands a year in fees, in addition to his salary, as compensation for that sacrifice.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—£10,000 a year.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Commonwealth cannot afford to make any such allowance, and I cannot afford to give up the whole of my private practice. Honorable members must not think for one moment that I do not lose a very great deal in consequence of the demands which my public duties make upon me. I give up much of my practice, but cannot sacrifice the whole of it. I wish honorable members to understand that I should lose the whole of my practice if it were thought that I could spend only half the day in Court. I think honorable members will bear me out when I say that I have not failed to do a very fair share of the work of this Parliament since I have been a member of the Government.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS.—It is not only when the House is sitting that I am attending to my parliamentary duties; honorable members have evidence before them that I devote a considerable portion of my time to the work of the House when I am outside of it. It is fair to me, and to those who send me here, that I should make this statement. If I am not present at the opening of the House, it does not follow that I am neglecting the work of the Parliament. I was not present the other day when the honorable and learned member for Corinella and the honorable and learned member for Angas spoke. My absence was not due to any disrespect to them, and I may say at once that I have carefully scanned their observations, and that they will have my best attention. Honorable members must understand that it is out of no disrespect to this Chamber that I am not always present at the opening of the House. Coming to the question immediately before us, I wish to say that if I have taken up an improper position, honorable members will at once be able to show that that is their opinion. If it be a right position, I can have no justification for refusing to give my advice and opinion to the Government of South Australia unless I can offer them some fair, recognised reason for that refusal. But if my position in regard to that State were to bring me ever so slightly, or by any possibility, into conflict with my duty as Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, the State of South Australia would have to stand aside so far as I was concerned.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—And so with Victoria.

Mr. ISAACS. — Exactly. Honorable members will recognise that it must be a strong feeling of duty that impels me to accept a retainer from South Australia in a case against Victoria, the State to which I belong. The position occupied by counsel at the Bar is a public one. He must not pick and choose his clients. When a client offers him a retainer, unless he has some fair and justifiable reason for refusing it, he is bound to give him his assistance as well as he can. In these circumstances, I was compelled to accept the retainer of the South Australian Government, and unless, as I say, the paramount duty that I owe to the Commonwealth is imperilled, or may be imperilled—I shall go as far as that—I have no right to reject that retainer, and do not intend to do so.

Mr. CONROY.—The reason for that is a very good one; it is to prevent men being prejudiced by the refusal of counsel to take up their cases.

Mr. ISAACS.—Certainly. With regard to the position of the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, I wish to repeat that if at any moment it appears to me possible that a question may bring me into conflict with my duty as Attorney-General, or if at any moment it appears to me possible that my opinions in the future, which I am bound to tender to the Government of the Commonwealth, may be affected by anything I do with regard to the South Australian, or any other case, my duty as Attorney-General must prevail, and everything else will have to go. That position has not arisen, and so far as I can see, cannot arise. The very quotation which the honorable member for Parramatta read a few moments ago justifies me more than anything else which has been said in the course of this debate. On the 24th September, 1902, the honorable member for North Sydney put a question to the Minister of Home Affairs with regard to irrigation works. The question to which the honorable member for Hume, who was then Minister of Home Affairs, had to reply was—

Whether, in the preservation of navigation—

That is the whole key-note—

it is not the right and the duty of the Commonwealth to inquire into, and approve or oppose, as inquiry may justify, State enterprises for the storage or abstraction of the waters of navigable rivers or their affluents?

The whole point hinges on what is "the preservation of navigation." The answer made by the Minister was—

I believe it is the constitutional right, and if the navigability was to be interfered with, it is the duty.

Then in the second answer he said—

There is no necessity for inquiry, unless it is apparent that the effect in No. 1 question will be produced.

That effect is an interference with navigation. That is the point that I have been seeking to put before the House. The question between South Australia and Victoria and New South Wales does not relate to navigation.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Navigation may be involved.

Mr. ISAACS.—It can never be involved as between those States. When I was a member of the Convention—and this can be proved by reference to Hansard—I made a very lengthy speech in the interests of New South Wales as a State having rights over the river, insisting upon its rights to the use of its waters for conservation and irrigation, and for the development of the continent. I believe that largely through my efforts on that occasion, section 100, conceding the reasonable rights of the States in this respect, was inserted in the Constitution. I am not forgetful of all that, but the question between South Australia and the other States is, "What are the relative rights of the various States? Outside the Commonwealth rights and powers, what are the relative rights of the States as between themselves, considering them to be individuals"? No decision on that point, so far as I can see, can possibly affect the paramount right of the Commonwealth as to navigability. There is no subtlety about that. It is a plain, straightforward position. I desire to say that when the honorable member for Parramatta moved a vote of censure to-day without giving me any fair warning—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I moved no vote of censure.

Mr. ISAACS.—Some honorable member did, and the honorable member for Parramatta supported it more vigorously than did any one else.

Mr. WILKS.—The Government whip knew what we intended to do at 1 o'clock to-day, and was asked to communicate with the Attorney-General.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am not in a position to know anything about that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He knew as soon as we did.

Mr. ISAACS.—Although this is a vote of censure against me, I heard an observation which fell from the honorable member for Hunter to-night, that seemed to me to be more serious even than any observations made regarding myself. I am happy to say that no impeachment of my honour has been made here, but there was an impeachment of the honour of the Labour Party to-night on the part of the honorable member for Hunter, which I was very sorry to hear.

Mr. PAGE.—What did he say?

Mr. ISAACS.—He said that the Labour Party would vote in favour of the amendment if they were not afraid of a dissolution.

Mr. LIDDELL.—So they would.

Mr. ISAACS.—I want to say that I hope no vote will be cast for me on that ground. I trust that if there is any vote to be cast for me, it will be free from any such overwhelming and dishonorable considerations.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The vote will be cast not for the Minister, but against us.

Mr. FISHER.—It will be cast on the lines of common sense.

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not propose to make any observations with regard to that. I am in the hands of the House. I have tried to do what I think is right, and I have put my position clearly and fairly before honorable members, and it is for them to act as they think proper.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—The Attorney-General has accused me of not having given him fair notice of my intention to follow the course adopted to-day. When I came to the House I had no idea of raising this question in connexion with the Supply Bill. That did not occur to me until nearly midday. Even when I came to the conclusion that that would be the proper course to adopt, I did not anticipate that the whole evening would be taken up in a debate of this kind. I thought that the Attorney-General would be here, that I would state the case from my point of view, that he would reply, and that there the matter would end.

Mr. ISAACS.—A question upon the notice-paper would have obtained all the information necessary.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not think so. I think that we are obtaining information as the discussion proceeds. We have not yet derived as much information as we should have done. The moment that I decided to raise this question, I asked the honorable member for Dalley to see the honorable member for Bourke, the Government whip, and request him to ring up the Attorney-General at once and let him know that it was likely that the matter would be mentioned in the House. Those are the whole facts of the case. Had I decided at an earlier stage to raise the matter, I should certainly have given the Attorney-General notice instanter.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The honorable member's statement is perfectly true, but I was unable to find the Attorney-General.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Attorney-General has spoken again to-night with regard to the waste of time that goes on in this House.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Some honorable members are, no doubt, entitled to approvingly say "hear, hear"; but it does not lie in the mouth of the Attorney-General, who is hardly ever in the Chamber, to make any remarks upon that subject. He comes here from the Law Courts, and begins to lecture the House as to how it should go on with the business. Whoever may have a right to speak in that way, it is not the Minister, who is here so infrequently. The moment he enters the House he sets up like a school-master, and begins to talk to honorable members as if they were children, asking them to do "men's work." It strikes me that he is himself doing three or four men's work, and is, therefore, not a good judge of a fair day's work for one man. I commend the Attorney-General's position in that respect to members of the Labour Party, who so strongly advocate a fair proportion of work for every individual in the community. The Attorney-General stated that if he found that his Federal duty as Attorney-General conflicted with his private duty, that instant he would terminate his connexion with the State of South Australia. But I would point out that this is a matter that should not be left to the sense of honour of the Attorney-General. It is a question for the House to determine. The Attorney-General is the servant of Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member has said that for the fourth time.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I shall say it for the fifth time, if I think fit. I would advise the Attorney-General to be a little less impertinent. He has done nothing but insult honorable members on this side of the House, and myself in particular. I care nothing for his insults. I believe that I am doing my public duty, and all the honorable and learned gentleman's insults will not deter me from pursuing the course that I regard as right. The Attorney-General is not to be the judge in this matter.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is why I am not going to vote.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is not sufficient for the Attorney-General to say that he will retire from the position he now occupies if he finds that a conflict of interests is likely to occur. We know that he is a perfect martyr to duty. He has said that he could not, under any circumstances, refuse to perform his patriotic duty to South Australia; but I venture to say that if he did not perform that duty, there are plenty of other lawyers in the Commonwealth not bound by the same limitations and obligations, who, somehow or other, would be able to get through with the work. However, that is a purely personal phase of the matter into which I do not wish to enter. I shall leave the matter in the hands of the House, after repeating that it is not fair to the Commonwealth for a Minister to be in the pay of the Commonwealth Government and also in the pay of a State Government in connexion with matters which may at any time bring the State and the Commonwealth into conflict.

Mr. LIDDELL (Hunter).—The Attorney-General has done me the honour to take exception to one of my remarks, and I appeal to him to be guided in this matter entirely by his own conscience, and not by the numerical value of the votes that may be cast in the division which is about to take place. I repeat that the Labour and Socialistic Party dare not vote according to their consciences on this question. The Attorney-General may be attracted by shekels, but they are bound by the shackles they themselves have forged—the shackles that they are endeavouring by legislation to forge upon the Commonwealth. I say that they dare not at the present juncture of affairs give any vote that would be inimical to the Government.

Mr. MAUGER.—I rise to a point of order. Is it in order for any honorable member to say that any section of honorable members in this House are not in a position to vote according to the dictates of their consciences?

The CHAIRMAN.—I do not think it is in order to use any expression from which it could be inferred that an honorable member dare not vote in accordance with his conscience.

Mr. LIDDELL.—If I have said anything I should not have uttered I apologize and withdraw. I cannot, however, help giving expression to my feelings, and I repeat that the Labour Party cannot afford at this juncture to give a vote which would be inimical to the Government which they support. When they first entered this Parliament they maintained that they would hold the balance of power, and cast out of office any Government that did not obey what they were pleased to call the will of the people.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—Honorable members are very much mistaken if they think that I am going to work myself into a flurry or a temper owing to what the honorable member for Hunter has said. The members of the Labour Party do not vote according to their consciences, but according to their judgment. Some honorable members have convenient consciences, which allow them to do anything or say anything, whilst their judgment remains dormant. So far as I am personally concerned, I have not held any conversation with any members of the party with regard to the matter under discussion. No consultations have been held, and members are free to vote as they please. The best evidence of the strength of the position occupied by the Attorney-General has been afforded by honorable members opposite. The honorable member for Werriwa and the honorable member for North Sydney—one of the ablest members of the Opposition—support the Attorney-General.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No; the honorable member for North Sydney opposes the Attorney-General.

Mr. ISAACS.—He admits that there is nothing wrong.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member for North Sydney stated that he would not vote for the amendment.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But he said distinctly that he thought the Attorney-General ought not to accept any more retainers.

Mr. FISHER.—He said most clearly that he thought it would be an error of judgment on the part of the Attorney-General if he renewed his retainer; but he did not consider that he had gone further than he was justified in doing, if his own judgment was in opposition to that of the honorable member. So far as I know, a number of members of the Opposition are opposed to the action taken by the most militant spirits of that party, and I judge from present appearances that probably not more than half of the members of the Opposition will support the amendment. As a matter of fact, an amendment of this kind becomes a vote of censure, and I would ask whether it is necessary to take such action in order to bring a question of this character to an issue.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We never thought of such a thing as a motion of want of confidence.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member knows that that is what is meant by the action taken on this occasion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It only means that because the Attorney-General so regards it at this last moment.

Mr. FISHER.—Honorable members bait a Minister, and then if he will not do exactly what they want they direct the whole strength of their forces against him and the Ministry with which he is connected. What Government and what Minister would be worth supporting who would conciliate an Opposition which had pursued tactics of that kind? They first use every parliamentary means to humiliate the Minister in the eyes of the House and of the public, and then, because he will not concede the points which they wish to gain, they take the most extreme course open to them. I do not know what view the other members of the Labour Party take, but I trust that they hold the opinion in regard to this matter that I hold, and will vote against the amendment.

In the House:

Motion (by Sir JOHN FORREST) proposed—

That the Standing Orders be suspended in order to enable all steps to be taken to obtain Supply, and to pass the Supply Bill through all its stages without delay.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I should like to hear from the Treasurer a reason for the suspension of the Standing Orders. If there is no urgency, we should not pass this motion.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is the invariable practice to suspend the Standing Orders for the passing of a Supply Bill.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not think so. I could understand the suspension of the Standing Orders if we were near the end of the month. In my opinion, we are apt to treat this matter too lightly. I do not think that we should suspend our Standing Orders unless reasons of real urgency make it imperative to do so.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We want Supply.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—At once? To-morrow?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the Treasurer says that this is a matter of urgency, I have no more to say, but I think that he should advance some reason for so grave a step as the suspension of the Standing Orders.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan—Treasurer).—As the honorable member is aware, Supply was taken in July for one month only, and as we are now nearing the end of August, we want another advance to meet the payments which come due in all parts of this vast Commonwealth within a few days. The obtaining of Supply is a matter of urgency.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I do not think that the Minister has advanced any strong reasons of urgency for the suspension of the Standing Orders.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member reminds me that the Treasurer has replied; therefore the discussion of the motion is closed.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Resolution of Committee of Supply reported.

Motion (by Sir JOHN FORREST) proposed—

That the report be now adopted.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I regret extremely that the suspension of the Standing Orders was agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The suspension of the Standing Orders having been agreed to, the matter cannot be further discussed. The question now before the Chair is the adoption of the report of the Committee of Supply.

Mr. CONROY.—I think that I shall be in order in giving reasons why we should not proceed further by adopting the report. I should have objected to the suspension of the Standing Orders had not the Minister's action in closing the debate precluded me from doing so, on the ground that the Government should not be given Supply until two important matters, both of them affecting New South Wales, had been dealt with. Under the Constitution Act the Federal Capital must be established in New South Wales, but the present Government has refused to proceed with the matter in any way. The State is also entitled, as statistics show, to an additional representative in this House, but the Ministry refuse to state whether it is to be given that additional representation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Bill will be in the hands of honorable members to-morrow.

Mr. CONROY.—Had I been aware of that, I should not have objected to the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—When we were asked to pass the last Supply Bill, I asked the Treasurer whether he would in future circulate similar measures amongst honorable members at least twenty-four hours before the time set down for their discussion. As far as my memory serves me, the Treasurer gave the House an assurance that that would be done.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Copies of the Bill were circulated this morning.

Mr. JOHNSON.—At any rate, a copy of it has only just been placed in my hands. But even if the measure was circulated this morning, I would point out that under ordinary circumstances we should not have been called upon to deal with it immediately the House met to-day. I protest against honorable members being asked to pass a measure involving an expenditure of £363,283 without being afforded a reasonable opportunity of perusing the items which it contains.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Estimates are now upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON.—But when we are asked to pass a temporary Supply Bill we have a right to the fullest information concerning the various items which it contains. I protest against the action of the Government, and if it is repeated I shall feel myself perfectly justified in using every legitimate means in my power to block the granting of Supply.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I was given to understand by the Treasurer earlier in the evening that this Bill contains nothing beyond provision for the ordinary services of the Commonwealth. That being the case, I think that we might very well allow it to pass through its remaining stages with the utmost possible despatch.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Resolution adopted.

Resolution of Committee of Ways and Means, covering resolution of Supply, adopted.

Ordered—

That Sir John Forrest do prepare and bring in a Bill to carry out the foregoing resolutions.

Bill presented by Sir JOHN FORREST, and read a first and second time.

In Committee—

Clauses 1 to 4 agreed to.
Schedule.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I should like some information from the Minister of Home Affairs in regard to item No. 7, page 6, "Cost of Commonwealth elections, £300." To what does this expenditure relate?

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—The amount in question represents the balance of some claims which have been paid to certain returning officers. Certain claims were sent in and were allowed, and the sum mentioned covers the payments which have been made to the officers in question.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—From the explanation given by the Minister, I am inclined to think that this item relates to a matter which created a considerable amount of trouble in the Home Affairs Department immediately after last election. It was alleged that both in New South Wales and Victoria a promise was made that a bonus of £20 would be given by the Department to the Divisional returning officers. A considerable amount of correspondence ensued, and certain representations were made to the Minister in charge of the Department at that particular period. Indeed, I believe that he received a deputation of returning officers in Sydney in reference to it. I do not know what decision was finally arrived at, or whether it was resolved to give those officers the £20 bonus, but I understand from some information which I recently obtained, that where they could show out-of-pocket expenses to the amount of £10 they were reimbursed to that extent. I hope that this matter will be debated fully when the Estimates are under review. In the meantime, I ask the Minister of Home Affairs to carefully look into the papers relating to it with a view to ascertaining whether these officers are not entitled to the amount claimed.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—The matter to which the honorable member refers was, I understand, decided by my predecessor. Several of these claims have since been presented, and have been determined in accordance with his decision. The honorable member will have an opportunity of again referring to this subject when the Estimates are under discussion, and if he will notify me of his intention to refer to it, I will have the papers in readiness, and be in a position to give him a complete answer.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—I wish to know from the Minister whether this item of £300 is intended as payment of the bonus which was promised by the Minister of Home Affairs in the previous Deakin Administration to the divisional returning officers. At the last election, the returning officer in my constituency was promised a bonus of £20 for carrying out the arrangements in connexion with the election in a satisfactory manner, and because he was outside the civil service. Soon afterwards, however, a change of Government took place, and through some wonderful calculation, the returning officers, instead of receiving the £20 which had been promised them, were paid £13 for their half-year's salary, and were given a gratuity of £7.

Mr. JOHNSON.—There was a distinct breach of faith committed.

Mr. PAGE.—Undoubtedly there was.

Mr. JOHNSON.—There is no doubt that the promise was made.

Mr. PAGE.—I am certain that it was. If the Minister feels disposed to argue the point, I ask him how the returning officers became possessed of the additional £7, if no mention of a bonus had been made. The least that a Government can do is to respect its pledges.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—The honorable member for Maranoa complains of a decision which was arrived at some time ago in connexion with certain returning officers. I can only pledge myself to look into the matter with a view to ascertaining whether the promise alleged was made. I have not the official papers before me at the present time. The item to which attention has been drawn represents simply the balance of the expenses incurred in holding the last Commonwealth elections. I know that certain personal out-of-pocket expenses have been paid to returning officers, but probably there is some other question behind that which was decided by my predecessors.

Mr. PAGE.—If the Minister finds that a bonus was promised to the returning officers, will he respect it, even though it was not a written promise?

Mr. GROOM.—I can only ascertain if a promise was made, by whom it was made, and the character of that promise. I cannot say that I will honour any promise which may have been made by an officer irrespective of whether or not he had authority to make it on behalf of the Commonwealth.

Mr. PAGE.—It was made by a responsible Minister.

Mr. GROOM.—If the Minister in charge of the Department had made any promise, I feel sure that it would have been kept.

Mr. PAGE.—But he went out of office.

Mr. GROOM.—I promise to look into the matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I shall also look into it.

Mr. GROOM.—I assure the honorable member for Maranoa that I and my colleague the Treasurer will look into the whole question.

Mr. PAGE.—I am satisfied with that assurance.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I was one of a deputation which waited on the Minister in regard to this question, and believe the honorable gentleman will find it very difficult to ascertain by whom the promise was made, for no record can be found of it. The fact that returning officers in all parts of the Commonwealth—so situated that they could not have communicated with each other on the subject—agree that they were promised this bonus of £20 should be sufficient to show that such a promise was made.

Mr. BROWN.—Some of them retained the money.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The officer in my electorate, on the strength of this promise, retained the £20 out of certain moneys which he had in hand. From what I hear, the Minister of Home Affairs will find it difficult to discover a record of the promise; but there can be little doubt that it was made by an officer purporting to act on behalf of the Government. Whether he was entitled to do so or not remains to be seen.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I wish to indorse all that has been said as to what the returning officers in question regard as a breach of faith. The promise of a bonus of £20 was distinctly made to them by an officer of the Department, and, coming from such a source, they thought that it was authoritative. According to their statements, it was made by an officer to whom they were directly responsible, and they considered that it was an official communication. We must be satisfied that such a promise was made when we have a general declaration to that effect by the various returning officers concerned. The Minister will doubtless find it extremely difficult to discover the authorship of the promise, because it is possible that the officer, although feeling that he was justified in making it, backed down on learning that it would not be indorsed by the Government. In these circumstances the returning officers in question may suffer a severe injustice by reason of the inability of the Minister to trace the source from which the original authority for this promise was obtained.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I wish to call attention to the item, "Advance to Treasurer, £70,000." That is a very large item to pass in such a form in a temporary Supply Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I explained the whole matter when introducing the Bill.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I certainly did not hear any explanation of this item by the right honorable gentleman.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan—Treasurer).—I have already explained that the amounts appropriated towards the Treasurer's Advance Account in the last Supply Bill, together with those appropriated for the same Act in this measure, represent £120,000. A sum of £50,000 is required to make progress payments in connexion with new works and buildings that were entered upon before the close of the last financial year, and are still being carried on. In addition, £25,000 is required for the construction and extension of telegraph and telephone lines, which are still in progress, while payments in connexion with the purchase of defence material will absorb another £10,000. A margin of only £35,000 will thus be left until the Appropriation Bill is passed, when the Treasurer's Advance Account will be recouped in respect of these amounts.

Mr. McCAY.—How is the £10,000 required for defence purposes to be expended?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Defence fund requires to be replenished in respect of material ordered from England.

Mr. McCAY.—There is no such fund in existence.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We have a fund in the Treasury from which this payment must be made.

Mr. McCAY.—The Government should not require the £10,000 unless they have given certain orders out of the new year's vote.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am informed by the Defence Department that it is required in respect of material that has been ordered, and which we are ordering from England. As a matter of fact, the honorable and learned member, when Minister of Defence, ordered some of this material.

Mr. McCAY.—The money was appropriated with the order.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is so; but this amount relates to a portion of the vote on this year's Estimates.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I do not think that when a vote is required in respect of works and buildings it should be dealt with in this way.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Treasurer's Advance Account will be recouped by-and-by.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Instead of these items being embraced by the vote, "Treasurer's Advance Account, £70,000," it should be distinctly shown for what purpose the money is required, and I hope that the Treasurer will see that that is done in future.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan—Treasurer).—Under the Constitution Act, the suggestion made by the honorable member could not be carried out. I propose to introduce to-morrow, or on Friday, a Works and Buildings Appropriation Bill, and when that measure has been passed, the Treasurer's Advance Account will be recouped in respect of these items.

ENCOURAGEMENT BILL (No. 2).

Debate resumed from 22nd August (vide page 1267), on motion by Sir WILLIAM LYNE—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—At this late hour, I should like to obtain permission to continue my remarks to-morrow evening.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We adjourned the debate last night on the understanding that the honorable member would be prepared to continue his speech to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is so; and I have been ready since the House met this afternoon to continue my speech.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is it the pleasure of the House that the honorable member have leave to continue his remarks on a future occasion?

Mr. FRAZER.—I object.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have made arrangements for other business to be proceeded with.

Mr. FRAZER.—I withdraw my objection on the assurance of the Prime Minister.

Leave granted; debate adjourned.

EVIDENCE BILL.

In Committee (Consideration of Senate's amendments):

Clause 4—

All Courts shall take judicial notice of—

(a) the signature of any person. . . .

Senate's Amendment.—That after the word "the," line 2, the word "official" be inserted.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi — Attorney-General).—I move—

That the amendment be agreed to.

This is a purely formal amendment, providing that all Courts shall take judicial notice of the "official" signature of any of the persons named in the clause.

Motion agreed to.

Senate's Amendment.—That after clause 11 the following new clause be added:—

"12. Affidavits for use in the High Court or any Court exercising Federal jurisdiction may be sworn before any justice of the peace without the issue of any commission for taking affidavits."

Mr. ISAACS (Indi — Attorney-General).—I move—

That the amendment be agreed to.

It was suggested by the honorable member for Corio, supported by the honorable member for Maranoa, and I promised the House that it should be inserted when the Bill was before the Senate.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—Does the Attorney-General think it is a desirable provision?

Mr. ISAACS.—I do. The circumstances of some of the States are such that a facility of this kind is necessary.

Mr. CONROY.—As the Minister sees no objection to the amendment, I shall offer no opposition to it.

Mr. PAGE. — It has worked well in Queensland, where it is the law of the land.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—I think it is a mistake to allow any justice of the peace to exercise this power. Justices of the peace are almost as common as grasshoppers in some parts of Australia, and the taking of an affidavit, especially when it relates to the High Court, is certainly an important matter in some cases. I do not know whether any Federal justices have been appointed, but if they have they may be in a position to take these affidavits. To allow State justices of the peace to take them, especially when no commissions are issued, will be to hand over a very serious duty to the least experienced. That is about what it means. However, the proposal is popular, and I suppose we may allow it to pass.

Motion agreed to.

Reported that the Committee had agreed to the Senate's amendments; report adopted.

CENSUS AND STATISTICS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

The House is about to be asked to exercise the powers that it possesses under section 51 sub-section XI. of the Constitution, which provides that the Parliament shall subject to the Constitution have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to, among other things, census and statistics. This is one of the concurrent powers exercised under the Constitution—that is to say, powers which are concurrent in the Commonwealth and in the States with respect to the passing of laws with regard to census and statistics generally. The object of the Bill is to enable the Commonwealth to establish a central bureau of statistics in order that it may furnish to the world statistical returns with respect to the matters under its special jurisdiction, and also publish certain statistics having reference to the affairs of Australia as a whole. In other countries, especially in Europe and the United States, statistical bureaux have been established, with a central authority, the idea being, instead of having a statistical bureau attached to each of the various departments, to establish a central bureau, so that the whole of the statistical information with regard to the various departments of State, as well as industries generally, may be focussed. As recently as 1903 in the United States, it being found that a number of statistical bureaux had grown up in connexion with the various departments, an Act was passed to place under the Central Department of Commerce a bureau of statistics, and the bureau of the census was also placed under this Department. They have concentrated their statistical inquiries as much as possible into the one department. One of the senators, in introducing the Bill, said—

The reason we do not want to leave the gathering of these statistics scattered in these several departments is that we want accurate statistics. We want them speedily gathered, because stale statistics are worthless, and I conceive that we would advance the interests of the business world, the industrial world, the scientific world, if we would keep the Census bureau here in this Department (Commerce) and bring all these other statistical bureaux under the same organizing head that we propose to put in charge of this new Department. Then, without friction, without jealousy, simply with a view to the ascertainment of reliable results, organize one bureau that will do all the work and give us complete satisfaction with its results.

That is the position in which the United States have placed their statistical department. They have to a very great extent made this one central department, and have established their Bureau of Census on a permanent basis, so that it will not be necessary every ten years to organize a special census staff. They have a permanent department, in which officers of special skill and experience are engaged in carrying on the work continuously. In Australia we are in a somewhat different position. Each State has a statistical department organized to supply information for its own special purposes. The States have organized their departments upon lines specially adapted to their own requirements, and they are engaged in the preparation of returns relating to their stock, agricultural operations, finances, local government, trade, factories, mines, and other branches of industry. Each State also acts on the uniform principle of a decennial census. Still there are divergencies of practice, and, further than that, until lately the States Governments have been estimating their increases and decreases of population upon different lines. Of course the States Departments were organized as special units and for special purposes. Now that the Commonwealth has been brought into existence, and the Constitution has conferred upon Parliament large powers both of legislation and administration, we have to look at the matter from a broader point of view. Our past experience has shown us that it is absolutely necessary that we should have some means of compiling Commonwealth statistics upon a uniform basis. It is not proposed to interfere more than is necessary with the existing States organizations. We start on the assumption that the States will require to have their own local statistics for their own purposes. Of course it is natural that they should desire this. They have their own local laws, and they may be regarded as the best judges of their own necessities. I think it would be advantageous for them to have one Commonwealth department; but, judging from the tone of replies received from them, I am inclined to think that some negotiations will be required before they will be prepared to hand over their own departments. There are two courses open. We might have a central statistical bureau, with branches in each of the six States, which could be used for State purposes as required. As an alternative, we could establish a central Commonwealth bureau, and enter into negotiations with the various States with a view to utilizing their departments to the fullest possible extent. During the early stages of the organization of the Commonwealth departments, the latter will be found the most practical course to pursue. Of course we could negotiate with a view to taking over the States departments. If they do not desire us to do that, we can arrange to co-operate harmoniously with them. The Bill is framed on that principle. It provides generally for administration. It proposes that a Commonwealth statistician shall be appointed by the Governor-General in Council. He will have certain powers, which are defined; but, if it is thought desirable by him, he may delegate them under his hand to other persons to exercise on his behalf in different parts of the Commonwealth. It is proposed to have power for administrative purposes to appoint a certain number of officers to be placed under the Statistician in the Central Bureau. Power is given to the Governor-General to enter into an arrangement with the Government of any State, providing for any matter necessary or convenient for the carrying out or giving effect to the measure. For instance, such an arrangement may be made for the execution by State officers of any power or duty conferred or imposed on any officer under the Act or the regulations, the collection by any State Department or officer of any statistical or other information required to carry out the Act, and the supplying of statistical information by any State Department or office to the Statistician. Every officer executing these functions will have the powers conferred under the measure. The idea is that if the States desire to continue their existing institutions, and are unwilling to hand them over to the Commonwealth, we may ask them to furnish certain returns, to collect certain information, to make certain inquiries necessary for industrial, mining, or agricultural purposes, and to send the result to the central Department, which will focus all information obtainable respecting Australian affairs. The desire is to bring into line the statistics of the States for the purpose of comparison, to lay down a uniform method for the collection of statistics in the States for Commonwealth purposes, so that we may have a proper and fair means of comparing the industrial, social, and other conditions of the States. In addition to that, the central Department will collect all information in regard to subjects specially controlled by the Commonwealth, such as exports and imports, trade, and commerce generally, including inter-State transactions, navigation, and shipping, postal, defence, and other matters. Provision is also made for the collection of a census, which shall be taken whenever directed by the Governor-General. The reason for not providing for the collection of a census at specified periods is that at present the States have power to collect the census, but we hope that they will agree to allow the Commonwealth to organize the work, when the population of Australia can be numbered by a central authority on a definite and uniform basis. It is intended that the Commonwealth census shall be decennial; but, of course, before any census can be taken there must be a parliamentary appropriation to provide for the expense. The remaining provisions of Part III., which relate to the census, are purely in the nature of machinery provisions, and need not be referred to now. Part IV. deals with the collection of statistics, and clause 16 provides that the Statistician shall, in addition to the census, collect annually vital, social, and industrial statistics, and statistics in relation to imports and exports; inter-State trade; factories, mines, and the productive industries generally; agricultural, horticultural, viticultural, dairying, and pastoral industries; insurance and finance, railways, tramways, shipping and transport, and any other prescribed matters. The remaining provisions of the Bill are purely machinery provisions, to give the Statistician adequate powers. As the Commonwealth is likely to soon establish the office of High Commissioner, it is desirable that we should have an organized Department, which can supply him with Australian information upon Australian subjects generally—information collected upon sound and uniform lines, fairly representing the growth and development of the nation. Hitherto we have had to rely upon the information supplied by the Departments of the States. The Commonwealth Department will enable Parliament, the public, and the press to obtain Australian information on any subject. It will be able to conduct inquiries upon special matters, and will show the effect of our legislation, giving an accurate picture of the conditions of our social and industrial life.

Mr. KELLY.—Does the honorable and learned gentleman say that it will give the press an opportunity to obtain information?

Mr. GROOM.—The press will be able to obtain statistical information of an authoritative nature, and honorable members will be able to obtain information in connexion with the subjects with which Parliament has to deal.

Mr. KELLY.—Why does clause 10 provide that the census shall be taken whenever directed by the Governor-General?

Mr. GROOM.—It is permissive to enable arrangements to be made with the States. The Census Acts of the States have been enacted for the taking of each census. In the United States, provision is made in the Constitution for the taking of a decennial census, and the same remark applies to Canada. It is intended to have a decennial census here, but provision is made in the manner set forth in clause 10, pending negotiations with the States for the transfer of their Statistical Departments to the Commonwealth, or some other arrangement under which statistics of population may be collected by the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What is the practice in the States?

Mr. GROOM.—In Queensland, there was a quinquennial Act, parts of which were repealed, and the decennial census was lately taken, under a special Act. In New South Wales, I understand, special Acts were passed for each census.

Mr. WILKS.—Is there any danger of the Bill being used to block the redistribution of seats?

Mr. LONSDALE.—Is the Government going to bring in a Bill for the redistribution of seats before providing for the taking of a census?

Mr. GROOM.—The Bill referred to will be circulated to-morrow. This is an independent measure.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Has it no connexion with the other?

Mr. GROOM.—It may or may not have. This Bill is complete in itself, and deals only with the taking of general statistics for the Commonwealth.

Debate (on motion by Mr. KELLY) adjourned.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—I have much pleasure in moving—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

This is purely a formal measure, which provides for vesting the control of wireless telegraphy in the hands of the Postmaster-General. It has already passed through the Senate, where certain amendments have been introduced with a view to making it more restrictive, and providing for more severe penalties for offences.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a second time, and committed pro forma.

REPRESENTATION BILL.

Motion (by Mr. GROOM) agreed to—

That leave be given to bring in a Bill for an Act relating to the representation of the several States in the House of Representatives.

Bill presented, and read a first time.

House adjourned at 10.54 p.m.

Senate.

Thursday, 24 August, 1905.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 3.30 p.m., and read prayers.

STATE DEFENCE DEPARTMENTS.

Senator MATHESON.—I desire to ask the Minister of Defence, without notice, whether he can give the Senate an idea as to when the valuation of the Defence properties which have been handed over by the States to the Commonwealth will be completed?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I have not the remotest idea. Once a matter is placed in the hands of two arbitrators there is no telling when their valuation will be completed.

PAPERS.

MINISTERS laid upon the table the following papers:—

Copy of correspondence between the Attorney-General and the Justices of the High Court re travelling expenses.

Ordered to be printed.

Estimates of Revenue and Expenditure for the year ending 30th June, 1906.

The Budget, 1905-6—Papers prepared for the information of members of Parliament.

The CLERK laid upon the table the following paper:—

Return to order of the Senate—Yodda Valley Gold-field, British New Guinea—Documents relating to capture of Mr. O'Brien.

Ordered to be printed.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I beg to lay upon the table the following paper:—

Copy of conditions of arrangement with Mr. John Plummer with regard to the writing and distributing of articles in Great Britain.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator move that the paper be printed?

Senator PLAYFORD.—No, sir, but if any honorable senator wishes the paper to be printed I shall offer no objection. I think that all papers laid upon the table should be referred to the Printing Committee for consideration and report.

The PRESIDENT.—Sometimes the Senate wishes a paper to be printed straight away.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is a great pity that it is so.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I move—

That the paper be printed.

Senator TURLEY.—What is the paper?

Senator STEWART.—I do not know what it is.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is a copy of the contract with Mr. John Plummer.

The PRESIDENT.—The motion has not been seconded.

Senator HIGGS.—I second the motion.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—What is the use of the Printing Committee if this course is to be taken? I always understood that in each House of the Parliament a Printing Committee was appointed to go through every document laid upon the table, and say whether it was of sufficient public importance to be printed. We are not in a position to express an opinion as to whether this paper ought to be printed until we know what it is, and can judge its importance.

The PRESIDENT.—That is a question for the Senate to decide.

Senator DOBSON.—I agree with the leader of the Senate that all these papers should be referred to the Printing Committee.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think that the honorable and learned senator is in order.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Senator MACFARLANE.—May I ask you, sir, when the next meeting of the Printing Committee will take place?

The PRESIDENT.—I do not know. I am not a member of the Committee.

Senator DOBSON.—Who is the chairman of the Printing Committee?

Senator KEATING.—Senator Smith is the chairman.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The Printing Committee made certain recommendations, which were flouted by the Senate, and no sitting has been held since that time.

WEATHER REPORTS: TASMANIA.

Senator MACFARLANE asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. The reason of the omission of Tasmania from the weather reports of the other States published lately by the Post Office, Victoria, New South Wales, and South Australia being given in great detail?

2. Is this in consequence of any change in facilities at one time given by the Eastern Extension Cable Company?

3. If so, what is the reason?

Senator KEATING.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows:—

1. No alteration has been made. The weather reports from Tasmania arrive at Melbourne too late to be included in the report prepared at 11.15 a.m. daily. Such reports are not furnished to the Postmaster-General's Department in Sydney, but are addressed to the State Astronomer, who includes them in his daily weather charts which are exhibited in the colonnade of the General Post Office in that city. In Adelaide the information received is published in detail daily, in the hall of the General Post Office, by the State Astronomer.

2. No change has been made in the facilities given by the Eastern Extension Cable Company.

3. Answered by the reply to question No. 2.

POST AND TELEGRAPH ACT.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

Referring to the statements of the Minister of Defence in replying to question on 16th August with regard to section 16 of the Post and Telegraph Act—

1. Is the Treasurer (the Right Honorable Sir John Forrest) of the same opinion as when out of office—that the enactment in question is “wrong, foolish, and dishonest”?

2. Do the Government agree with the Treasurer that the enactment is “wrong, foolish, and dishonest”?

3. Does the Minister intend the Senate to understand that the Government are prepared to ask Parliament to repeal section 16, stigmatized by Sir John Forrest as “dishonest” but for Mr. Reid's statement in 1901, quoted by the Minister?

4. Will the Government ask Parliament to repeal the section which the Treasurer said was “dishonest” if Mr. Reid will support them in doing so?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable and learned senator's questions are as follows:—

1. Sir John Forrest states that the honorable senator has not accurately represented what he said, and we consider, in any case, that the honorable senator who, while in office, took no step to repeal the provision referred to, is the last person who should question our colleague's consistency.

2. As the Government agree with Mr. Reid's speech in July, 1901, already quoted by me, they necessarily are not of opinion that the enactment is “wrong, foolish, or dishonest.”

3. I do not intend the Senate to understand that the Government are prepared, under any circumstances, to repeal section 16, the reference to Mr. Reid's speech being made only to allay the honorable senator's apparent anxiety.

4. As the Government could not possibly assume Mr. Reid to be so inconsistent as the honorable senator suggests, the answer must be “No.”

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What a magnificent reply!

Senator PLAYFORD.—What a number of magnificent questions!

MAIL SERVICES: TASMANIA AND VANCOUVER.

Senator MACFARLANE asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is it the fact that the State of Tasmania is called on to bear the whole expense of ocean transit of mails between Australia and Tasmania?

2. Are other postal services over the ocean not paid for on a per capita basis?

3. If so, will the Government take measures to have more equitable treatment given to Tasmania?

Senator KEATING.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows:—

1. No; the other States contribute, to some extent, towards the expense of the transit of mails between Australia and Tasmania across Bass Strait by a poundage rate on all mails sent from those States.

2. Hitherto only the ocean mail services via Suez have been paid for on a per capita basis, but it is now proposed to pay for the ocean mail service between Australia and Canada on the same basis.

3. It is not considered that an Inter-State mail service by water differs materially from a similar service overland, or that it could be treated on the same basis as an ocean mail service, without a reconsideration of the whole of the arrangements under which Inter-State postal services are carried on throughout Australia.

Senator MATHESON.—Arising out of that answer, I desire to ask Senator Keating whether he considers that the term “ocean transit” applied by Senator Macfarlane to mails crossing this little strait or pond is properly so used?

Senator KEATING.—I think that the answer to the third question discloses that it is not treated as an ocean mail service at all.

Senator MATHESON.—That is what I wish to know.

Senator CLEMONS.—I desire to ask Senator Keating whether there is any other line of steamers running from port to port in the Commonwealth which receives a subsidy therefrom?

Senator KEATING.—I am not in a position to give a definite answer, but I shall endeavour to get the information for the honorable and learned senator as soon as possible, perhaps before to-morrow.

Senator MACFARLANE.—May I ask whether the revenue derived from the poundage rates is considered a contribution to the subsidy paid by Tasmania?

Senator KEATING.—I understand that the subsidy is paid in the first instance by Tasmania, and that the revenue collected by the poundage rates from other States is debited to them and credited to Tasmania, as their portion of the subsidy.

Senator MATHESON asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. Is the Minister aware that, prior to the year 1905, the subsidy for the Vancouver Mail Service was provided by the States of New South Wales and Queensland alone?

2. Is the Minister aware that in the present Estimates, 1905-6, the subsidy has for the first time been distributed among all the States on a population basis under the heading of "Transferred Expenditure"?

3. Can the Minister indicate under what section of the Constitution new expenditure, never previously incurred or authorized by a State, can be debited to such a State as "Transferred Expenditure"?

4. Have the Government of Western Australia consented, on behalf of that State, to participate in the subsidy for the Vancouver Mail Service as a transferred expenditure?

5. Is it not a fact that, in the case of the Mail Service to the Pacific Islands, the question of increasing the subsidy previously provided by New South Wales alone was submitted to Parliament and authorized as new expenditure?

6. For what reason has this precedent been departed from in the case of the subsidy for the Mail Service to Vancouver?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Section 89. I am informed that this matter was decided by the last Government. It is considered that this expenditure should be placed on the same footing as the Orient Mail Service.

4. I am not aware that any of the State Governments was consulted.

5. Yes, the additional subsidy having been granted for an extension of the services also on condition that white labour was used.

6. Answered by 3.

CONSTITUTION: "BOOKKEEPING" SECTION.

Senator CLEMONS asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

If it is the intention of the present Government to retain section 93 of the Constitution known as the bookkeeping section, or whether they will, after October, 1906, make some other provision for crediting revenue and debiting expenditure?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answer to the honorable senator's question is as follows:—

This will require to be considered in connexion with other financial adjustments next year. It is pertinent to the Budget of 1906, and not to that of the present year.

PUBLIC SERVICE: OUTSIDE INFLUENCE.

Senator DOBSON asked the Minister representing the Minister of Home Affairs, upon notice—

1. Are Ministers aware that No. 43 of the Regulations issued under the Commonwealth Public Service Act 1902 prohibits officers from seeking the influence or interest of any person in order to obtain promotion, removal, or other advantage?

2. Is it not a fact that numbers of the officers have disobeyed such Regulation, and that some Members of Parliament have acquiesced in their doing so?

3. Have Ministers read the report of the Public Service Commissioner, dated 9th June, 1904, stating that he considers the most solemn obligation of his office to be the endeavour to carry out the "will of Parliament," and get rid of "political and other influence" in managing and regulating the Public Service?

4. Is it the intention of Ministers to support the Commissioner in this respect, and do they intend to take any, and what steps, to enforce obedience by all officers to the 43rd regulation?

5. Are Ministers prepared to enforce section 46 of the said Act if the steps they may take to enforce the said regulation are not effectual?

Senator KEATING.—The answers to the honorable and learned senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2. Notwithstanding the regulation, it would appear that some public servants have written to members with respect to their position under the classification, but I am not aware that members have acquiesced in their doing so.

Senator MILLEN.—Does the Minister mean that individual members of the Public Service have written to members of Parliament, or that organizations of the Public Service have done so?

Senator KEATING.—That is not stated in the answer. It says "that some public servants have written to members." It does not say whether they have written jointly or individually.

3. Yes.

4. It is the intention of the Government to support the Commissioner, and it is hoped that the attention thus publicly drawn to this regulation by the honorable senator will suffice to secure obedience to it.

5. Ministers will assist the Commissioner to enforce the Act and regulations.

Senator PEARCE.—I should like to ask a question arising out of the replies. Do the Government propose to treat representations from organizations of public servants as a breach of regulation 46?

Senator KEATING.—I think that any representation would have to be regarded according to all the circumstances surrounding it, in order to determine whether or not it was the exercise of a right or a breach of the Public Service Act. Any representations which may be made in connexion with the classification of the Public Service, which in the opinion of any member of the Senate are in conflict with the policy and principle of the Public Service Act, will receive consideration from the Government, and will be represented to the Commissioner, so that he may or may not take such action as he thinks that it is his duty to take.

Senator DOBSON.—Does the Minister mean that a public servant may address a member of Parliament about the classification?

Senator KEATING.—That is a matter for the honorable senator himself to consider. He may bring such matters under the notice of the Government in any circumstances.

SHORT RIFLES.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. Did Major-General Hutton recommend the purchase by the Commonwealth of the short rifles now being served out to the Light Horse Regiments in the service of the Commonwealth?

2. How many of such rifles have been purchased by the Commonwealth?

3. Has the Minister been informed that rifles of the pattern in question have been abandoned by the Imperial authorities, and the manufacture of the weapons stopped?

4. Is the Minister aware that it has been proved by experience in England that the magazine of the rifle in question "is liable to jamb, that there is too much play in the mechanism, that the balance is bad, and the metal used too soft?"

5. Is this weapon to be withdrawn from use in the Commonwealth Forces?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2. Five thousand.

3. No.

4. No.

5. No, unless good reasons are given, which up to the present have not been received.

We have seen some newspaper paragraphs on the subject, but we have no official information.

MILITARY UNIFORMS.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. Has a communication been received by the Commonwealth Government from the Imperial authorities, taking exception to the wearing, in Japan, by Colonel Hoad, D.A.G., Commonwealth Military Forces, of aiguillettes so similar to those worn by aides-de-camp and equerries to the Sovereign as to convey the impression that the wearer occupied a position on the staff of His Majesty?

2. Were the aiguillettes ordered or recommended to be worn by officers of the Commonwealth Forces at the instance of Major-General Hutton?

3. What is the cost of these articles of adornment?

4. Are they paid for by the Commonwealth, or provided at the expense of officers required to wear them?

5. Has the Attorney-General replied to the complaint of the Imperial authorities regarding the wearing of these emblems, maintaining the right of the Military Forces of the Commonwealth to wear any uniform approved by the Government of the Commonwealth?

6. Does the Attorney-General maintain the right of the Commonwealth to complete independence of action regarding the wearing of uniforms and emblems at foreign Courts?

7. Is it not a fact that No. 11, Part XI., of the Military Regulations of the Commonwealth provide that "Permission to wear uniform at foreign manœuvres can only be obtained from the War Office?"

8. Does not the promulgation of this regulation recognise the right of the British War Office to regulate the wearing abroad of Commonwealth uniforms?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2. The regulations providing for the wearing of aiguillettes were approved on the recommendation of Major-General Hutton.

3. £9 9s.

4. They are paid for by the officers concerned.

5. The Attorney-General has advised to that effect, and the advice is being communicated to the Imperial Government.

6. This question does not appear to be covered by the opinion of the Attorney-General.

7 and 8. The regulations do so state, but in this case the Commonwealth Military Attaché was attached to the Japanese Army at the time of war by permission of the Japanese Government, obtained through the Imperial authorities. It may be stated that all the military attachés wore the uniform of their country.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not think the Minister of Defence has answered question No. 8.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answer is yes. I know that there is a provision on the subject, but it refers, I think, to military manœuvres, and does not refer to an officer who is attached to a special Army Corps in connexion with war.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Motion (by Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD) agreed to—

1. That there be laid upon the table of the Senate copies of all papers connected with the landing in the Commonwealth of Mrs. Mahommed

Din, wife of Mr. Mahommed Din, a resident of Western Australia.

2. That there be laid upon the table of the Senate all papers connected with the grant of an exemption certificate to the said Mrs. Mahommed Din.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I lay the papers in question upon the table.

LIGHT HORSE: PISTOLS.

Motion (by Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD) agreed to—

1. That there be laid upon the table of the Senate copies of all papers connected with the recommendation of Major-General Hutton for the purchase of pistols for the arming of the Light Horse Regiments in the service of the Commonwealth.

2. Also all papers connected with the refusal of the Minister of State for Defence (Senator the Honorable Anderson Dawson) to approve of the recommendation of Major-General Hutton for the purchase of the said pistols.

3. Also all papers connected with the condemnation by the British War Office of the said recommendation by Major-General Hutton.

JUDICIARY ACT 1903 AMENDMENT BILL.

Bill presented by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON, and read a first time.

EVIDENCE BILL.

Message received from the House of Representatives intimating that it had agreed to the amendments made by the Senate in this Bill.

PARLIAMENTARY EVIDENCE BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 27th July, vide page 188):

Clause 2 (Evidence may be taken on oath).

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—It will be convenient for me to state what I propose to do in connexion with this Bill. It will be within the recollection of honorable senators that when I presented the Bill to the Senate I stated that it had been considered by the parliamentary draftsman, to whom I had referred it, with a view to have the phraseology of the measure brought into line with the phraseology of the general Acts of the Commonwealth. Since then the Bill has been referred to the Standing Orders Committee. The Committee, judging from their report, submitted the whole question to the parliamentary draftsman, who has prepared a much more elaborate Bill, covering many details of an administrative or machinery character, which were not provided for in the measure as originally submitted by me. We have passed the first clause of the Bill as I introduced it. I now propose to move the omission of the remaining clauses, in order that we may have an opportunity to adopt the recommendations of the Standing Orders Committee.

Senator GUTHRIE.—It would be better to withdraw the whole Bill.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That is what it really amounts to. After the two clauses have been omitted, I propose to move the insertion of other clauses in their place. But if we were to adopt the procedure which Senator Guthrie recommends, we should have to begin de novo.

Senator GUTHRIE.—There are seventeen new clauses.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD. — I do not care if there are seventeen hundred. I take it that the Standing Orders Committee has made provision for many cases that were not covered by the original Bill. I am prepared to accept the clauses which they recommend. I ask the Committee to negative this clause.

Clause negatived.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—In the running fire of conversation which was taking place, I was unable to clearly follow the intention stated by Senator Neild. I understand that he asks the Committee to negative certain clauses with a view to inserting a long list of new clauses.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That is so.

Senator MILLEN.—I submit that it is not possible for honorable senators, or, at any rate, it is not possible for me to determine whether it is expedient to omit clauses until we have an opportunity to look rather closely at what is proposed to insert in their place.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Good gracious me!

Senator MILLEN.—I can quite understand that the honorable senator may feel the necessity for some little assistance or moral support of the kind. I am not prepared to create a blank in the Bill until I know what it is proposed to substitute. It is asking rather too much for Senator Neild, without any notice, to propose to practically remodel the whole of this extensive Bill.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—Senator Millen can surely not have been here some weeks ago, when this Bill was postponed expressly to allow honorable senators to make themselves acquainted with the recommendations of the Standing Orders Committee.

Senator MILLEN.—I have been here more frequently than has the honorable senator this session.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That is so, during this session, and I congratulate the honorable senator on the frequency of his attendance during this session. The report was submitted to the Senate last session, and three weeks ago the Bill was postponed to enable honorable senators to grapple with the recommendations of the Standing Orders Committee. Senator Millen has been displaying so much Roman virtue in his devotion to his country that I am surprised he should not have grappled with those little details. It is unfair to charge me, under the circumstances, with springing a surprise on the Chamber.

Senator MILLEN.—I did not charge the honorable senator with anything. There is no necessity to do that.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable senator has answered himself; he should not have done so.

Senator MILLEN.—I did not do so.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That is a matter of opinion. I draw the attention of Senator Millen to the recommendations of the Standing Orders Committee which I propose to adopt. Clause 2, enabling evidence to be taken on oath, has been eliminated, and I now ask the Committee to strike out clause 3, which empowers the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Chairman or member presiding at any sitting of a Committee of either House, to administer oaths and affirmations to witnesses. In the place of clause 3 I propose to adopt the recommended clause 2, which makes the same provision, with a little more elaboration. This clause gives exactly the same authority to other officials, namely, the Clerk of the House and the Chairman of any Committee.

The CHAIRMAN.—I draw Senator Millen's attention to standing order 192, which provides that we must deal with clauses, as printed, and proposed new clauses. Clause 2 has been struck out, and it would now be in accordance with our practice to move to substitute the new clause.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Our plan hitherto has been to deal with all the clauses of the Bill, and then propose the new clauses.

The CHAIRMAN.—I do not think that can now be done.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Then I shall now submit the new clause which I propose to substitute for clause 2. The parliamentary draftsman, or the Standing Orders Committee, has made one serious omission, and that is in reference to the interpretation of the word "Committee." The interpretation in the suggested clause is, "Committee" means a Committee of either House," and to that I propose to add the words, "or a Joint Committee of the two Houses." When I introduced this Bill, I recognised that, while we could regulate the taking of evidence before our own Chamber, or a Select Committee, by standing orders, we could not regulate the taking of evidence before a Joint Committee by standing orders; and, therefore, it is necessary to make the provision I have indicated. I move—

That the following proposed new clause be inserted:—

"2. In this Act, unless the contrary intention appears:—

"House" means a House of the Parliament.

"Committee" means a Committee of either House or a Joint Committee of the two Houses.

"The President" means the President of the Senate.

"The Speaker" means the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"The Chairman" means the Chairman of a Committee or the member acting as the Chairman of a Committee.

"Witness" means a person summoned to appear before either House or before a Committee to give evidence or produce documents.

"Documents" includes books."

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—The Government ought, I think, to take some responsibility for this Bill, which is a measure of very great consequence, dealing, as it does, with proposed changes, if they be such, in the procedure of Parliament in regard to witnesses. I know that Senator Neild took a lot of trouble about the Bill last year, when it was referred to the Standing Orders Committee, and I presume that the Attorney-General has considered the effect of the proposed clauses, and, through his representative here, can afford honorable senators some guidance. It is only right that we should be told what are the views of the Government, and whether it is proper we should assent to the proposed new clauses.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—As Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, I may say that these proposed amendments have been before honorable senators for about ten months. The recommendations were printed and circulated amongst honorable senators last session, and, having been printed again this session, were circulated once more about a month ago. Therefore, I do not think any honorable senator can fairly say he has not had time to consider the matter.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Nobody is saying that.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I understood Senator Milten to say so. However, the Standing Orders Committee held a great many meetings, and the parliamentary draftsman was called in to advise. Whether the parliamentary draftsman consulted the Attorney-General I do not know, but it was considered by the Committee that the Bill, as presented by Senator Neild, was defective on some points. Perhaps I am a little out of order in anticipating, but one of the points was that although the Bill, as originally presented, gave power to the Senate, House of Representatives, or any Committee, to administer an oath, it did not compel witnesses to take an oath. Honorable senators may have seen in the press lately a telegram from London, expressing the opinion of the Attorney-General of England in reference to some body in England—I do not exactly know what body, but I think it was the Board of Trade—not having power to compel witnesses to take an oath, although there was power to administer an oath. The Standing Orders Committee took a great deal of trouble about the matter, and were unanimous in the recommendation that the clauses now suggested should be substituted for the Bill as originally introduced. It may, after all, be only a question of draftsmanship, but there are details missing in the original Bill and now recommended for approval. If honorable senators look at the report of the Standing Orders Committee they will see that—

The Committee after due consideration advise the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the Bill, but that its scope should be enlarged by the addition of clauses dealing with the whole matter of the summoning and examination of witnesses.

To do this clauses will have to be inserted for the punishment of witnesses—

- (a) who do not attend when summoned;
- (b) who refuse to be sworn;
- (c) who refuse to answer questions.

I shall not read the whole of the report, but what I have mentioned are the substantive alterations recommended in the original Bill. It is for the Senate to consider whether the Bill shall be passed or not, but the Standing Orders Committee unanimously advise the practical substitution of a new measure.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I beg to point out, sir, that my complaint was not that time had not been given to us to consider the matter. What I asked was that Senator Neild should state what particular clauses in the proposed report of the Standing Orders Committee he proposed to insert in substitution for those struck out. This is not an ordinary amendment that we are asked to accept. The Bill, as originally presented, contained four clauses, two of which might be regarded as purely formal. Now we are asked to accept as amendments on this Bill several clauses which constitute a new Bill from preamble to imprint. It is usual for a Committee, when a Bill has been referred to it, to suggest alterations or modifications of some of its clauses, but in this case we have a completely new Bill submitted, and the report of the Committee also suggests a widening of the scope of the original measure.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator complains that the Standing Orders Committee did too much.

Senator MILLEN.—No; I complain that the honorable senator in charge of the original Bill did too little. I am not seeking to obstruct the passing of the Bill, but I am pointing out my difficulty in dealing with it. I have risen for the second time to remind honorable senators that we are asked to accept certain proposals which, so far as I can see, are entirely different in character and scope from those contained in the original Bill submitted to us.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—With reference to the remarks which have fallen from Senator Symon, I may say that when this matter was previously brought before the Senate by Senator Neild, I stated the attitude of the Government with regard to it. Senator Neild, some time last session, introduced a Bill to give effect to what is intended to be given effect to by this measure. The Bill was then referred to the Standing Orders Committee. That Committee, having considered the measure, brought up a report in connexion with it, which was circulated last session. Honorable senators then had before them the original Bill, a report of the Standing Orders Committee, and the form of the proposed new Bill. I explained that so far as the Government were concerned, they wished to see some legislation of the kind on the statute-book, and, inasmuch as Senator Neild took up the matter in the first instance, and our Standing Orders Committee had reported upon it, the Government were prepared to leave the matter now in the hands of the Senate for its proper consideration. With respect to what shall be inserted in the gap caused by the elimination of clause 2, I confess that I am in somewhat the same position as Senator Millen. Senator Neild has intimated that he intends to adopt the clauses recommended in the Standing Orders Committee's report. That is new to me, and I think we should have had some little notice of the honorable senator's intention to change the form of his Bill in that way before we are asked to vote on the motion now before the Committee.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I stated my intention a month ago.

Senator KEATING.—I have given some consideration and attention to the matter, and I was unaware that it was Senator Neild's intention to do what he has proposed to do to-day. I do not think we should be asked to adopt the new clauses recommended by the Standing Orders Committee without a further opportunity being given to honorable senators to discuss the advantage or otherwise of substituting the Bill recommended by the Standing Orders Committee for that which is now before us.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—If the Standing Orders Committee had intrusted to any honorable senator the conduct of a Bill for an Act to give effect to its recommendations I could understand our present position. We should then be able to consider each of the proposed new clauses in its proper order. We are now, however, being asked to adopt a clause recommended by the Standing Orders Committee in a Bill for an Act which is marked No. 2 on our files, and which was originally introduced by Senator Neild. We are, at the same time, being asked to discuss an amending Bill of seventeen clauses, as compared with the original Bill of four clauses, and which we see almost for the first time. I suggest to Senator Neild that if he is in charge of the proposed new Bill, on behalf of the Standing Orders Committee, he would do well to postpone it. We are being asked to deal now with an entirely new Bill, which we have not even read a first time. I think the proper proceeding would be to start de novo with the new Bill recommended by the Standing Orders Committee.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That is only the honorable and learned senator's customary attitude.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I hope honorable senators will not allow a trifling matter to determine their action in connexion with this Bill. The second reading of the Bill was passed, and it was referred to the Standing Orders Committee, because there was a general impression that its provisions were inadequate. The Standing Orders Committee considered the Bill, with the advice of the parliamentary draughtsman. That officer drew up a Bill giving effect to the recommendations of the Committee, and it was then considered by the Committee and adopted as a part of their report. That report was laid upon the table some weeks ago.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Ten months ago.

Senator MILLEN.—But we are being asked to consider a new Bill.

Senator PEARCE.—Honorable senators are splitting straws. It appears to me that the objection raised is whether Senator Neild should have the honour or distinction of introducing this new Bill. Is not that the sole point?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No.

Senator PEARCE.—That appears to me to be the objection on the other side, because an honorable and learned senator asked whether the Standing Orders Committee had intrusted Senator Neild with the conduct of the measure. The question for the Committee to consider is whether this would be a useful Bill to pass.

Senator CLEMONS.—Which Bill?

Senator PEARCE.—The Bill proposed by the Standing Orders Committee.

Senator CLEMONS.—It has not yet been read a first time.

Senator PEARCE.—After its second reading the original Bill was referred to the Standing Orders Committee.

Senator CLEMONS.—But what has come back to us?

Senator PEARCE.—We have the Standing Orders Committee's report on the Bill. Surely it does not matter which honorable senator moves these amendments on the original Bill, and it does not matter whether Senator Neild adopts that course or withdraws the original Bill, and brings forward the clauses recommended by the Standing Orders Committee in a new Bill? I direct attention to the fact that it is advisable early in the session to determine the powers of Select Committees of the Senate. We have appointed a Select Committee which will probably be sitting shortly. Doubts have been raised as to the power of that Committee to take evidence. I do not personally believe that there is any ground for those doubts, but the passing of this measure will clear up all doubts on the subject, and will place the scope and powers of our Select Committees beyond all question. No honorable senator has yet said that he is opposed to the Bill, and I see no reason why we should not go on with its consideration in the way we have commenced. I appeal to honorable senators not to allow a mere matter of procedure to determine the postponement of the whole question, for that is what appears to be asked for.

Senator MILLEN.—No, the presentation of the matter in a business-like form.

Senator PEARCE.—We have the Bill before us, and I appeal to honorable senators, in dealing with it, to consider the clauses recommended by the Standing Orders Committee as they are submitted.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—Senator Pearce has either misapprehended the position or has failed to put the correct position before the Committee. I have heard no suggestion that Senator Neild should not have the distinction and privilege of conducting the Bill to a successful conclusion. I do not believe that any one entertains the slightest notion of interfering with the honorable senator in that respect. Personally I say, as I did last year, that I think that Senator Neild, having taken the subject up, should carry it to a conclusion. I hold very much the same view as Senator Keating. The Bill, as originally introduced by Senator Neild, was a short Bill of three or four clauses.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I wish to take a point of order. The question before the Committee is the proposed new clause 2.

On that definite proposition it is not open to honorable senators to discuss the progress of the Bill from beginning to end. I take the point of order that it is not competent for honorable senators to discuss the whole Bill on a particular clause.

The CHAIRMAN.—The question before the Committee is the insertion of a proposed new clause. I think that honorable senators are in order in introducing arguments in favour of the postponement of the clause, on the ground that they have not had time to consider it; but they will not be in order in discussing the whole Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Of course, I was not doing so. Senator Pearce, in his remarks, referred to what would have been a very unkindly motive if it had actuated any one in speaking on this question. The suggestion does not affect me, because I hope that Senator Neild will continue to conduct this measure to a successful conclusion. I was going to say that I agree very much with what Senator Keating has said on the subject. In saying that the Government should offer some guidance to the Senate in the matter, I had no intention to suggest that they should take up, or in any way interfere with Senator Neild in the conduct of, the measure. I ask honorable senators to look at the proposed clauses. If the new Bill is adopted, it will be one of the most penal enactments we could pass.

The CHAIRMAN.—I ask the honorable and learned senator to confine himself to the new clause.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — The reason for postponing the consideration of this clause applies to every one of the new clauses sought to be introduced. Senator Neild proposes practically to make of this a new Bill, and, so far as I am aware, he gave other honorable senators no intimation of his intention.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I wish I had the letter which the honorable and learned senator wrote me when he was Attorney-General, asking me to go on with the Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I did not do anything of the kind.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable and learned senator is stating what is not a fact, and he knows it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — The honorable senator is stating what he knows to be without foundation.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable and learned senator knows that what he is saying is not true—a fact.

The CHAIRMAN.—I must ask Senator Neild to withdraw the statement that what Senator Symon is saying is not true.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I did not intend to make it, and it will have been noticed that I corrected myself instantly.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — One does not take very much notice of what the honorable senator says. But now that he has referred to the subject, I may say that I wrote to the honorable senator—

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable and learned senator denied that just now.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I did nothing of the kind. I wrote to the honorable senator inquiring whether he proposed to avail himself of the standing order to resume the proceedings on the Bill he had introduced at the stage it had reached. But he never gave any intimation that he was going to adopt another Bill, as recommended by the Standing Orders Committee, with this title, "An Act relating to Parliamentary Witnesses," in place of his own Bill, with the title, "An Act relating to the taking of evidence by Parliament, or any Committee thereof," and with provisions enabling persons to be arrested, and to be imprisoned for two years, in some cases for five years. Are we to pass provisions of that sort at a moment's notice? It was for that reason I asked the representatives of the Government whether they had given consideration to the subject, and were prepared to guide the Committee as to the desirability of having these very severe provisions inserted. Because, if this Bill is to be enforced, it must be enforced by the Crown.

Senator PEARCE.—Does not that apply to every measure which is passed?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes; but the representatives of the Government ought to be able to say whether the imprisonment proposed is too great or is not great enough. Senator Keating has very properly said that he would like further time to consider the matter, and no one can deny that that is a very reasonable request. The original discussion which took place last year was as to whether we had not all these powers by virtue of the Constitution. It was suggested that a doubt had arisen. You, sir, interjected when I was speaking, "Has the Attorney-General any doubt?" and I said—

I cannot say that I am oppressed with any great doubt on the subject.

In point of fact, I have no doubt whatever that the whole of these powers are enjoyed under the Constitution. But if it is desirable to remove the doubt, unquestionably this Bill is a perfectly proper one to be introduced. The question is, are we to enact, in place of a Bill of three or four clauses, a Bill of seventeen clauses, containing penal provisions of a very drastic and severe order? The Committee certainly ought to have an opportunity to consider these proposals, now that it is intimated that they are to be inserted practically en bloc, before we seek to place them on the statute-book.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I listened to a second-reading speech on a short Bill without apprehension of any wrong arising out of its provisions; but now we are asked to accept a Bill with eighteen strongly-worded clauses affecting the liberty of the subject, without any information having been afforded. Surely a second-reading speech should be made when we are asked to pass an entirely new Bill, lock, stock, and barrel. I have not the least objection to Senator Neild getting the credit of introducing a Bill of this vast importance, but I should much prefer that it was introduced by the Government. At any rate, the Government should be sponsor to the Bill, if not its actual father. We are asked to take a departure from parliamentary procedure.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—The best thing we can do is to get on with business. This Bill was introduced last year by Senator Neild, and after it was debated and read a second time it was referred to the Standing Orders Committee. Since the presentation of its report ample opportunity has been afforded to honorable senators to make up their minds, but now, apparently, for some reason or other, they do not feel inclined to go on with the Bill. I do not see what they can have to cavil at. The amendments suggested by the parliamentary draftsman can be embodied in the Bill.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—Merely to show that there has been no surprise sprung on the Committee, that honorable senators have had every opportunity not only of pursuing the proposals of the Standing Orders Committee, but of knowing my intention, explicitly uttered here, I propose to refer to what I said exactly four weeks ago. I said—

I move—

That this Senate resolve itself into Committee of the whole to consider the Parliamentary Evidence Bill.

I understand that the amendments which have been proposed in this Bill by the Standing Orders Committee, and which are fairly extensive, have only very recently been received from the Government Printer. What it is proposed to go into Committee to consider is really the report of the Standing Orders Committee. The revised copy of the Bill, however, has not been circulated sufficiently long, I think, to enable the Committee to usefully proceed this afternoon. Therefore, I only propose to go into Committee formally to enable the report of that body to be received, and possibly to pass the first clause of the Bill, so that honorable senators may have full opportunity to consider the amendments proposed.

What would have been thought of me by honorable senators, who were clamouring against proceeding with the measure, if, in face of the recommendations of the judicial tribunal of the Senate who prepared a number of elaborate machinery details, I had chosen to come here and sweep all their recommendations on one side, and set up my individual clauses in preference to theirs? That is what Senator Clemons is girding at.

Senator CLEMONS.—We are suggesting that the honorable senator should do just the opposite.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable and learned senator is girding at me because I am willing to accept the clauses drafted by that judicial tribunal in preference to my own. The question as to who is to have any satisfaction from the passing of the measure is a small matter. Because if any one seeks for kudos as to its origin, the whole Senate has not the power to take from me the satisfaction of knowing that I initiated the measure. If honorable senators simply choose, by some very unusual process which I do not, for an instant, suppose any decent majority here would propose to do, to take the measure out of my hands, they are welcome to take that course. They will only be dancing to my original fiddling. If Senator Clemons wishes to dance to my fiddling, let him do so; I shall be perfectly satisfied. I do not choose to take up this attitude of personal interest, but I do submit that it is utterly unfair that, when I have followed out a strict course of agreement with the wishes of the majority and am simply asking the Committee to consider an individual clause containing no penalty, but only interpretations prepared by the Standing Orders Committee, I should be met with accusations of a character which are rather unusual to be used in Parliament with reference to one occupying such an absolutely clear position as I do.

Senator GRAY.—What are the accusations?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable senator is too good a member of the Chamber to make any accusation, and I do not refer to him. I am sure he would not do such a thing.

Senator GRAY.—I do not think I heard any accusations made.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD. — Senator Symon wishes to know what the action of the Government is in this matter. It is a most extraordinary thing that, when I am willing to adopt the recommendations of the Standing Orders Committee I should be girded at and brow-beaten to go on with my own clauses, and not those prepared by what I am willing to recognise as a wiser tribunal than that of any single intellect. The Minister representing the Government in this matter made this statement to the Senate on the 27th July—

The course which Senator Neild proposes to follow meets with the concurrence and support of Ministers, namely, to have the Bill and report now remitted to a Committee of the whole Senate; but, inasmuch as the suggested amendments and the report of the Standing Orders Committee have not been printed sufficiently long to enable honorable senators to acquaint themselves with all particulars, it is thought best that after the consideration of one or two of the minor clauses this afternoon progress should be reported, and the consideration of the Bill in Committee should be resumed at a convenient date.

I named a date a whole month ahead, and now I am accused of something like an attempt to spring a surprise on the Committee. If honorable senators, after having the report of a Standing Orders Committee placed in their hands four weeks ago, choose to come here and plead ignorance of the document, they are making a confession, either of personal carelessness, or of intellectual incapacity, which they would be the first to resent if any one ventured to address such a suggestion to any one of them. I do not. I do not think that honorable senators are ignorant of the details of this matter. But I do think that something that occurred last night accounts for the sudden forgetfulness.

Senator FRASER.—Did the honorable senator do anything wrong last night?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I think that my venerable friend's own experience, and his knowledge of my character, should be a sufficient answer to that question.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—Before Senator Neild turned up the reference to my remarks when this Bill was last before honorable senators, I had referred to them. I find that what he proposed to do was to get the Bill into Committee, in order that we might consider it as it stood in conjunction with the amendments recommended by the Standing Orders Committee. I, on behalf of the Government, expressed their concurrence in that course, and indicated that it was not intended to go any further with the Bill on that occasion, in order that honorable senators might have an opportunity to consider the recommendations. The attitude of the Government is an indorsement of the recommendations of the Standing Orders Committee. We were prepared to accept a Bill of the character recommended. The subject had been considered by the Government. The adjournment that was suggested after the disposal of the first clause was to enable honorable senators to acquaint themselves with what was proposed. If Senator Neild proposes to confine himself to the consideration of the Bill as originally submitted, and to the amendments recommended by the Standing Orders Committee, I do not think that I should be adhering to the attitude previously taken up if I opposed him.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I think that it is a matter of considerable regret that when any matter, even of so apparently innocent a character as this, comes before the Senate, one is not able to voice an objection, either to the measure itself, or to the procedure proposed to be adopted, without being met by suggestions as to motives, such as Senator Pearce ventured to make, or by open discourtesy, such as that of which I complain, on the part of Senator Neild. Speaking with his back to me, Senator Neild made some reference to a document which he was about to quote. Not being able to hear, I asked him what it was that he was quoting. The Committee is aware of the answer that he gave. If we have reached a stage in debate when an honorable senator cannot ask another to name the document from which he is quoting, without receiving a discourteous reply, it indicates a deplorable condition of feeling which is not likely to conduce to the smooth and satisfactory transaction of public business. I will leave Senator Pearce to deal with his insinuation as to motives, merely asking him whether it is not a sudden liking for Select Committees which has led to this community of interest between himself and the honorable senator in charge of the Bill. One of the objections which I see to the procedure proposed is this: Senator Neild proposes to strike out two clauses in addition to the one which has been negatived. In doing so we shall negative certain propositions. He proposes to ask us to adopt certain clauses in substitution. Thereby he asks us to reaffirm the same propositions as we shall have previously negatived. Now, without claiming to have an intimate knowledge of the Standing Orders of the Senate, I do not think that that can be done.

Senator PEARCE.—Is not that splitting straws?

Senator MILLEN.—I suppose it is always splitting straws when an objection is made to a course which the honorable senator wishes to have taken. We have struck out a proposition to the effect that evidence may be taken on oath. Senator Neild now wishes us to affirm a clause containing the principle that evidence may be taken on oath. I submit that it is not possible to affirm a principle one moment which we negatived a few moments before.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I rise to order. The question before the Committee is the insertion of new clause 2, and that clause is not in conflict with anything that has been struck out. Therefore, the honorable senator cannot apply the objections he mentions to the clause proposed to be inserted.

Senator MILLEN.—What we are doing is to strike out a clause affirming a certain principle, and Senator Neild has intimated that later on he proposes to move the insertion of another clause affirming the same principle. It seems to me that either we must throw aside our Standing Orders, or must carry them out, in which case the only course will be for Senator Neild to withdraw the Bill at this stage, with a view of introducing another one.

The CHAIRMAN.—I have already indicated to Senator Neild, when he proposed to strike out a number of clauses, that standing order 195 provides that no clause or amendment shall be at any time proposed which is substantially the same as one already negatived by the Committee. But Senator Millen is wrong in supposing that there is anything in this proposed new clause which is in conflict with a clause that has been negatived.

Senator MILLEN.—I was referring to clause 11.

The CHAIRMAN.—It will conduce to the speedy transaction of business if we deal with clauses as they arise. Clause 2 has been struck out, and it is proposed to insert a new clause. When we reach clause 11, if we have already struck out a clause which embodies the principle contained in clause 11, Senator Millen can take a point of order.

Senator CLEMONS.—I submit that this is not the time for the insertion of new clauses in the Bill. If Senator Neild assures us that clause 2 in the Bill, as prepared by the Standing Orders Committee, is to be in substitution for clause 2 in the Bill introduced by him, I have nothing more to say. But if, as I gather, there is to be a new clause, I submit that this is not the time to deal with it.

The CHAIRMAN.—It was our practice prior to the adoption of the present Standing Orders to take new clauses after all the clauses as printed had been dealt with. But since the present Standing Orders have been in operation it is in order to take clauses as printed and proposed new clauses in their order.

Senator CLEMONS.—Can a new clause be taken now?

The CHAIRMAN.—Yes.

Senator MILLEN.—I wish to know whether you rule that paragraph 1 of standing order 192 means that we can take clauses, as printed, and proposed new clauses sandwiched in with them, or whether the proper procedure is not to deal with printed clauses first and proposed new clauses subsequently?

The CHAIRMAN.—The practice has been, since the adoption of the new Standing Orders, to take new clauses in their order as proposed, and not to wait until the whole of the clauses of the Bill have been dealt with. The point has been taken on several occasions, and rulings have been given to that effect.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—As I apparently misunderstood Senator Millen in regard to the question which he put to me a little while ago, and, owing to the misunderstanding, replied with an asperity that the circumstances did not warrant, and which our personal friendship one for the other would warrant still less, I offer to him in the freest manner possible the expression of my great regret that I misunderstood him, and made a reply that was unworthy of myself.

Senator MILLEN.—After that, the honorable senator must get his Bill.

Proposed new clause agreed to.

Clause 3—

The President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Chairman or member presiding at any sitting of any Committee of the Senate or of the House of Representatives shall each have authority to administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).

—Is it proposed to retain clause 3? If so, what becomes of clause 3 in the recommendations of the Standing Orders Committee?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—It will not be necessary to strike out clause 3, but simply to amend it so as to make it conform with the recommendations of the Standing Orders Committee, that the oath should be administered by the Clerk. We might so amend the clause as to provide that, instead of the President or Speaker administering the oath, the Clerk or the Chairman of the Committee should do so.

Senator PEARCE.—Strike out all the clause, and then propose the provisions recommended by the Standing Orders Committee.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—There is a difficulty about taking that course under standing order No. 192. To act on the suggestion of the honorable senator, the Bill would have to be recommitted.

Senator PEARCE.—Then recommit the Bill.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am quite willing to adopt that course. I ask the Committee to negative clause 3.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—If we start amending clauses we shall only give rise to great confusion. Senator Neild gave the Committee to understand that he would ask us to strike out the remaining clauses, with a view to considering the clauses recommended by the Standing Orders Committee.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I suggest that it would be much better if the House were to resume, and Senator Neild were to seek the assistance of the officers of the House in putting the Bill into the form in which he asks the Senate to deal with it, showing in red ink the suggested amendment. We do not seem to be proceeding now in the right way to legislate on an important matter of this kind. I make the suggestion with a view, as I said last year, of removing a doubt which exists as to whether Committees of Parliament have, under the Constitution, power to administer an oath. I ask Senator NEILD, in the most good-humoured way, to adopt the course I have indicated, and I shall be glad to afford him any assistance, which, it would appear, the Government are not inclined to extend.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I accept Senator Symon's suggestion—tendered in a humorous spirit—as one of the most cheerful I have ever had offered for my acceptance. But as all that the honorable and learned senator desires may be accomplished by a certain number of honorable senators simply saying "no" to the two clauses as they are submitted, I do not feel I should be justified in burdening any one in the way suggested. If Senator Symon will say "no," he will, as I say, achieve his object, and I shall be happy to join the honorable and learned senator in the pleasant duo.

Clause negatived.

Clause 4 negatived.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—There now remain the title of the Bill and clauses 1 and 2, and I propose to submit clause 3 as recommended by the Standing Orders Committee. The Bill, as originally drawn, was in strict accord with the Act controlling the British House of Commons, and was settled by the parliamentary draftsman at my request. The new clauses submitted are an elaboration of the British Act: and I hope that now we shall proceed with the consideration of the measure with reasonable celerity. I move—

That the following proposed new clause be inserted:—

"3. (1) Either House may summon witnesses to appear before it to give evidence and produce documents.

(2) Any Committee, if thereto authorized by the Senate or the House of Representatives, as the case may be, may summon witnesses to appear before it to give evidence and produce documents."

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—Is there any precedent for the first sub-clause, which appears to me to be derogatory to the power of Parliament? There has always been power on the part of Parliament to summon witnesses; and this provision would appear to reduce a legislative House to the level of an ordinary court, which may require power to summon witnesses to be given to it. If there had been a precedent for the first sub-clause, I have no doubt the fact would have been stated in the margin, as in the case of the second sub-clause. I take no responsibility for this provision, nor does Senator NEILD himself.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD. — Senator Symon must take some responsibility, because he was a member of the Standing Orders Committee, who made the recommendation.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator is entirely mistaken.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Then I beg the honorable and learned senator's pardon.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Which I at once grant; but I ask the honorable senator not to be so ebullient in temper when he thinks some one else has made an error.

Senator GUTHRIE. — Senator Symon's name appears as a member of the Standing Orders Committee.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I have the honour to be a member of that Committee now, but I was not a member when this matter was considered. Had I been in office, I should have done as I did last year — I should have given the matter careful and detailed consideration, and suggested any amendments I thought would improve the measure. I now make the suggestion that the clause is derogatory to this Parliament, and ask whether there is any precedent for such legislation.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). — I think the honorable and learned senator will find a precedent in the Act of Parliament which was passed to give the House of Commons this power.

Proposed new clause agreed to.

Amendments (by Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD) agreed to—

That the following proposed new clauses be inserted:—

"4. A summons to a witness may be in accordance with Form A in the schedule, and shall be signed by the President, or by the Speaker, or by the Chairman, as the case may be."

"5. A summons to a witness may be served upon the witness either personally or by being left at or sent by post to his usual place of business or of abode."

"6.—(1) If any witness, upon whom a summons under this Act has been served, fails to appear or to continue in attendance in obedience to the summons, the President, or the Speaker, as the case may be, may issue a warrant for his apprehension.

(2) The warrant may be in accordance with Form B in the schedule, and shall authorize the apprehension of the witness, and his being brought before the House or the Committee, and his detention in custody for that purpose until he is released by order of the President, or the Speaker, as the case may be.

(3) The warrant may be executed by the person to whom it is addressed or by any person whom he appoints to assist him in its execution, and the person executing the warrant shall have power to break and enter any building, place, or ship for the purpose of executing it."

Amendment (by Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD) proposed—

That the following proposed new clause be inserted:—

"7. Any witness who, being apprehended by virtue of a warrant of apprehension issued under this Act, escapes from custody, shall be guilty of an indictable offence.

Penalty: Two years' imprisonment."

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I should like to ask what court will have jurisdiction to deal with offences under this clause?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I think the courts to deal with offences under the laws of the Commonwealth are already provided for.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Not courts for criminal offences.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—This matter was considered by the Standing Orders Committee, and I was in doubt myself as to what courts would deal with offences under the Bill. The parliamentary draftsman considered the matter, and I think, though I am not quite sure, that he consulted the Attorney-General.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No, he did not.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER. — I think the honorable and learned senator was not Attorney-General at that time last year.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I was Attorney-General when this Bill was before us.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—At any rate, the Parliamentary Draftsman appeared before the Standing Orders Committee, and told us that he did not think it was necessary to indicate what courts could try offences under the Bill. As I say, I have some doubt, and I raised the question; but it is such a long time ago that I forget the reasons—though reasons were given—on which the parliamentary draftsman based his opinion.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—It is very difficult, as the President would be the first to acknowledge, to determine a matter of this kind, and I should be sorry to give an opinion offhand.

The same difficulty which Senator Sir Richard Baker has suggested occurs at once to any one who looks at the clause. The High Court, for instance, has no jurisdiction at present, and, unless there is some other mode of dealing with offences, the matter requires elucidation. I point out, however, that this Bill, if passed, will, probably give rise to a good deal of litigation, when an opportunity will be presented of determining this very important question.

Proposed new clause agreed to.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I move—

That the following proposed new clause be inserted:—

"8. Whoever assaults, resists, molests, or obstructs any person in the execution of a warrant of apprehension issued under this Act shall be guilty of an indictable offence. . . .

Penalty: Three years' imprisonment."

I am already on two Committees of the Senate, but I am not, and have not been, a member of the Standing Orders Committee. I, therefore, have no knowledge of the proceedings of that Committee. If any question should arise on these clauses, I shall be grateful to the President, or to any member of the Standing Orders Committee, who can throw any light upon it. I admit that it is of no use to appeal to me as to why the Standing Orders Committee have recommended certain provisions, because I do not know.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—We really have arrived at a most extraordinary stage in the consideration of this Bill. I do not blame Senator Neild for saying that he is not here to answer a question as to what Courts shall deal with these matters.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It is not a question of a Court; it is a question of apprehension.

Senator CLEMONS.—There is a penalty of three years provided, and I presume that that cannot be imposed without the interference of some Court. If Senator Neild can indicate the Court which will deal with these offences, I shall be glad if he will do so. Senator Baker has informed the Committee that the parliamentary draftsman told the Standing Orders Committee that, in his opinion, it was not necessary to indicate the Court. I think it is most necessary. At the same time, I think it is quite impossible. I hope that Senator Baker will be able to give some reason why the Standing Orders Committee have recommended the adoption of penal clauses, which must be quite futile.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—It is a long time since the Standing Orders Committee considered this matter, and I do not pretend to recollect everything that took place. I do remember that I raised the question as to what Court should be competent to try these offences, and I pointed out that the Commonwealth Judges had no criminal jurisdiction. The parliamentary draftsman attended, and convinced the Standing Orders Committee that I was wrong, and that State Courts, or the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth, could try these cases. Whether that contention is right or wrong, I am not now prepared to say, but we were convinced at the time, and it is too much to ask me what arguments were used by the parliamentary draftsman ten months ago to convince the Standing Orders Committee. If there is any doubt on the subject, it would, perhaps, be as well to get the opinion of the Attorney-General. I should not take the responsibility of saying that a Court need not be indicated, because I had doubts on the subject before, and raised the question. As I have said, we were convinced at the time by the parliamentary draftsman that my doubts were not well founded.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I suggest that the best course to pursue in the circumstances is to postpone the clause. I am sure that Senator Neild will not ask the Committee to rush this clause through after what we have heard from Senator Baker.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—In all fairness to honorable senators, if Senator Neild did not know anything about the reasons for the proposed alterations in this measure, it was his duty to get that information from the Standing Orders Committee. As a layman, I am trying to worry through the real meaning of these clauses, and I must look to Senator Neild, as sponsor for the Bill, for information. When the honorable senator admits that he does not know why certain alterations are suggested, he should at least name some member of the Standing Orders Committee who can give the information which he is himself unable to give.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I have always had the impression that it was competent for the Commonwealth Parliament in its legislation to define certain statutory offences which were not in existence prior to the establishment of Federation.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—It has done so in the Customs Act.

Senator KEATING.—And that every Court in a State which would be capable of taking cognizance of common law or State statutory offences of a similar character would not only be capable, but would be bound, when necessary, to take cognizance of offences that were created by the Commonwealth statute. We must always bear in mind sub-section xxxix. of section 51 of the Constitution, under which it is provided that the Parliament shall, subject to the Constitution, have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to—xxxix. Matters incidental to the execution of any power vested by this Constitution in the Parliament or in either House thereof, or in the Government of the Commonwealth, or in the Federal judicature, or in any Department or officer of the Commonwealth.

It is a very well-known principle of jurisprudence, and I might almost say it is the fundamental principle of jurisprudence, in connexion with legislation, that all legislation to be effective must have some sanctions attached to it, some prospect of penalties or punishment held out by the law, and backed up by the strong arm of the law, to compel adherence on the part of everybody to the provisions of such legislation. If we have power to legislate in any particular direction, we have power also to render our legislation effective by providing adequate sanctions. We have power to provide the way in which parliamentary evidence shall be taken, and incidental to that power we have the necessary power to compel the observance of that legislation.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—If we have power to impose a duty, we have power to enforce the performance of that duty by imposing a penalty.

Senator KEATING.—Exactly.

Senator CLEMONS.—What Court will impose this penalty?

Senator KEATING.—Any Court in the Commonwealth capable of dealing with an indictable offence. The covering section 5 of the Constitution provides that—

This Act, and all laws made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth under the Constitution, shall be binding on the Courts, Judges, and people of every State, and of every part of the Commonwealth, notwithstanding anything in the laws of any State.

I think that is intended to impose upon the Courts of the States, and of every part of the Commonwealth, the necessity of regarding, recognising, and acting under Commonwealth laws. If we provide that a certain thing shall be an indictable offence, any one who has committed, or is alleged to have committed, that indictable offence in any State of the Commonwealth can be prosecuted as he would ordinarily be prosecuted in a State matter in relation to common law, or in respect of a State statute matter, which was the subject of indictment. We provide simply that in certain circumstances a person shall be guilty of an indictable offence, and he can then be prosecuted in any Court of the State in which he is that has power to take cognizance of indictable offences, and can be dealt with in accordance with the procedure of that Court in respect of all indictable offences. We have that full power, and if we could not throw upon the Courts of the States the obligation to give effect to Commonwealth provisions in respect to indictable offences, we should find ourselves hampered and crippled in the exercise of almost all the powers given to us under the Constitution.

Senator MILLEN.—The question is not whether we have power, but whether we have taken legislative means to give effect to our enactment. We have done so in civil cases, but have we done so in criminal cases?

Senator KEATING.—As soon as we provide that a certain thing shall be an indictable offence we create an offence punishable by proceedings on indictment. Having done that, every Court of a State competent to take cognizance of such matters at present, is, by the covering section 5 of the Constitution, competent to take cognizance of this indictable offence when brought before it.

Senator DOBSON.—The law officers think that no particular section is necessary to confer this jurisdiction.

Senator KEATING.—Apparently.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—As we have already passed clause 7, providing for a penalty, it does not appear to me that we need stop now. But I make a definite promise that I shall institute full inquiries into this matter—other honorable senators may do the same if they please—and if, at a later stage, it should seem in any way desirable to re-discuss clauses 7 and 8, I shall be quite willing to consent to a recommitment of the Bill for that purpose.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I have a word or two to say on the penalties proposed. It appears to me that in the preparation of Bills for the Commonwealth we have in every case adopted the maximum penalty for an offence which prevails anywhere. Honorable senators will notice from the marginal notes of the clauses in the report of the Standing Orders Committee that this legislation is not based on the legislation in any particular place. The Committee would appear to have jumped from Canada to Queensland, and have in every case adopted the highest penalty. If Canadian legislation suggests the highest penalty, they have copied the Canadian legislation, and if Queensland or New South Wales legislation proposes a higher penalty for some particular offence, they have adopted the Queensland or New South Wales provision.

Senator DOBSON.—It is merely a maximum penalty in every case.

Senator MILLEN.—I quite recognise that, but I am referring to the tendency in our Commonwealth legislation to make penalties as high as possible.

Senator PEARCE.—What is the penalty in New South Wales for this offence?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Seven years.

Senator MILLEN.—I do not think it is. I think that the only corresponding enactment that we have in New South Wales is the Royal Commissions Act, and there is no seven years penalty provided for in that Act.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I think there is in the Parliamentary Evidence Act.

Senator MILLEN.—I suggest to the honorable senator in charge of the Bill that the maximum penalty proposed for an offence of this kind is too high. I venture to say that if we take the Acts passed by the several Parliaments, we shall find that the penalties imposed by them for such offences exceed those imposed by the legislation of any other civilized country.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—Three years does seem to be a very high maximum penalty, and I am willing to reduce it.

Senator GUTHRIE.—In the original Bill the honorable senator proposed a penalty of five years.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That was for perjury.

Senator MILLEN.—It was for quite a different offence.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If we are on the side of mercy, I am sure we shall have the support of Senator Guthrie.

Senator SIR JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think that Senator Neild will be disposed to reduce the penalties when he is reminded that this offence is somewhat similar to the ordinary offence of resisting the police, which is dealt with by a police magistrate, and a penalty—usually a monetary one—is inflicted according to the degree of resistance.

Senator GUTHRIE.—A fine of £20 or £30.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The penalty may be imprisonment for a week or a fortnight or a month. It is not desirable to cover the statute-book with offences, and make things criminal which contain no criminal element. The committing of offences is bad, and necessarily the arm of the law should extend to them and punish them. On the other hand, there is nothing more to be avoided in legislation than creating new offences and attaching heavy terms of imprisonment to them.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—What does the honorable and learned senator suggest?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The resisting of the police, or the resisting of a warrant of apprehension, ought not to be made an indictable offence, but an offence punishable on summary conviction before a police magistrate. In the preceding clause, the expression used is "escaping from custody," not "escaping from custody without reasonable cause." The escaping from custody may have been unintentional. We cannot expect laymen like Senator Neild to be familiar with all these matters. I merely call attention to them because we know that "resisting the police" is an offence usually punishable on summary conviction. No doubt a Judge who was trying a case under this provision would tell the jury in certain circumstances that the offence was contemptible, and the charge ought not to have been brought, but still the jury would be entitled to return a verdict of guilty, and so brand the man as a convicted felon, when, perhaps, what he did was, after all, very venial. I invite Senator Neild not to take the Bill out of Committee this evening, but to consider whether these offences may not be treated like the ordinary offence of resisting the police, punishable on summary conviction.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—There is so much in what has been urged by Senator Symon, that I am rather inclined to agree with him. I have seen a Serjeant-at-Arms resisted in a Legislative Assembly.

Senator GUTHRIE.—But this is a case of assaulting a person.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Well, I have seen an assault committed on a Serjeant-at-Arms. A man can commit an assault on a person by merely pointing a loaded rifle at him, although he is 1,000 yards away. Perhaps the Standing Orders Committee erred on the side of severity in this matter. As a layman, I am not sufficiently acquainted with the intricacies of legal procedure to instantly suggest the phraseology of an amendment which would bring this particular offence into the category of an offence punishable on summary conviction. If Senator Keating cannot supply me with the words of an amendment, I would ask the Committee to postpone the clause.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). — Before the clause is postponed I would ask honorable senators to consider the position of the Senate. It is suggested that if a warrant is issued by the Senate, it may be set at naught, that a person may obstruct the officer intrusted with the execution of a warrant, and that only a small offence will thereby be committed. I take the view that the position of the Senate is such that it ought to enforce its power and authority by severe punishment. I am not wedded to a term of three or two years, but I submit that we ought not to bring the Senate down to the position of a police magistrate.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think that Senator Baker has entirely misunderstood what I said. I did not say or suggest for a moment that the Senate should be brought down to the position of a police court. What I do say is that the dignity of the Senate does not require to be supported by creating indictable offences, and making a man a criminal, liable to be placed in the dock, simply because he may have technically obstructed the execution of a warrant for his apprehension.

Senator TRENWITH. — In that case the criminal is made, not by the Senate, but by himself.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Surely a penalty can be imposed which does not require a man to be charged with a criminal offence, and branded as a felon. "Obstructing the execution of a warrant" is, I repeat, simply "resisting the police." The warrant will not be executed by the Senate, but by an executive officer, probably a policeman. If there is a resistance of a constable, that surely is punishable in a Court of summary jurisdiction. What I object to is that the Senate should make that act an indictable offence, however venial it may be. In this country we ought not to be so ready to create indictable offences punishable by imprisonment. Of course it may be said that the dignity of the Senate requires that no ordinary penalty should be inflicted, but that we ought either to give a year's imprisonment or go back to the time of the Inquisition and satisfy our dignity by handing the man over to the rack and the thumb-screw.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Do not exaggerate.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is only a question of degree.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Cannot the honorable and learned senator leave that to the Court? It will discriminate.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am quite willing to leave the matter to the Court, but we are asked to say that it shall be an indictable offence. Let us look at the next clause—

Whoever, by act or omission, dissuades or prevents any witness from obeying a summons under this Act shall be guilty of an indictable offence.

I cannot understand how you can, by omission, dissuade a man from attending, but still there it is provided in the clause. I am not responsible for the Bill, and I merely take the liberty of pointing out these matters with a view to making it sensible, and preventing the Senate from becoming a laughing stock.

Senator KEATING.—It might be by omitting to deliver a notice.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Of course no one can tell what the clause does mean; but I shall accept that as possible. If a man omits to serve a notice to produce some books is that to be an indictable offence? Surely not! What Senator Neild said is very reasonable, and I am sure he will have the assistance of Senator Keating to prepare suitable amendments. He shall have any assistance I can give him.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—In my opinion the expression "indictable offence" in these clauses is open to some criticism. The Acts Interpretation Act of 1904 does not contain a definition of what the term was deemed to include, but section 27 of the Acts Interpretation Act of 1901 says—

In any Act unless the contrary intention appears—

(a) The word indictment shall include information.

In some States, for instance, in Tasmania, the Crown never prosecutes for a criminal offence by indictment, but by what is called a criminal information.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That does not alter the character of the offence.

Senator KEATING.—No; but the Act of 1901 makes express provision to include "information" in "indictment." It might be argued from that fact that the word "indictment," or any adaptation of the idea of indictment, is always to carry a similar idea in connexion with "information"; there is a rule of construction which provides for that. But where an Act constitutes an offence, and the liberty of the subject is involved, it always receives the most strict interpretation—as strict as possible against the Crown, and as favorable as possible to the accused. It might be argued that although we had constituted a thing an indictable offence in a certain State in which informations took the place of indictments, it would not be an offence that could be dealt with in its Courts. This matter came under my notice a little while ago, after we had provided in the Wireless Telegraphy Bill for a very heavy maximum penalty. Senator Millen raised a criticism as to its imposition. Having inserted a very heavy maximum penalty, which carried with it the alternative of imprisonment, I brought down a new clause, which I would recommend to Senator Neild as the form of a clause which would meet all these cases and perhaps satisfy the criticism of Senator Symon. It reads in this way—

Proceedings for any offence against this Act may be instituted in any Court of summary jurisdiction, and any person proceeded against under this section may be dealt with summarily, or may be committed for trial.

If that provision, with necessary alterations, were adopted, it would be competent for the prosecuting officer to prosecute, in the first instance, in a Court of summary jurisdiction, and if that Court considered that the circumstances surrounding the alleged offence were so trivial as not to warrant the infliction of punishment above its maximum powers, in accordance with the Acts Interpretation Act, it would proceed to deal summarily with the man. But if the circumstances of the case disclosed an offence of such great gravity that it deserved very severe punishment, then the Court could exercise its option of dealing with the man there and then, or sending him on for trial. Honorable senators will notice that in clause 8A of the Wireless Telegraphy Bill I did not adopt the words of the Acts Interpretation Act, "may be prosecuted on indictment," but used these words "may be dealt with summarily, or may be committed for trial." If Senator Neild, after providing for his penalties, would provide that the proceedings in respect of any offence may be instituted in a Court of summary jurisdiction, I think it would meet the case.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I understand that Senator Keating practically suggests the omission of the word "indictable," and at a later stage in the Bill proposes the insertion of a provision similar to that in the Wireless Telegraphy Bill, which should meet with the approval of Senator Symon. If the offence is trivial it can be dealt with summarily. If it is a grave offence, the person can be committed for trial at the discretion of the magistrate. That is a wise proposal, and I should be very glad to see it inserted. I am prepared to move that the proposed new clause be amended by leaving out the word "indictable" and by leaving out the word "three," with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "one."

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—It appears to me that not only should the term of imprisonment be reduced, but that there ought to be an alternative money penalty. Some of the offences might be of such a trivial character that they would be met by the imposition of a small fine. What the amount should be I am not in a position to state. Perhaps £20 would be sufficient. If Senator Neild will agree to amend the clause in that direction I shall be satisfied.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I agree to that.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I remind the Committee that we have passed a Royal Commission Act, under which the penalty is £50. I therefore hope that Senator Neild will consider the wisdom of abolishing the term of imprisonment altogether, and substituting a money penalty.

Senator GUTHRIE (South Australia).—I hope that Senator Neild will not give way an inch in the direction suggested. It would simply mean that the man who had money need not go to gaol, whilst the man who could not pay a fine would have to be imprisoned. That would be class legislation in favour of the rich. Who is the man who would be likely to refuse to give evidence before a Select Committee? He who had something to hide, and would probably have been making money by improper practices. A fine of £50 or £100 would be nothing to such a man. I trust that we shall adhere to the Bill as drafted by the Standing Orders Committee, who have thoroughly considered the subject. This amendment has been asked for by some who represent the wealthy portion of the community, and who wish to shape the Bill to suit them.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does not the honorable senator represent the wealthy portion of the community?

Senator GUTHRIE.—I endeavour to represent all classes, and to do justice to all. To insert a money penalty in a Bill of this character is not to do justice to all classes, because it means that the man who cannot pay £25 has to go to gaol. I would make no exception. If a man breaks the law, let him suffer for it, and let the same penalty be incurred whether he is rich or poor.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator wants to have imprisonment for the well-to-do man and a fine for the poor man.

Senator GUTHRIE.—I do not. I have expressed the very opposite opinion. I would serve all alike. What is the use of fining a poor man £20? He has not got the money, and must go to gaol.

Senator MILLEN.—Has the honorable senator overlooked the fact that for a second offence a person may be imprisoned?

Senator GUTHRIE.—If a man commits an offence a second time it is right to imprison him. Witnesses from all sections of the community are examined by Select Committees. A witness may have been making large sums of money out of the very practices about which he is to be examined by a Committee. Take some of the cases inquired into by the Butter Commission in Victoria. Some of the men were making piles of money out of secret commissions.

Senator TRENWITH.—And refused to produce their books.

Senator GUTHRIE.—It would be quite easy for a man of that kind to pay a fine of £500, and still have a large credit balance.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I propose to reduce the three years' imprisonment to one year, and in the next clause to provide for a penalty of £50 as a maximum. The amount of fine actually inflicted might be only 5s.

Senator GUTHRIE.—That is what I protest against. The honorable senator proposes to regard a fine of £50 as equivalent to imprisonment for twelve months. The man who can raise £50 is to receive no more trouble, but the man who cannot afford £50 must go to prison. That is most unfair.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — Can the honorable senator give us an illustration of what he means?

Senator GUTHRIE.—Take the case of the Machine Shearers' Union in New South Wales. That bogus union absolutely refused to allow its secretary to appear before a Royal Commission, and special legislation had to be passed to deal with the matter. Suppose a Select Committee of the Senate sits, witnesses are summoned, and on the day of meeting a witness does not arrive. The members of the Committee will have been brought from all parts of Australia at great inconvenience and expense. What is to be done with a person who assaults the official sent to serve a warrant of the Senate?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Supposing a person obstructs by lying down, and saying that the officer must carry him?

Senator GUTHRIE.—Such a person is resisting the execution of the warrant. I heard Senator Symon, in a case where a man had said to the police, "What a shame to arrest that man," describe that as resistance deserving of the highest penalty under the law.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Where did the honorable senator hear me say that?

Senator GUTHRIE.—At Port Adelaide. I had to pay the man's fine, so that I have reason to remember the case.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not remember the case.

Senator MILLEN.—According to Senator Guthrie's doctrine, such a man ought to go to gaol without the option of a fine.

Senator GUTHRIE.—In my opinion, a man who assaults an officer of the Senate assaults the Senate, because he is defying an order of the Senate.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Cannot the honorable senator imagine a case of obstruction which might be met by a fine of five shillings?

Senator GUTHRIE.—I do not think a monetary fine would meet a case of the kind.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Then the honorable senator would always punish by imprisonment?

Senator GUTHRIE.—Yes, in cases of that kind.

Senator GRAY.—The honorable senator would always punish by giving two years' imprisonment?

Senator GUTHRIE.—I have not said anything of the kind. What I say is that some men have plenty of money, and to them a fine is no punishment.

Senator FRASER.—Leave it to the Court to say whether the fine shall be 5s. or £100.

Senator GUTHRIE.—I am content to leave it to the Court to say whether the imprisonment shall be for an hour or for a year.

Senator FRASER.—Then the honorable senator does not trust the Court?

Senator GUTHRIE.—I do, but not so far as money is concerned.

Senator GRAY.—To some men, an hour's imprisonment would be as cruel a punishment as a year's imprisonment to others.

Senator TRENWITH.—The imprisonment may easily be avoided by obeying the summons.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Probably a fine of £5 would not be half so cruel to one man as a fine of 5s. to another, who could not afford to pay, and must go to gaol. I trust that the clause will be passed exactly as recommended by the Standing Orders Committee. I do not think that Senator Neild ought to give way in the absence of stronger reasons than have been submitted.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—This is Senator Neild's Bill.

Senator GUTHRIE.—It is not; Senator Neild's Bill has been disposed of.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But Senator Neild may reject or submit what clauses he pleases.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Senator Neild, at the beginning, asked us to adopt the report of the Standing Orders Committee.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—With improvements.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Yes, with improvements. But Senator Neild has given no reason for the improvement which he now suggests, but merely states that on representations from honorable senators opposite he intends to modify the clauses.

Senator TURLEY.—Senator Neild only gives way to those opposite because they are obstructing the Bill.

Senator GUTHRIE.—I would not say that; but Senator Neild is apparently prepared to back down for the purpose of getting the Bill through a little more easily. I hope the recommended clauses will be adhered to.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—As a member of the Standing Orders Committee I have listened with great attention to the discussion, and it appears to me that the more the Committee depart from the recommendations made the worse legislation we shall get. I ask Senator Symon, who has had a vast experience in Courts, whereas I have had very little, whether what are here called indictable offences are not to be found described as such in almost every Act? I take it that if a man escapes from custody and defies the Senate he is guilty of a grave offence in setting at defiance the law, and rendering it impossible for us to carry on our business. If a man wilfully and deliberately obstructs an officer who endeavours to serve a warrant of the Senate, he may have to go to gaol, and possibly he ought to go, and not simply be let off with a fine. It appears to me that we should act very wrongly if we reduced the penalties proposed for such a case. In every instance I should like to see the greatest discretion vested in the magistrate or judge, with fine or imprisonment provided for offences. Magistrates, even of the most humble experience, always have regard to the nature of the offence.

Senator FRASER.—A magistrate would not be fit for his position if he did not.

Senator DOBSON.—That is so. Some honorable senators seem to forget that, with a maximum imprisonment of twelve months, it is quite likely that an offender will be let off with a week's imprisonment for a small offence. But considering what we see around us in our daily life, we may make those penalties a great deal too low, and there is not much danger of making them too high when we name a maximum.

Senator MILLEN.—Is not a maximum penalty an indication of the view which Parliament takes of the seriousness of a given offence?

Senator DOBSON.—Even so, there is such an enormous difference of degree in offences that legislation does not "make the punishment fit the crime," unless there be some penalty between imprisonment for a week and imprisonment for two or three years. What was attempted in connexion with the Butter Commission, and what is now happening in New South Wales, show us that there ought to be a very stiff punishment for men who refuse to give evidence—who, by omission or neglect, may absolutely take part in conspiracy to defraud. At the present day crime is finding a different rut or trend, and I believe that in the future, more than in the past, we shall have to punish men of education and culture who have found out modern ways of putting other people's money into their pockets in a gentlemanly kind of way. For these reasons I think that the Committee will do wrong if they make the penalties too small.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—The clause under discussion deals with minor offences, but the next clause, to which reference has been freely made, deals with the more serious matter of refusing or neglecting to appear. For the latter offence the Standing Orders Committee recommend a fine of £50, but no punishment by imprisonment.

Senator TRENWITH.—Under what circumstances could a warrant issue except for some important offence?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The warrant is to require attendance, and the clause under discussion deals with persons who obstruct the execution of the warrant.

Senator PEARCE.—The warrant is for apprehension.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Precisely. The clause does not necessarily deal with an offence committed by the witness, because it may be committed by anybody in the community.

Senator FRASER.—It may be committed by a witness's wife and children.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I think what we should do is to follow the example of the Standing Orders Committee in regard to the clause under discussion, and also provide the punishment of imprisonment, in addition to a fine, under the following clause. I propose that under the next clause there shall be precisely the same penalty of £50, or imprisonment for a year, or, if honorable senators like, £100 or two years. I do not wish to reduce the penalties, but we might reasonably make an effort to apportion them with some greater degree of justice than is apparent in the proposal before us. I ask the Committee to omit the word "indictable," and to make the penalty £50 or one year's imprisonment. I move—

That the proposed new clause be amended by leaving out the word "indictable," line 4.

Senator TRENWITH (Victoria).—I think honorable senators are taking a wrong view of the proposal. The offences which are contemplated are extremely serious; they cannot, under any possibility, be considered trivial. First of all, a warrant will not issue unless there has been a refusal to attend; and whatever happens under this clause cannot happen unexpectedly, or come as a surprise. Therefore, whatever action is taken in resisting or preventing the execution of an order of the Senate will have to be taken deliberately; and that is a very serious consideration.

Senator MILLEN.—That presupposes that everybody knows a warrant is out for a particular person.

Senator TRENWITH.—Everybody would know when a person was being compelled to attend the highest court in the land—

Senator MILLEN.—Everybody would not know.

Senator TRENWITH.—Then everybody ought to be made to know by sad and bitter experience. It is a very serious matter to resist the decree of a Court. There was, for instance, the unfortunate murder case recently in Victoria. Suppose some person had come up and prevented the police from arresting the accused man, could it have been said that that person ought not to go to gaol, when he must have known that the man was being taken into custody for the most serious offence possible against the law? Must such conduct be excused because the person concerned has some strong feeling of friendship towards the accused? If resistance is excusable on that ground, then resistance under the clause would be excusable, because, at any rate, the people against whom an order of the Senate, in the form of a warrant, is issued, must be persons who have notice. It is reasonable to assume that those who feel so strongly about such persons that they resist the law, will be their intimate friends, and consequently it must be assumed that they also know of the warrant. Senator Fraser has suggested that a wife and children may be punished under this clause.

Senator FRASER.—It might very likely be a daughter.

Senator TRENWITH.—At any rate, it is very likely to be some member of the family. The brother of a person who refused to comply with an order of a Select Committee of the Senate, and against whom a warrant for his forcible production has been issued, might intervene and successfully prevent him being arrested. Conditions are easily conceivable under which a very serious loss might be entailed on a number of persons. The Committee might have to go to the furthest part of the Commonwealth in order to take evidence. They might in consequence have incurred considerable expense, and might have entailed considerable expense on a number of persons required to give evidence before them. Yet some person whose arrest under a warrant was successfully prevented, might, because of his absence, render useless the whole of the sittings of the Committee. Offences of that sort would be so serious that a fine of £50, or £500, or any number of pounds, would not meet the case in certain circumstances.

Senator MILLEN.—Does the honorable senator think that it would be more serious to resist a warrant issued by a Select Committee than it is to resist a warrant issued by a Supreme Court?

Senator TRENWITH.—I think it would be as serious, and as it is usual to speak of Parliament as being the highest court in the land, it might not be unreasonable to say that it would be more serious. Certainly, issues more far-reaching might be involved than are involved in actions in a Supreme Court. We have recently had under notice two or three instances of Select Committees or Royal Commissions dealing with enormous interests, in connexion with which frauds, which were not accidental and not entered into in a momentary lapse, but deliberately, carefully, and scientifically carried out, have been conducted for years, not by one, two, or a few, but by an enormous number of persons in our community. Some of those persons have done everything in their power, first of all, to resist giving evidence, and subsequently to resist the production of necessary documents and material proofs.

Senator MCGREGOR.—And they kept persons out of the road also.

Senator TRENWITH.—In New South Wales at the present time we know that there is a desire, in the interests of the community, to secure possession of the person of a witness in connexion with an important inquiry, and there is very great difficulty experienced in obtaining possession of that witness. We know also that it is considered extremely desirable to secure material evidence in the shape of documents and so forth, and there is the greatest possible difficulty in obtaining it. If the mere payment of a monetary penalty would enable people to successfully resist the production of these persons and documents, we know that in some cases £1,000 would not stop them.

Senator FRASER.—But the Judge could impose imprisonment.

Senator TRENWITH.—Also the Judge might refrain from imposing imprisonment.

Senator FRASER.—Then he would not understand his duty.

Senator TRENWITH.—Perhaps he would not, and there have been persons placed in very high positions who have not understood their duty.

Senator FRASER.—We cannot guard against every case.

Senator TRENWITH.—We can in this instance say that persons who commit offences of this sort—extremely serious offences—must understand that they shall not have the option of paying a fine, but shall be certain to suffer imprisonment. I know of one instance where a man, convicted of an assault, and fined £5, asked the Bench before leaving the Court if he might have another £5 worth.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What did the Bench say?

Senator TRENWITH.—That is another question. I mention the instance in order to show that a money penalty in some circumstances is no penalty at all.

Senator MILLEN.—Would not a magistrate be able to discern that?

Senator TRENWITH.—I think he would.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Senator Neild proposes an alternative.

Senator TRENWITH.—I want to say in connexion with this matter that, in my opinion, the offence may be so serious that a money fine would not meet it.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Does the honorable senator not see that he is proposing to interfere with private enterprise?

Senator TRENWITH.—I always discuss questions simply in the light of the circumstances in which they are presented. I have no desire to be satirical, to say anything offensive to those who are opposed to me, or to insinuate that they are wealthy or represent wealthy people. I am dealing with this question as it presents itself to us now, and, in my opinion, this offence might be so serious that its committal should be followed by a serious penalty, and I do not think a fine would be a sufficiently serious penalty for the purpose. If there should be some talk about making men criminals, I would say that where persons are imprisoned "until the rising of the Court" no one ever considers the imposition of such punishment as involving a serious disgrace. I fail to see how an offence against this clause could be trivial, but if it should happen that it was, the Bench would be able, at its discretion, to order such a form of imprisonment as would carry with it no stigma whatever.

Progress reported.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Senator TURLEY (Queensland).—I ask leave to make a personal explanation. On looking over the Hansard proofs I received this morning, I found that an interjection had been made during my speech which I did not hear at the time, and which misrepresented altogether the attitude I have taken up in connexion with the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill. The interjection was made by Senator de Largie, who said—

The honorable senator shirked the question when he was in Western Australia.

I shall not describe in my own words the position which I took up in Western Australia, but I have here a copy of the West Australian of 15th April, 1905, in which there is a report of what I said on the only opportunity which I had during the time I was in Western Australia, to speak at any meetings which I attended. Referring to myself, the report states—

Speaking as to the Trans-Australian railway, he said that they desired on the present visit to gain all the information they could. It seemed to him that Western Australia was the richest State of the lot with its gold, agriculture, &c. Therefore, it seemed to him that the States interested should obtain all information with regard to the Trans-Australian line rather than call upon the Commonwealth Parliament to bear the expense of survey, &c.

I submit that that is exactly the position I took up here in connexion with this matter, and that is what I said on the only opportunity I had of telling the people of Western Australia what my views on the question were.

Senator DE LARGIE.—An awful indictment!

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES BILL.

Report adopted.

SUPPLY BILL (No. 2).

COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENT HOUSES:
DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE: MAIL CONTRACT EXPENDITURE: HIGH COURT EXPENDITURE: CONTINGENCY VOTES: FIRE INSURANCE: ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE: TELEPHONE SERVICE: POST OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Bill read a first time.

Motion (by Senator PLAYFORD) agreed to—

That the Standing Orders be suspended to enable the Supply Bill to pass through all its stages without delay.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

The Bill contains the usual provisions to enable the Treasurer to pay for this month's services, at the rate which was authorized in the Appropriation Act of last year. It is in the usual form, and it is necessary that it should be passed so that the public servants may receive their salaries.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Does it contain any additional items?

Senator PLAYFORD.—It contains no additional items, except one to recoup the Treasurer's advance account.

Senator Lt.Col. NEILD. — That is all right.

Senator STEWART.—Have any reductions taken place according to the classification scheme of the Public Service Commissioner, or are the salaries continued at the old rates?

Senator PLAYFORD. — So far as I know, no increases or reductions have been made. The Bill is based on the Appropriation Act of last year.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—I wish to discuss several matters which are dealt with in this Bill. In the first place, I propose to call the attention of the Minister of Defence to the extremely unsatisfactory reply I received the other day to my question about the maintenance of Government Houses outside Melbourne.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not know that the honorable senator can discuss that question unless there is an item for that purpose in the Bill.

Senator MATHESON.—The Bill contains an item of £420 for the maintenance of Sydney Government House. Two or three days ago I asked an extremely reasonable question on this subject, and elicited that the agreement in connexion with Government House, Sydney, will expire at the end of the current year. I asked the Government whether they would give Parliament an opportunity of discussing the general question of housing the Governor-General outside the existing Seat of Government prior to committing us to any expenditure in that direction, and more especially prior to entering into an agreement with the Government of New South Wales for the use of their Government House. The Government answered that the Government of New South Wales were willing to continue the existing agreement, and that the subject could be discussed on the Estimates. That, I submit, is absolutely playing with the Senate. It has no power to amend the Estimates, but merely power to suggest an amendment, so that any debate on the policy of maintaining Government Houses outside Melbourne would be absolutely futile. This question was thoroughly threshed out on a previous occasion, but we discovered that it was impossible to correct what many of us believed was a very grave injustice to the Commonwealth at large, because it had been committed by the then existing Government to the maintenance of Government House, Sydney. Now the position is entirely different. The existing contract has five months to run, and there is ample time, if only the opportunity is afforded by the Government, for Parliament to express a definite opinion on this very important subject.

Senator MILLEN.—Why cannot the honorable senator express his opinion on the Estimates, and give effect to it if he likes?

Senator MATHESON.—It is of no use for the honorable senator to raise a side issue, because we are always told that it is undignified to create friction between the Houses on a small item. I endeavoured to do that a dozen times. On one occasion, at my instance, a proposed vote was reduced by £1, and later on the leader of the Senate got the matter recommitted, and my honorable friends who supported me said, "Well, after all, you have had a moral victory. You have carried your point, so why send down a message to the other House?" The victory was absolutely worth nothing.

Senator GIVENS.—Is it not unconstitutional to maintain a Government House in more than one State, and not in all the States?

Senator MATHESON.—It is not unconstitutional, but it is unnecessary, and a gross injustice to the other States. His Excellency should reside in Melbourne, so long as the Parliament sits here. Any contention to the contrary is apparently based on a series of telegrams which were exchanged between Lord Beauchamp when Governor of New South Wales and Mr. Chamberlain. I propose to give a résumé of what took place, because this question is very little understood, and it is generally supposed that Government House in Sydney has been placed at the disposal of the Commonwealth, in compliance with some understanding between the Premiers of the States. That is the contention of the representatives of New South Wales, who, I believe, also say it is a simple act of justice towards that State that this expenditure should be incurred by the Commonwealth. Writing on the 10th August, 1899, and referring to the period prior to the selection of a Capital Site in New South Wales, Mr. Chamberlain wrote in these terms to Lord Beauchamp—

I presume that during this period the Governor-General of Australia will mainly reside at Melbourne, and unless it is intended that he should hold pro tempore a Commission as Governor of Victoria, I should be glad to learn the views of your Ministers, as to the provision which should be made for his residence.

That is to say, his residence in Melbourne. A similar despatch was sent to the Governments of Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania. Apparently, no despatch was sent to the Government of Western Australia, because at that time it was uncertain whether it would be an original State. On the 29th March, 1900, in reply to that circular letter, Lord Beauchamp sent this cablegram to Mr. Chamberlain—

New South Wales offers Government House as permanent residence for Governor-General, and will arrange for State Governor elsewhere.

At the instigation of Sir William Lyne, the Premier, he gave these reasons—

1. New South Wales is mother colony of Australia.
2. Captain Cook landed first in Sydney, therefore the Governor-General should do the same.
3. The idea of Federation originated in New South Wales.
4. New South Wales has the largest population, and is the wealthiest.
5. Sydney is the head-quarters of the Naval Commander-in-Chief.
6. Government House is in a good situation and is very comfortable.

The last recommendation is probably the best one that Sir William Lyne could have put before Mr. Chamberlain; but the latter was apparently of the opinion that the Governor-General should reside in Melbourne; and, being placed in a quandary, he sent no reply. He had asked what residence Victoria could place at the Governor-General's disposal, and he was answered that New South Wales was ready to find him a house because it was comfortable. On the 30th June, 1900, Lord Beauchamp sent to Mr. Chamberlain a second cablegram in these terms—

Lyne hopes you have no objection to the publication of Barton's cable asking for information on your behalf from the Premiers of Australian Colonies as to the residence of Governor-General.

Sir Edmund Barton's cablegram is not amongst the correspondence, and therefore it is impossible to say what it was, but the cablegram from Lord Beauchamp is so very enigmatical that it is difficult to understand what it refers to, except that Sir William Lyne wished to publish some cablegram. On the 5th July, Lord Beauchamp cabled again to Mr. Chamberlain—

Ministers anxious for reply.

On the 6th July, Mr. Chamberlain replied—

Does your cable of 30th apply to whole of Barton's message or only part specified.

On the 7th July, 1900, Lord Beauchamp cabled to Mr. Chamberlain to say—

My Prime Minister is anxious to have your permission to state that you desired Barton to inquire where Governor-General should reside, and that in answer to your request, Prime Ministers of federating Colonies consulted and agreed to New South Wales.

It is a very curious thing that, when challenged, each of the then Premiers of the Federated States, denied that they had made any such suggestion. Sir William Lyne was, however, anxious to force Mr. Chamberlain into saying that the Premiers had all agreed to this matter. Mr. Chamberlain sent no reply to the last-quoted message; and on the 16th July, Lord Beauchamp again telegraphed to Mr. Chamberlain—

Prime Minister subject to pressure to publish telegrams between Premiers re residence of Governor-General. Have thrice asked for leave. Matter urgent.

Mr. Chamberlain replied to Lord Beauchamp on the 16th July—

Your cable, 7th July. Opinion of delegates was asked as to temporary residence of Governor-General pending establishment of Federal capital. Governor-General will be sworn in, and Commonwealth inaugurated, at Sydney, but it will be impossible for him to maintain two establishments and three when Government House built at new capital, unless States or Commonwealth provide for upkeep of Government House, Sydney and Melbourne, for travelling expenses of himself and household, and for entertainment allowance.

There is a clear expression of opinion from Mr. Chamberlain, that the proper residence of the Governor-General was in Melbourne, and that if the Governor-General was to be required to live anywhere outside of Melbourne prior to the establishment of the Federal Capital, it was essential that the States in which he was expected to live should make a proper provision for his establishment.

Senator DOBSON.—Either those States or the Commonwealth.

Senator MATHESON.—It was an extra.

Senator GIVENS.—What had Mr. Chamberlain to do with the matter at all?

Senator MATHESON.—Mr. Chamberlain was arranging for the Governor-General to come out to Australia, and he had to get these things straightened up before he could induce any one to accept the office. That is quite clear. Lord Beauchamp, at the instigation of Sir William Lyne, telegraphed to Mr. Chamberlain—

Prime Minister wants Government House vacated and ready for Governor-General after first session of Federal Parliament, in accordance with my telegrams of 23rd September and March. If Hopetoun desires to find Government House free, shall be ready to vacate.

In fact, Sir William Lyne was so anxious to secure the establishment of the Governor-General at Sydney, that he actually hustled Lord Beauchamp out of New South Wales. Mr. Chamberlain, on the 24th July, replied to Lord Beauchamp—Hopetoun agrees to arrangements suggested by Premier.

Senator DOBSON.—This is very ancient history; I do not know what is coming of it.

Senator MATHESON.—It may be ancient history to Senator Dobson and myself, but the fact is that when allusion was made to the matter in the House of Representatives the other day, apparently the history of it had been completely forgotten. It is most desirable that it should be thoroughly ventilated before the Commonwealth is committed to another agreement. That is my point. The Minister of Defence who is responsible for arranging the business of the Senate, does not propose to allow us to have another opportunity to go into the question.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I showed the honorable senator how he had an opportunity.

Senator MATHESON.—I have taken the present opportunity, but it is unsatisfactory, because I cannot get a direct vote.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The honorable senator could put a notice on the paper, move a resolution, and have it discussed. Then he could take a direct vote.

Senator MATHESON.—I cannot get a direct vote in this way, as a matter of fact, because on a Supply Bill we are always told that the money is wanted, and that if an amendment is made the finances are put in a state of suspense. I should have thought that the Government would be glad to put a day at our disposal for the discussion of this question, especially considering the lack of business before the Senate, and that we have adjourned week after week, having nothing to do. What are we here for? To work, not to go home to our States. To proceed with the story, the next message was a telegram from Lord Beauchamp to Mr. Chamberlain—

Premier learns Governor-General would prefer to find Government House empty and ready for occupation. Please ascertain wishes of Governor-General.

On the 7th August, Lord Beauchamp again telegraphed to Mr. Chamberlain—

Premier now urgently desires that the Governor-General should take up his residence in Government House in Sydney upon his arrival. I propose to accede to his wish, and shall therefore leave in November.

Senator HIGGS.—What is the document from which the honorable senator is quoting?

Senator MATHESON.—I am making extracts from the correspondence, which seems to have been lost sight of. On the 22nd August, Mr. Chamberlain telegraphed to Lord Beauchamp—

You can do as you like about leaving. I presume that the arrangement is made for allowing the Governor-General and his establishment free travelling on the Government railways, and that he will not be expected to entertain largely at Sydney until some provision has been made for entertaining allowance.

On the 24th August, Lord Beauchamp replied to Mr. Chamberlain, at the instigation of Sir William Lyne—

Free railway travelling for Governor-General and establishment promised.

That is the point to which I have been working up. The last message is a cable from Lord Beauchamp, at the instigation of Sir William Lyne, then Premier of New South Wales, in which he directly recognised the responsibility of that State if New South Wales desired to have the Governor-General residing at Government House, Sydney. Recognising that responsibility he promised free railway travelling for the Governor-General and his establishment. But what do we find? After having offered to place Government House, Sydney, at the disposal of the Governor-General, the Commonwealth has to pay £3,000 a year for its maintenance. I contend that the establishment in Sydney should be maintained by the State. I entirely dissent from the proposal to extend the agreement between the Government of New South Wales and the Federal Government, and think that it should be allowed to lapse at the end of the present year.

Senator HIGGS. — Is there any use in bringing forward the matter at this stage?

Senator MATHESON.—My object is to try to induce the leader of the Senate to place a day at our disposal for the adequate discussion of the question, or to induce the Government to refrain from renewing an agreement which is repugnant to many of us until the Senate has had an opportunity to give a direct vote unhampered by any considerations connected with a finance Bill.

Senator HIGGS. — If the honorable senator puts a motion on the paper he will get support for it.

Senator MATHESON.—But all the days are filled.

Senator CLEMONS. — Why did not the honorable senator bring it forward on the first reading of this Bill? He has missed his opportunity.

Senator MATHESON. — I have not missed my opportunity. The best proof of that is that the President cannot call me to order. I am "on the spot." I have now put the position clearly before the Senate. I hope that the Minister will give some consideration to it, and endeavour to meet the views of many of us. I have not trespassed upon the time of the Senate unduly in relating the history of the matter, having merely read the correspondence. If necessary, however, I shall later on move the reduction of a vote, and shall endeavour to induce the Minister to give us a more suitable time to discuss the question. In connexion with the defence vote, I draw attention to the item, "Department of Defence, division 42, Central administration." I propose to say a few words about the valuation of defence properties.

The PRESIDENT.—Is there any item in this Bill with which the honorable senator can connect his remarks?

Senator MATHESON.—Yes; in connexion with the vote for the staff, £1,200. I think that, considering the way the duties of the Department have been neglected, that vote ought to be reduced, and I shall probably move to reduce it. In 1901, a committee of officers was appointed to discuss the defence arrangements of the Commonwealth. That committee reported, urging that a valuation should be made of the defence properties transferred by the various States to the Commonwealth.

The PRESIDENT. — I do not think that the honorable senator is in order in discussing those valuations. There is nothing in the schedule to the Bill referring to them.

Senator MATHESON.—It is true that there is nothing in the schedule on the subject; but I propose to move for the reduction of the vote for the staff, and wish to justify my action. I must give my reasons.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The staff and the committee referred to are not the same set of people.

Senator MATHESON. — I quite agree with the honorable senator that the staff and the committee are not the same body; but the committee made recommendations, and it was the duty of those responsible to see that those recommendations were carried out. I urge that it is a gross dereliction of duty that those valuations have not been made. The result is that from 1901 to 1905 we have simply drifted along. The bulk of the defence stores handed over to the Commonwealth were obsolete. No valuation was made on behalf of the Commonwealth, but, nevertheless, quantities of stores were sold without reserve. Practically the Commonwealth received no return.

Senator MILLEN.—Were the stores sold privately, or how?

Senator MATHESON.—They were sold by auction under Gazette notice and that is how I came to know of the matter

Senator GIVENS.—When was the sale?

Senator MATHESON.—I think the sale was in August of last year, and at various other times. The Minister of Defence has answered a question on the point.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The sale was in January last, I think.

Senator MATHESON.—We shall have to pay for those stores whatever the States Governments like to ask; and that cannot be denied by the Minister, seeing that no valuation has been made. It is provided in the Constitution that we shall pay for everything that is transferred; and yet the Government have actually sold goods without knowing what they were worth.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The auction test shows what they were worth.

Senator MATHESON.—The auction showed what they were worth at a forced sale, but not what they were worth intrinsically. Not only did the Committee recommend that a valuation should be made, but I have called attention to the matter year after year, and asked each successive Government when that step would be taken.

The PRESIDENT.—Has this anything to do with the Bill?

Senator MATHESON.—I am justifying my action in seeking to reduce the vote.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Is the honorable senator in order in seeking to reduce the pay of an existing staff, who are not the same officers, and who cannot be responsible for the alleged neglect of duty by the staff that existed some two, three, or four years ago?

Senator GIVENS.—An honorable senator can move a reduction of any item he likes.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The point I submit is whether, on this item, it is open to an honorable senator to discuss the alleged laches of officers who are not the same officers whose salaries are under consideration?

The PRESIDENT.—It is very difficult for me to say that remarks in reference to any item in the schedule to this Bill are not relative to the subject under discussion. But I ask Senator Matheson to try to observe the spirit of the Standing Orders, and not find excuses for not conforming to them. We are now discussing the Supply Bill; and the whole policy of the Government, in reference to the Defence Forces, ought not, it seems to me, to be brought under consideration. The honorable senator is quite in order in referring to an item for the payment of the Defence staff, but I think he ought to confine himself, as far as he can, to the consideration whether the item ought to be reduced or diminished.

Senator MATHESON.—I am attempting to confine myself to the fact that this valuation has not been made.

The PRESIDENT.—Has that anything to do with the staff?

Senator MATHESON.—Undoubtedly, because, under the Defence Act, the Council of Defence, which is composed of members of the staff, is responsible for these executive matters. You shake your head, sir, but if you refer to the Act which was passed last year you will see that the head officers of the staff—those whose payment is provided for under the vote—form the Council of Defence. The General Officer Commanding has been dispensed with, and each head officer has specific duties to perform. Therefore, they, and not the General Officer Commanding, are responsible for the fact that this valuation has not been made unless, of course, the Minister intends to take the responsibility on himself, which I hardly consider likely from the way in which the honorable gentleman now smiles.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not think the officers can be responsible.

Senator MATHESON.—That is the very point I want to raise. Who is responsible? That is what I want to know, and that is why I wish a reduction of the vote. The Minister of Defence says that he is not responsible.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I think the honorable senator will find that the States are responsible. The honorable senator has, no doubt, read what took place a few months ago at the Hobart Conference, and the resolutions which were there passed relating to transferred properties. The honorable senator knows that steps have been taken, and that everything is being done that can be done.

Senator MATHESON.—That is the very thing I do not know. At the commencement of the sitting to-day, I asked the Minister, without notice, in the most civil way, whether he could give any idea when the valuation would be placed before the Senate, and he, in an equally civil way, said in effect, "Heaven only knows when the valuation will be forthcoming." That is what brings me to my feet, because I think the Senate is entitled to know who is responsible for this extraordinary delay.

Senator PLAYFORD.—A good many people, I think.

Senator MATHESON.—This is not a question of two valuers meeting and arriving at a joint conclusion; it is for the Commonwealth to make a valuation and submit it to the States. I do not ask that the agreed valuation shall be placed before the Senate; what I want to see is the valuation which is placed on the stores by the officials of the Commonwealth. There are thousands of pounds worth of useless guns and stores at the present moment in the arsenals of the Commonwealth, and we are to be asked at some not far distant date, to pay for those stores as if they were effective. We have had experience of several Commonwealth Governments, and we know that matters are brought before Parliament in regard to which the Government are already committed, and it has been on several occasions futile to debate questions already prejudged by the Ministry. I am anxious to use every possible means in my power to prevent this happening in connexion with the stores. I know that in Western Australia there are stored cannon which are absolutely useless.

The PRESIDENT.—Has that anything to do with the duty of the officers, who, the honorable senator says, have been guilty of neglect?

Senator MATHESON.—Yes; I wish to urge that the valuation should be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT. — The honorable senator is evading the standing order.

Senator MATHESON.—If that is your ruling, sir, I shall stop.

The PRESIDENT.—I asked the honorable senator to confine himself to the schedule to this Bill. Has the assertion that some of the stores are valueless anything to do with the schedule?

Senator MATHESON.—Yes; because I say the valuation ought to be made. However, sir, in view of your ruling, I shall not labour the question further, and, probably I have said enough. There is another matter to which I wish to call attention in connexion with the Post and Telegraph Department, under the Western Australian item "Subdivision No. 2, Conveyance of Mails, £4,100." That item contains a proportion of a vote which I say is absolutely unjustifiable. It is in connexion with the Vancouver mail subsidy, which up to this year, 1905-6, has been defrayed by Queensland and New South Wales solely. Last year, under this head, New South Wales paid £12,587, and Queensland £10,227. This year, without the least justification—without coming to Parliament for a direct vote—the Government have, under the head of transferred services, of which this item forms a part, split up this subsidy per capita amongst the various States. I asked the Minister to-day what justification the Government had for treating this as a transferred service, and I was told that authority was derived from section 89 of the Constitution. On referring to that section, I find—

(II.) The Commonwealth shall debit to each State—

(a) The expenditure therein of the Commonwealth incurred solely for the maintenance or continuance, as at the time of transfer, of any Department transferred from the State to the Commonwealth.

I should like to call attention to the fact that Western Australia never paid one penny prior to the current year towards this subsidy.

Senator DRAKE.—The authority is derived from paragraph b of the section just quoted by the honorable senator. It was treated as transferred service before, and now it is treated as "other expenditure" under paragraph b.

Senator MATHESON.—If it was treated as "other expenditure," it might be quite right, and there might be less to say about it. But I have gone very carefully into the matter, and if Senator Drake refers to the Estimates, he will find the item there treated as transferred expenditure, without the least shadow of a justification. Western Australia has never paid a penny to this subsidy; and how, then, can it be contended that any portion of this vote shall be debited to that State as expenditure incurred "for the maintenance or continuance, as at the time of the transfer, of any Department transferred from the State to the Commonwealth"? It is a gross infringement of the rights of Western Australia to attempt to make that State liable under this head for any such subsidy.

Senator CLEMONS.—I suppose the honorable senator is going to move a reduction of the vote.

Senator MATHESON.—Yes, I may, in consequence, move a reduction of the vote. What lends a particular colour to the injustice of the proceeding is that when it was necessary to increase the subsidy given by New South Wales for a service to the New Hebrides, the matter was honestly brought before the Senate in the shape of a resolution, and we were asked to express an opinion as to whether the increase should be regarded as a new expenditure on behalf of the Commonwealth. That was a perfectly straightforward and honest way of dealing with the situation. The Government dare not treat this subsidy in the same way, because they know that if a direct motion on the subject were submitted to the Senate none of the representatives of Tasmania, South Australia, or Western Australia would acquiesce in the allocation of any of this expenditure to those States. Without any consultation with Parliament the Government simply slip this proposal in under the heading of "transferred expenditure," where it would be most likely to escape notice. That is a most atrocious way of dealing with the business of the Commonwealth.

Senator CLEMONS.—They did not slip in the Tasmanian subsidy.

Senator MATHESON.—If Senator Clemons refers to the payment for the coastal carriage of mails between the mainland and Tasmania that does not come under the heading of subsidies properly so-called.

Senator CLEMONS.—It has to be paid for as a subsidy.

Senator MATHESON.—I hope the Minister of Defence will take a note of the grievances I have submitted, and will endeavour to remedy them.

Senator GIVENS.—Has not the honorable senator something to say about the telephone service between Melbourne and Sydney?

Senator MATHESON.—Unfortunately, I cannot attach it to this Bill, and I have no desire to exceed the limits of the Standing Orders in discussing these matters. So far, I think, I have been thoroughly justified in everything I have said, and I am afraid I am debarred by the Standing Orders from making any reference to a picture of which the Commonwealth would appear to have bought a large number of copies, or to the telephone service referred to by Senator Givens.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I have one or two words to say in fairness to Senator Matheson. The honorable senator has given me a vast amount of information about the Government Houses in Sydney and Melbourne. I have not before heard the contention that the upkeep of the Sydney Government House should be charged to that State, and not to the Commonwealth.

Senator MATHESON.—Sir William Lyne made that offer to Mr. Chamberlain.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The matter to which the honorable senator has referred will be looked into, but I do not think we should be mean in our relations with the Governor-General. As far as I know, all the States provide their Governors with more than one residence. At all events, in the little State of South Australia, we provide the Governor with a residence on the Plains and another in the Hills. I understand that in Victoria there is a Governor's residence near Melbourne, and another some distance away in a more elevated situation. It would appear to have been recognised in the States that more than one place of residence should be provided for a State Governor. In the circumstances of the Commonwealth, when we have two such States as New South Wales, which is designated by the name "Mother State," and the important State of Victoria, in which at the present time is the Seat of Government, surely it is not too much to ask, when we have not to pay rent for them, that we should keep the Government Houses in Melbourne and in Sydney in repair. If the Governor-General desires that two residences should be provided for him, I do not think we should begrudge the small expenditure necessary to keep them up.

Senator MATHESON.—There is no evidence that the Governor-General does desire that two residences should be provided for him.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I said "if" the Governor-General desires that two residences should be provided for him, we should not begrudge the expense necessary to keep them up. I shall leave that subject, as I do not think any more need be said on it.

Senator MATHESON.—Will the Government give honorable senators an opportunity to debate the subject?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The honorable senator has said that I tried to muzzle him and to burke discussion of the matter. I did nothing of the sort. The honorable senator has every right and power to bring the matter before the Senate by a direct motion, that, in the opinion of the Senate, it is not desirable that we should make any provision for a residence of the Governor-General in Sydney.

Senator MATHESON.—Will the Minister give me an opportunity to debate it?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I could not prevent the honorable senator, and I have no desire to do so.

Senator MILLEN.—Surely the Minister will not make special provision for such a debate?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I will not make special provision for it, but the honorable senator has only to put the motion on the notice-paper so many weeks in advance, to have a full day to himself.

Senator MATHESON.—How many weeks in advance?

Senator PLAYFORD.—That can be ascertained. I do not know that I need discuss the question of the transferred properties, and their valuation, as it is not alluded to in the Supply Bill. The honorable senator is aware that the matter has been the subject of discussion between the States Governments and the Commonwealth Government since the inauguration of the Commonwealth.

Senator MATHESON.—Why cannot the Commonwealth Government make their valuations?

Senator PLAYFORD.—We have been trying to arrive at some basis, and the Hobart Conference did arrive at a basis, though Mr. Carruthers, on behalf of New South Wales, did not agree with the other Premiers that we should pay  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the money value of the properties when the extent of our indebtedness in respect of them is decided.

Senator CLEMONS.—The trouble was the difference between cost price and market price.

Senator PLAYFORD.—According to the arrangement discussed at the Conference, two arbitrators were to be appointed, and if there were any dispute the matter was to be referred to a Judge of the High Court. I know that the officers of the Defence Department have proper stock-sheets prepared, and are getting out their valuations as fast as they can. I hope the matter will be settled in a short time. Of course, there is great difficulty in estimating the value of military stores which have been transferred. Senator Matheson is aware that the obsolete arms to which he has referred were not obsolete when the States purchased them.

Senator MATHESON.—They were obsolete when they were transferred to the Commonwealth; that is my point.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We shall have to accept their valuation at the time they were transferred to the Commonwealth. Though they have every day since become more obsolete, the States may very properly contend that the Commonwealth should take over these guns, ammunition, and accoutrements at their valuation at the time of the inauguration of the Commonwealth, when they might have been fairly serviceable, and not at their value to-day.

Senator MATHESON.—That was five years ago.

Senator PLAYFORD.—With regard to the Vancouver mail service, I have no wish to express an opinion, but I do say that the Government have adopted the proper course. The States pay on the basis of population for the Orient service, do they not?

Senator MATHESON.—Hear, hear.

Senator PLAYFORD.—And Western Australia gets the benefit of that arrangement.

Senator MATHESON.—In what sense?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Western Australia is paying pro rata with the other States for that service, which is of more importance to her than it is to Queensland. If Queensland has to pay per capita a share of the cost of a service which is of special advantage to Western Australia, is it not right and just that Western Australia should pay on a per capita basis for a service which New South Wales and Queensland make special use of? Can Senator Matheson say that that is not right and just? The old contract in connexion with the Vancouver service had run out. Under the old arrangement New South Wales paid an annual subsidy of £13,636, and Queensland an annual subsidy of £10,227, a total of £23,863. The two States of New South Wales and Queensland paid the whole of that subsidy, and at the same time they were paying a per capita share of the cost of the mail service in which South Australia and Western Australia were more particularly interested.

Senator MATHESON.—That arrangement was made before Federation, and when it was to the interest of New South Wales and Queensland to make it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—No doubt; but when the old contract expired we had to consider the question whether we should continue it on the old basis under which New South Wales and Queensland paid the whole of the money or established the service on a per capita basis. I say that the late Government and the present Government, in carrying out the intention of the late Government, have done what is right and proper in determining to continue that service on the system of a per capita contribution from each State.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why call it "transferred services," and not new services?

Senator PLAYFORD.—What's in a name?

Senator CLEMONS.—There is something in these names.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Government have decided that this service, the Orient service, and all over-sea services, shall be paid for by the Commonwealth on the basis of population. The only question we have to consider is whether that is a fair arrangement with the States as a whole. I say that it is. It would be manifestly unfair that Queensland and New South Wales should have to pay over £23,000 a year for a service which they use possibly more than other States, but which the other States can and do use to some extent, and should at the same time have to pay on a per capita basis for another service which the other States use more frequently than they do, but which they occasionally use also. The proper way is to pay for these services by a Commonwealth payment on a population basis.

Senator MATHESON.—The proposal should have been submitted to Parliament, because there is no evidence that the service is necessary.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not know why it should be submitted to Parliament.

Senator MATHESON.—Then why submit the other service to Parliament?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Government considered that when the old contract expired and a new arrangement had to be made, it was right and proper that the service should be continued on a per capita basis of payment. Having come to that determination, they had a perfect right to enter into the arrangement as the Executive of Parliament, and if Parliament is not disposed to ratify their action, then it must step in and deal with the matter. I say that the Government did right in the circumstances.

Senator MATHESON.—The New Hebrides service was submitted to Parliament, and it was simply an extension of an old contract.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I have not a complete knowledge of these matters, which are not in my own Department. I am unable to say that this matter will not be submitted in the same way as the contract with the Orient Company for the ratification of Parliament. Under the new contract for the Vancouver service, Canada will pay £37,091, as against £34,091 under the old contract; Fiji will pay £2,282, as against £2,046 under the old contract; and the Commonwealth will pay £26,627, as against £23,863, paid by New South Wales and Queensland under the old contract. I do not believe that in this matter it can be charged against the Government that they had not acted rightly and justly.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a second time.

In Committee:

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 4 postponed.

Schedule.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—The item of £3,143 under the head of Parliament gives me an opportunity of directing the attention of the Minister of Defence to what recurs every time we deal with a Supply Bill, and that is the tremendous disproportion which the "contingencies" bear to the sums upon which they are contingent. I particularly direct his attention to the item for the Library, where he will see that £10 is required for salaries, and £435 for contingencies. Can the Minister give the Committee any indication as to what items are comprised under the head of contingencies? I submit that to base £435 upon £10 is to verge upon the ridiculous. If we are always to be asked to pass votes for contingencies without getting detailed information the thing will become an absolute farce.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I do not know anything about the matter. The honorable and learned senator will find all the information he requires in a copy of the Estimates of expenditure, which I beg to hand to him. The item for contingencies comprises a very long list which I do not suppose he will ask me to read.

Senator KEATING.—Everything but salaries is included in contingencies.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—No doubt it is very difficult for a Minister who is not in command of a Department to furnish at a moment's notice the particulars wanted on a Supply Bill. I wish to recall to the recollection of Senator Playford the fact that a few weeks ago I asked him whether he, on behalf of the Government, would give the Senate an opportunity of dealing with the Estimates for the year at an early date after they were laid before the House of Representatives, and he promised that he would.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I cannot until that House has passed them.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend did not make that condition.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Oh, but the honorable and learned senator knew that.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No. Remonstrances have always been made as to the late period of the session at which the Estimates come before the Senate for consideration. No one has been more insistent and strenuous in making such representations than has Senator Stewart. And on that account I promised last year that the matter would be taken into consideration.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Is there no constitutional difficulty in the way?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No. The late Government considered the matter carefully, and I think I am in a position to say that its Treasurer had formulated a scheme for bringing the Estimates in some shape before the Senate after the Budget had been delivered—either in connexion with a Supply Bill, or in some other way—so that it could consider the items before the Appropriation Bill was sent up. Sir George Turner thought it was perfectly feasible, and it was that fact which led me to put the question to my honorable friend. I did not regard his answer as having a condition or understanding attached to it; he may have had it in his own mind, but he gave me an unqualified answer, which was the one I expected to receive, and I took it as meaning that probably the present Government had considered the question from the same point of view, and discovered some method by which the idea could be carried out. I know of no constitutional difficulty in the way.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It occurred to me that while the other House has the power of cutting down the Estimates, the Senate has only the power of making requests.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—On this very Bill we should have power to consider the Estimates. I do not see any constitutional difficulty in the way. Of course, when the Appropriation Bill comes up the financial business of the year is closed.

Senator GIVENS.—The other House likes to hold the power of the purse over the Government as long as possible.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The other House likes to retain the Appropriation Bill as long as it can, but I do not see why there should be any difficulty in getting the Estimates in detail brought under the consideration of the Senate before the Appropriation Bill is sent up. If there is any difficulty of procedure it ought to be got over. We ought to develop a new departure if necessary, because it is folly to talk about the Senate being on an equal footing with the other House with regard to expenditure if we have thrust before us—it has been inevitable in the past—the detailed Estimates during the last days of the session. Last year I felt everything which was said on the subject. I recognised that we were labouring under a disability in that respect. I hope that my honorable friend will consult his colleagues, and see if the idea cannot be carried out. It would be satisfactory to the Senate. It would facilitate business, and maintain that greater control over the finances which the Senate is supposed to have as compared with the upper Houses of the States.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I shall certainly bring the matter under the attention of the Treasurer, as well as the Government as a whole, and see if the suggestion of the honorable and learned senator cannot be carried out in some way. To-day I laid a copy of the Estimates upon the table—I think it is the first time on which they have been tabled before the Appropriation Bill was sent up.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Oh, no; the Estimates have always been circulated, but not brought under our consideration.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I can see difficulties in the way, but I do not wish to argue them at the present time. I shall have the matter looked into, and, if possible, shall do what the honorable and learned senator suggests.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—The Minister of Defence has very kindly handed to me what I had—a copy of the Estimates—as an answer to my question. If I excuse him from answering the question I put with regard to contingencies, will he explain why the magnificent monthly salary for looking after the Library is £10? If it is run at that expense per month, I shall be very much astonished.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—It is a State as well as Commonwealth Library, and we have to pay our share.

Senator CLEMONS.—Is that the full explanation of the reason why we are asked to vote £10 for salaries and £435 for contingencies? Because if it is the Estimates will not bear it out.

Senator PLAYFORD.—So far as I know it is.

Senator CLEMONS.—Then the Minister knows nothing, and I shall let him off.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I said I did not know anything about the matter. Perhaps a member of the Library Committee could explain the item.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—In the vote for the Attorney-General's Department, under the head of "Secretary's office," we find an item of £180 for salaries, and an item of £45 for contingencies, and in order to hold the balance true when we come to the vote for the High Court we find an item of £130 for salaries and £670 for contingencies. Can the Minister of Defence tell us what the item for contingencies means?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I think that my honorable and learned friend could do that better than I can. He has had some experience in this matter.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Later on I shall take an opportunity to express my views, but at the present time I do not know what my honorable friend has been doing. He may have been reversing what I did.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am afraid that this is part of the honorable and learned senator's expenditure.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend has been undoing my economies.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Oh no.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is all right. The Minister cannot give us any information.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is given in the Estimates.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—The Minister of Defence has said that he is not able to give any information regarding the expenditure of the High Court.

Senator PLAYFORD.—On a Supply Bill we are not expected to do so.

Senator STEWART.—I am very much astonished that the information is not given, because this matter has been very freely ventilated, both during the recess, and since the Parliament met. The expenses of the High Court were considered by the late Government to be excessive, and if some statements I read in the press be correct, undoubtedly the expenditure was on a most extravagant scale. In many quarters the late Attorney-General has been adversely criticised for suggesting to the Justices and their officers that they ought to adopt a simple style in connexion with their travelling. He has been found fault with for doing that when I think he ought to be praised. I cannot see how it is possible for even a Justice of the High Court to spend £4 a day in travelling expenses. If he were travelling at his own cost, it would be nothing. But travelling at the expense of the public, as I should imagine, in a simple style, the cost seems to be altogether out of proportion.

Senator CLEMONS.—On the Estimates for this year there is an item of £2,000 for travelling allowance.

Senator STEWART.—That is most extravagant. I cannot find out how the Justices travel. I may be accused of disrespect to the Bench for mentioning the matter here. But I look upon their Honours as merely officials of the Commonwealth. I do not see why they should segregate themselves when they travel. I do not see why they should live at a much more extravagant rate than other persons do. They mix in society; they go to races; they go to balls, and I understand that some of them go to prize fights. But apparently when travelling on public business they travel more like princes of the blood royal than ordinary individuals.

Senator MATHESON.—How do they travel as a rule?

Senator STEWART.—They travel, I believe, in the most expensive way, but at other people's cost. They do not pay for it themselves, and of course the cost does not trouble them. I wish to enter my strong protest. I do not know whether it will be of any service to say so, but I appreciate very highly some remarks made by Senator Symon on this subject. We want more simplicity, both inside and outside the Court. I really think that it is most extravagant on the part of the Judges to spend money for travelling in the way they do. They ought to be called upon to give detailed statements of their expenditure. It may seem to be infra dig., and trenching somewhat on the high dignity of the Bench, to ask for this sort of thing, but really to my mind it has become something approaching a scandal. The Senate would be failing in its duty if it did not insist on more economy on the part of the Judges when travelling. The Minister in charge of the Estimates ought to have more information to lay before honorable senators.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We never had full information given on a monthly Supply Bill. I shall have all information when the Estimates proper come before us.

Senator STEWART.—The excuse is a very ancient one.

Senator PLAYFORD.—No one has ever done it before.

Senator STEWART.—Because it has never been done in the past, is that a reason why it should not be done in the future? Our responsibility for the finances of the Commonwealth is very great, but hitherto we have had very little opportunity to exercise any control. The Estimates have never reached us until a very late period of the session, when every senator was anxious to get away from Melbourne. The consequence has been that the work has been scamped. The other House had passed the Estimates and wound up its work before the subject was handed over to the Senate, and if we had attempted to discuss it in detail and at length we should have incurred opprobrium from members of another place. Our control over expenditure ought to be something more than a mere sham and a farce as it is now. We ought to have an opportunity whenever a Supply Bill comes up to discuss every matter in connexion with public expenditure. It is of no use to put it off until the end of the session, when the Estimates come up.

Senator MILLEN.—And when half the money is spent.

Senator STEWART.—Yes, and when the opportunity for criticism has gone by. Now is the appointed time.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—I really think that the particular vote to which I have called attention does require further explanation. On turning to the Estimates, I find that the vote for the current month, £670, for contingencies, represents a quarter of the total vote for the year. The total vote is £2,665. In the second month of the year we are asked for about one-fourth of that amount. This is beyond all bearing.

Senator PLAYFORD.—A good deal of that is for the annual railway passes, for which we pay this month.

Senator MATHESON.—That can hardly be the explanation.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The railway passes for the three Judges cost only £180.

Senator MATHESON.—In the previous Supply Bill, which was framed by the late Government, we had set down only £110 for contingencies. That represented about one-twelfth of the total, and was a perfectly reasonable amount. Now, however, we are asked to vote £670, which, multiplied by twelve, would make over £8,000.

Senator KEATING.—There are arrears to the amount of £116, which are included in the vote.

Senator MATHESON.—In connexion with division 23 exactly the same point arises. I find that the amount set down for supervision of works for the whole year amounts to £3,000, but in this month of the year we are asked to vote one-half the amount, £1,500. I really think that the Treasury is running away from parliamentary control when, in the second Supply Bill of the year, it asks us to appropriate one-half of the whole amount for contingencies for the supervision of buildings.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—It would be monotonous if we were to pick out items of the character to which reference has been made by Senator Clemons and Senator Matheson. I find that many items of what is presumably a monthly Supply Bill are vastly in excess of one-twelfth of the vote for the year. It would be a pure waste of time if we were to pick out each of these items in view of the frank admission of the Minister, that he is not able to give us any information on the subject. I have listened to his statement that it is not usual to give full information on a monthly Supply Bill. But while perhaps it might be unreasonable to ask the Minister to be prepared with information to that full extent on every item, yet there is such a succession of items where the amount we are asked to vote is greatly in excess of one-twelfth of the total for the year, that we are entitled to ask for a reason. Without an explanation the whole position would seem to be reduced to an absolute farce.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The amount mentioned by Senator Matheson is payment for State supervision of Commonwealth buildings. It is not paid monthly, but by the half year. There is a satisfactory explanation for every item of the kind.

Senator MILLEN.—No doubt the explanation is satisfactory to the Minister. Whether it is satisfactory to this Committee is another thing. I am certain that no one wishes to hamper the Government in the transaction of business, but if in future Supply Bills are presented to us without fuller and better information being forthcoming, the Government must not complain if honorable senators decline to pass them in the haphazard fashion in which they are placed before us.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—There is one item, fire insurance £500, and another item for a similar purpose £30. It is not to be expected that the Government would pay their fire insurance by monthly instalments. They naturally pay the amount in a lump sum once a year. We must trust to the authorities in these matters of detail, and I see no necessity for asking for details on every little point.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—When the attention of the Minister of Defence was called to the large contingencies votes for other Departments than his own, he excused himself for not explaining them by saying that they did not affect his Department. But looking over the Bill I find that his is about the worst of all the Departments in this respect. Fully half the amount voted is for contingencies. For instance, in connexion with militia pay we have, on page 10, £20 for salaries, and £420 for contingencies; on page 11 we find—pay £320, contingencies £130; on page 13, in connexion with rifle clubs, we find—pay £17, contingencies £5,000.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That is to provide the rifle clubs with ammunition.

Senator GIVENS.—But ammunition is provided for in other parts of the schedule. On several other pages I find various sums provided for "contingencies." On page 14 there is the sum of £800; and on page 10 two items of £300 and £800 respectively, under the same head, in connexion with rifle clubs and associations.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There is practically no pay in connexion with the rifle clubs and volunteers, except for instructors.

Senator GIVENS.—The Minister cannot shelter himself on this occasion behind the fact that these items concern another Department, and that, therefore, he cannot be expected to know the particulars. The items to which I have referred are in his own Department, which is the very worst sinner in this respect. We have the right to more information, and, whilst I do not intend to resist the passage of this Bill, I shall not be so complacent in the future.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—When the annual Estimates come before us for consideration, I shall give honorable senators all the necessary information. It has not been the custom to give full particulars on Supply Bills of the character of that before us. As to rifle clubs and volunteers, there is, as I have said, no pay to be provided for, except that of instructors, and we lump the ammunition and other stores under the head of contingencies.

Senator CLEMONS.—Will the Minister promise to give us the details of the contingencies when the annual Estimates are before us?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I promise to do so when the general Estimates come down. If this morning any honorable senator had expressed a desire to have details of any items provided for contingencies—which, in this case, cover everything but pay—I should have been very pleased to obtain full particulars. I am not in a position to give the information now, and I may point out that no Minister has ever been asked to supply particulars of the kind on similar occasions.

Senator CLEMONS.—Oh, yes.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—When in office, I was constantly asked for particulars of this kind, and I do not think the Minister of Defence can fairly complain of having been worried on the present occasion.

Senator PLAYFORD.—No.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Of course, on a Supply Bill, there is great difficulty in entering into details. The items are usually given in a sort of rough and ready round sum, which is put down in the expectation that it will cover the probable expenditure for the month.

Senator GIVENS.—And a bit over.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There is probably a margin. Nevertheless, I think that we are fairly entitled to expect the Minister to give us some approximate idea of what "contingencies" mean. Otherwise there might as well be a schedule simply containing the total amount required.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We do give some details.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It would be of no earthly use to hand over the Estimates to honorable senators, because we cannot at this stage deal with them, and they afford no guide to the items in the Supply Bill.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Last year's Estimates would afford a guide, because the Bill is based on those Estimates.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Estimates would not explain the item of "contingencies." If we were inclined to criticise the Estimates now, we should immediately be told that they were not before the Committee, and if we moved to reduce an item in the Supply Bill, excepting by some such arrangement as I previously suggested, it would not help us to determine the amount that ought to be allowed for the month's supply. The Minister is taking the right position in one respect, in saying that exact particulars cannot be supplied, but we ought to have some approximate idea of what is intended to be covered by the amount set down.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—I ask Senator Playford to bear in mind a promise which was given to me last year, in connexion with the Royal Naval Reserve.

Senator GIVENS.—Who made the promise?

Senator MATHESON.—I forget which particular Government was in power, but I take it that a promise made by one Government is treated as an heirloom by the succeeding Government. On previous occasions, the advance made to the British Government for the Royal Naval Reserve has been described as an advance to the "Imperial" Government. Exception was taken to the word as not being the correct official title of the British Government. The promise was then made that in succeeding Supply Bills the expression would be brought into line with that used by the British Government itself. I call attention to the matter, because I consider it vital.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I know that Senator Matheson takes a great deal of interest in this matter.

Senator MATHESON.—In the word.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Well, in the word. The promise of which the honorable senator speaks was not made by the late Government, but by Senator Dawson, on behalf of the Government in which he was Minister of Defence. In my opinion, "Imperial" is the proper word, because it is the word used in the Naval Agreement, and also, I believe, in the Act. I mention this now, so that the Minister of Defence may not too readily acquiesce in the substitution of "British" for "Imperial."

Senator PLAYFORD.—The word "Imperial" is used in the annual Estimates.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—And it is the proper word, because it correctly indicates the definite purpose of the vote.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—It has escaped my learned friend that although "Imperial" is used in the Naval Agreement, it is used in the part framed by the Commonwealth Government. In the part of the Agreement framed by the British Government we will find that the words are "The Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland." If the honorable and learned senator refers to any Act of the British Parliament or indeed any document in which this reference has to be made, the word "Imperial" is not by any possible chance used, except in connexion with India; and we are not in the position of India. I believe in adhering strictly to the correct phraseology in all these matters.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I ask the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, whether there is any limit of time during which subscribers may continue to use the telephone? May business or social conversation, or gossip go on for an hour, irrespective of the inconvenience caused to other subscribers? If there is no regulation on the point, will the Minister consult the Postmaster-General as to the advisability of having a regulation?

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—Personally, I know of no regulation of the kind. I believe the time is left to the discretion of the subscribers, and, to some extent, to that of the telephone clerk, who can ascertain from time to time whether the parties are still in communication or wish to be disconnected. I shall make inquiries, and let the honorable senator know the result.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—Am I in order in referring to the hours worked by some employés in the Post and Telegraph Department on this vote?

The CHAIRMAN.—I think the honorable senator can connect that matter with the proposed expenditure.

Senator STEWART.—I desire to draw attention to the number of hours that Post Office employés in Brisbane—and also, I believe, in Sydney and Melbourne, although I am not quite sure—have to be on duty. Some of these men have to be at call from 5 o'clock in the morning until 10 o'clock at night, in order that they may make up a work-day of eight hours. During the whole of the seventeen hours they have to be on hand if the head of the Department desires them to do any work. Does the Minister representing the Postmaster-General look upon this arrangement with approbation? A man may be called upon at 5, and be dispensed with at 7; called again at 9 and dispensed with at 11; called at 3 in the afternoon and dispensed with at 5; and called back at 9 o'clock, and made to work until 10 o'clock. Such conditions would be known as sweating if they prevailed on the premises of a private employer; indeed, I do not think that a private employer would ask his people to spread their day's work over such a large number of hours. I should like to know whether the Postmaster-General will do something to remove this great source of complaint on the part of Post Office employés. The Commissioner has fixed those hours, and has been appealed to without result, so that it is high time Parliament interfered. The difficulty could, no doubt, be got over very easily if the heads of the Department and the Commissioner were anxious to deal squarely by the men. But it has been so long the custom to call the men at any and every hour that the authorities resent any attempt to place the conditions on anything like a fair basis. I am assured by the men that they are quite willing to sacrifice their own convenience to a great extent to assist in carrying on the work, but they consider the present regulations too bad. They point out that in a large number of instances it is not possible for them to go home, and they are compelled to spend the intervals either on the street, or somewhere else, to their great inconvenience and sometimes expense. In other cases where men had to go home there was extra expense incurred for car fares, railway fares, and so on. On the whole, the arrangement is a very unsatisfactory one for the men, and I should be pleased if Senator Keating, as representing the Postmaster-General, would bring this matter under the notice of the head of the Department, and try whether some better arrangement might not be arrived at.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—In answer to the honorable senator, I should like to say, as I have said once or twice before, that any representations which honorable senators make in the discussion of the classification scheme, to the effect that the principle or policy of the Public Service Act has been departed from, will be properly tabulated and submitted to the Public Service Commissioner for his consideration. It appears that in the matter referred to by Senator Stewart the men have exercised their right to appeal, and have been, so far as they are concerned, unsuccessful. But I shall bring the honorable senator's representations under the notice of the Postmaster-General, whether he refers to them again in dealing with the classification scheme or not, in order that, if on inquiry the Postmaster-General should think it necessary, they can be dealt with by him in conjunction with the Public Service Commissioner.

COPYRIGHT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Although it is late, I move the second reading of the Bill to-night. I shall probably not occupy much more than about half-an-hour, and then honorable members will have the advantage of being able to consider what I have had to say on the measure before they discuss it. Honorable senators have had copies of the Bill for something over a week, and have no doubt given due consideration to its provisions. Seeing that this is about the first time that we have attempted in any of the Australian States to legislate somewhat comprehensively on this subject, it will perhaps not be out of place if for a few minutes I refer to the origin of the law of copyright, and its gradual development, and briefly sketch the position in Australia at the present time. Honorable senators will know that copyright, as it exists, rests on the principle that an author is just as much entitled to the work and product of his own brain as is any private individual to any personal property, and that he is entitled to turn that property in the product of his own brain, to such profitable account as he can. Copyright did not, of course, engage any serious attention on the part of people until after the invention of printing. Prior to the invention of printing, of course, students who had given their attention to translating or writing a work, after completing it and submitting it to the public, found that what they had done had engaged so much of their time, that it was hardly likely any one would take advantage of their work to the extent of copying it in more than, perhaps, one or two instances. After the introduction of printing the possibility of, so to speak, indefinitely multiplying the product of an author's brain gave rise to a new set of circumstances. I think it is Hallam who tells us that the first recorded instance of copyright is a grant by the Senate of Venice in 1469 to a man named John Spirese, and that was the right to reproduce Cicero's Letters. It had always been admitted that an author had undoubtedly the exclusive right to the manuscript of his work, but with the possibility of converting that work into a profitable book, and so multiplying it indefinitely, a new set of circumstances, as I have said, arose. Trade custom and the decisions of the Equity Courts always recognised that the author had an exclusive right to his unpublished manuscript, but as soon as printing came into existence, as honorable senators are aware, various Sovereigns endeavoured, so far as they could, to regulate, direct, and control, almost directly and personally, the licences to print and to publish by means of printing. It was looked upon almost as one of the prerogatives of the Sovereign, and Sovereigns used this prerogative, if I might so call it, to licence the publication of books from time to time for the purpose of granting monopolies to individuals, and at the same time, obtaining some compensating advantage for themselves. We find in the history of the early development of the law of copyright, that once an author published his previously unpublished manuscript, the question arose whether at common law he had any exclusive right to the multiplication of copies of his work. The Stationers' Company, as honorable senators will no doubt remember from their reading of the history of England, had its charter, and the Royal authorities conferred on the Stationers' Company the right and to some extent the duty of regulating and controlling publication. They exercised this right, or discharged this duty, from time to time by their orders and decrees. We find working with them at the time, or some time a little later, the Star Chamber, which, by its decree in 1687, prohibited printing without a licence. In 1662, under a Licensing Act, the Lord Chamberlain was empowered to licence the printing and publication of certain books. This Act of 1662 was continued by successive Parliaments from time to time, and was finally repealed in 1691. Once it was repealed, again was revived the discussion on the common law right of an author, and the common law right of a printer to the exclusive right to multiply the publication of an author's work or works first printed by the printer. I may mention, in this connexion, that in the history of this branch of law, up to that time, the people who considered themselves most concerned with what might be called copyright, were not the authors, but the printers. Nearly every discussion that took place as to the right of exclusive publication, as to the right of the printer in a book, and his right to reprint it once it had been produced, dealt with the question from the point of view of the interests, not of the authors, but of the printers and publishers. It was not until 1709 that there was a real Copyright Act placed on the statute-book. That statute was passed in the eighth year of the reign of Queen Anne. It is still open to a considerable amount of doubt whether that Act really recognises that there was a right in common law to copyright, or whether it contemplates bringing into existence for the first time by statute a copyright such as we are familiar with to-day. At any rate, it was not until sixty-five years later, in 1774, that in the course of the case Donaldson v. Beckett, in which twelve Judges were called in to give their opinions on a certain number of questions categorically submitted to them, that a long cherished illusion was shattered. That was the illusion entertained on the part of publishers that they had something like a perpetual copyright, apart altogether from statute. It was just subsequent to this that authors began to recognise that authorship offered many of the advantages of a profession. Previously a good many of the authors, to whom we are indebted for some of the best literature we have, wrote with a view to fame and immortality, and wrote at the same time under the patronage of some wealthy public or private man. The first statute of modern importance that we have in connexion with copyright, apart from a Sculpture Copyright Act of 1798, and some Engraving Copyrights Acts, was passed in 1814, and it gave copyright to the original writer of a book for a term of twenty-eight years, or for life. The measure of copyright protection afforded by the Act gave rise to considerable discussion, and in 1842 the Imperial Parliament passed a Bill which is for all practical intents and purposes our starting point. By that Act copyright was given for a period of forty-two years, or for the life of the author, and seven years afterwards, whichever of the two periods should be the longer. Conditions were made that there should be a registration of the book at Stationer's Hall, and that it should precede any action for damages for infringement. Registration was not a necessary precedent to the acquiring of copyright; the publication of a book by a British subject in the United Kingdom, and a compliance with other conditions of the Act, entitled him to copyright. It subsisted in him, but if it were infringed by anybody it was not competent for him to take an action for damages for infringement until he had registered his copyright as prescribed by the Act, and once he had registered he could sue, not simply in respect of subsequent infringement, but also in respect of prior infringement. The copyright given by the Act of 1842 extended the area of copyright to the whole of the British Dominions. So that if a British subject in England brought out a book which he copyrighted, he had copyright not merely in the United Kingdom, but throughout the whole of the British Possessions. There was no corresponding or reciprocal provision made for those who brought out their books in any of the Colonies. It was a mere oversight, apparently not intentional, and the position was that any one who brought out a book in a British Colony obtained only the benefits of the copyright law, if any, of that Colony. In 1886, the Imperial Parliament passed a Copyright Act which, amongst other things, granted to colonial authors—that is, to authors in British Possessions—all the advantages throughout the British Empire that were obtained previously under the Act of 1842 by British authors who obtained their copyright in the United Kingdom. I wish honorable senators to bear in mind that all these Imperial enactments have force and effect throughout the British Empire, and that the copyright law of a British Possession is only supplemental to or concurrent with the Imperial legislation which is in force. For some time there has been a tendency on the part of different nations to enter into mutual arrangements with regard to the recognition of copyright from country to country. So far as Great Britain is concerned, this was done in 1884 by Orders in Council, and by copyright treaties with foreign countries. But in 1887 there was held at Berne a Conference, at which a number of countries were represented. The net result was the drawing up of an agreement known as the Berne Convention by which the countries there represented agreed amongst themselves each to recognise under conditions specified any copyright obtained in any of the others. The English Act of 1886 was passed in anticipation of the Berne Convention. It provided that the Berne Convention might be adopted and applied by Order in Council. An Order in Council was consequently passed on the authority of the Act after the Berne Convention had been settled. So that the Berne Convention, the Imperial Act of 1886, and other Imperial Acts, now apply throughout the whole of the British Dominions. The result is that if in, say, Spain, a writer brings out a book which is copyrighted there, he has also copyright in every other country which is a party to the Berne Convention, including Great Britain and all her Possessions. When, therefore, an author copyrights in his own country, the protection is extended by this international arrangement throughout the British Empire. That is the position in which we find ourselves to-day. By the Act of 1886 an Australian who copyrights his book in Australia gets reciprocal advantages throughout the British Empire, and those countries which are parties to the Berne Convention.

Senator WALKER.—Was the United States a party to that Convention?

Senator KEATING.—It was not, and unless it has come in very recently it is not still.

Senator WALKER.—It is not.

Senator KEATING.—The duration of such international copyright in British Possessions is either the duration according to English law—that is, for forty-two years, or the life of the author, plus seven years—or the duration under the law of the country of the book's origin, whichever is the shorter, not whichever is the longer. Apart from our States Copyright Acts we have therefore operating in Australia the Imperial Acts from 1842 to 1896, and also by the Order in Council under the Act of 1886, the provisions of the Berne Convention. In 1891 the United States, by what was known as the Chase Act, empowered non-citizens and non-residents to acquire a copyright in books published in the United States, but amongst other conditions all the work in connexion with the composition and printing of the books had to be done locally. It was a provision of a more or less protectionist character. The book had also to be printed in the United States prior to its being printed elsewhere. Analogously to this, I might mention that if an American dramatist wishes to acquire performing right, or, as it is sometimes erroneously called, dramatic copyright, in Great Britain, his first performance has to be given in Great Britain, or simultaneously in point of time in Great Britain and the United States. On the question of colonial copyright, the Imperial Act of 1842 gives copyright in books published in the United Kingdom, and under the Act of 1886 a colonial author who publishes locally is entitled to copyright throughout the British dominions, and also the countries which are parties to the Berne Convention. The English statutes are very numerous. Those which apply to Australia, as well as to other British possessions, number about eighteen, running from 8 George II., chapter, 13, to 2

Edward VII., chapter 15; and then we have the conventions of Berne of 1887 and Paris of 1896. These statutes deal, some with engravings, some with sculpture, some with plays, some with lectures, some with books, and some with paintings. It has been remarked that they have been drawn at different times, and that there is no congruity, so to speak, characterising them. To use the words of an eminent authority, Lord Thring—

They are drawn in different styles, and some are drawn so as to be barely intelligible. Obscurity of style is only one of the defects of these Acts. Their arrangement is often worse than their style. Of this the Copyright Act of 1842 is a conspicuous instance.

There has been a disposition on the part of certain persons in Great Britain to adopt a very comprehensive and up-to-date Copyright Act. I have just mentioned the conditions which the United States impose upon the acquisition of copyright. In 1875 Canada passed a Bill which would enable persons non-resident to secure copyright, provided that it was first published in Canada, or published there simultaneously with publication elsewhere; but that provision seemed to be in conflict with the Imperial Act of 1842. Grave doubts were expressed as to whether it was competent for Canada to impose conditions on the acquisition of copyright there when that Imperial Act already provided that British authors could obtain copyright throughout the British dominions. A Commission was appointed to inquire into the matter, and the result of the inquiry was that the Imperial Parliament had to pass a statute to empower the Queen to give her assent to the Canadian Bill.

Senator PEARCE.—But did the Constitution of the Dominion give power to legislate as to copyright in the same way as our Constitution does?

Senator KEATING.—Yes. The conditions which the Canadian Parliament imposed were in conflict with the conditions which the Imperial Act imposed for the acquisition of copyright throughout the British dominions, and the result was that an Imperial Act had to be passed to empower the Queen to assent to the Canadian Bill for the purpose of setting at rest any doubts.

Senator MULCAHY.—Would that have to be done in our case?

Senator KEATING.—If we passed a provision in conflict with the Imperial statute law which prevails throughout Australia, the Bill could not, I think, be submitted for the Royal assent until an enabling Act had been passed, as in the case of Canada.

Senator MILLEN.—Assuming that this Bill should become law, would the Imperial Acts remain in force here?

Senator KEATING.—Yes.

Senator DOBSON.—Canada copied the American principle of copyright.

Senator KEATING.—To some extent, but it was not so strict as in the United States. The Canadian Act gave rise to the consideration of many questions, and led in 1875 to a Commission being appointed to investigate the whole subject of copyright. They found all these divergencies, differences, want of harmony, and want of certainty pervading the whole statute law. They brought up a report recommending the enactment of certain provisions which would bring the copyright law into conformity with the requirements of the times. Every text book writer on the subject of copyright is constantly giving his readers cases where the utmost doubt exists as to what is the proper interpretation of the law. Scruton, the celebrated writer on the law of copyright, speaks of the circumstances I have just referred to in these terms at page 48 of the second edition of his textbook—

It only remains to add that, the national question being settled for a time by the Act of 1842, increased facilities for intercourse, and the spread of education led to knotty questions of International and Colonial copyright. A Canadian Act of 1875, thought to clash with the Imperial Act of 1842, was the cause of the appointment of the Copyright Commission in 1875, under the chairmanship of the late Lord Stanhope, who, as Lord Mahon, had introduced the Bill of 1842. After taking much valuable evidence, it reported in May, 1878, and the changes in the Law of Copyright which it recommended still wait legislative enactment till the House of Commons shall set itself in order and make better arrangements for accomplishing the legislative work of the nation.

In the United Kingdom and Australia we have the following varying terms of copyright. In regard to books, in the United Kingdom the period is the life of the author and seven years, or forty-two years, whichever period is the longer. In New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, and Western Australia, the same law applies. In respect of the fine arts, including paintings, drawings, and works of sculpture, in the United Kingdom the term of copyright is the life of the author and seven years, or forty-two years whichever period is the longer. In New South Wales and Victoria, the period is fourteen years. In Queensland the law of the United Kingdom applies. In South Australia and Western Australia, the period is fourteen years, and in Tasmania there is no provision. In the case of photographs the term is in the United Kingdom the life of the author and seven years, or forty-two years, whichever period is longer. In New South Wales and Victoria the period is three years. In Queensland the law of the United Kingdom applies. In South Australia and Western Australia, the period is three years, and in Tasmania no provision is made. In the case of engravings or prints, the term in the United Kingdom is twenty-eight years, and in New South Wales and Victoria fourteen years. In Queensland the law of the United Kingdom applies. In South Australia and Western Australia the term is fourteen years, and in Tasmania there is no provision. In the case of telegraphic news, in the United Kingdom no provision, unless there has been a very recent one, is made for protection. No provision is made in New South Wales, Victoria, or Queensland. But in South Australia there is protection for twenty-four hours from time of publication, but not to exceed thirty-six hours after receipt of the news. In Western Australia the term of protection is seventy-two hours from time of publication, and in Tasmania forty-eight hours from time of publication. To give a few instances of variations of terms of protection in different countries, whilst, as I have explained, in the United Kingdom the term is the life of the author and seven years, or forty-two years in all, whichever term is the longer, in Spain the term is the life of the author and eight years after his death.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is the term against which Macaulay protested as being too long.

Senator KEATING. — Quite so. In France the term is the life of the author and fifty years after his death; and in Belgium copyright is granted for the life of the author and twenty years after his death. This Bill will, if passed into law, have effect in the Commonwealth side by side, so to speak, with the Imperial enactments already in existence in connexion with this subject. But we can make special provisions in our copyright law, and we can impose special conditions by which these special provisions can be secured. I will explain what this Bill purports to do. In the first place, in Part II. it sets out the method of administration, which is analogous, generally speaking, to the method prescribed under the Patents Act and the Trade Marks Bill with which we have dealt. Clause 12 provides for the transfer of the administration of States Copyright Acts to the Commonwealth. In Part III. copyright is defined. It includes the exclusive right in connexion with books and musical and dramatic compositions to do certain things specified. Amongst those things is included the right to abridge or translate a book. Those are rights which, under some conceptions, do not exclusively belong to the owner of a copyright. But we are making special provisions in these particulars. Also in paragraph b of clause 13 we make provision in the case of a dramatic work for the owner of the copyright to have the exclusive privilege of converting it into a novel, and for the converse. That is to say, we reserve to the author the right to novelize a drama or to dramatise a novel. The Bill also provides that copyright shall subsist in every book, whether the author is a British subject or not, which book has first been published in Australia before, or simultaneously with, its first publication elsewhere. We do not make that a condition of copyright in any case; but we say that if the book has been first published in Australia simultaneously with its publication elsewhere, copyright shall subsist in that book. The word "simultaneously" means according to a definition in the Bill itself within fourteen days. Of course we cannot take away the copyright here which an author may have acquired in Great Britain, or in any of the countries having relation to Great Britain under the terms of the Berne Convention. But this provision simply makes it clear that when a book is published in Australia copyright under this Act shall subsist in it, and that all the advantages of this measure shall be given to it. We provide throughout this Bill a uniform period for copyright of a book, or of an artistic work including photographs for the performing rights in a dramatic or musical production, and for the lecturing right of a lecture. That period is the life of the author of the book, of the work, or of the lecture, or of the owner of the dramatic or musical work, with thirty years added in each case.

Senator Keating.

Senator WALKER.—Will a sermon receive the same protection as a lecture?

Senator KEATING.—No; special provision is made that sermons and political addresses do not come under the provisions of this copyright measure.

Senator MILLEN.—What! Is there to be no copyright in political addresses?

Senator KEATING.—If the honorable senator chooses to deliver a political address as a lecture, and takes steps to preserve the copyright, perhaps he may do so. Otherwise political addresses are excluded from the benefit of this Bill. The term of thirty years from the death of the author is adopted in consequence of the recommendation of the Imperial Royal Commission, to which I have referred. I may add that this Bill has been drawn largely upon the lines recommended by that Commission, whose report has been published, and is available in the Library.

Senator DOBSON.—Those recommendations are, I think, a little in advance of the English copyright law.

Senator KEATING.—Yes, they are.

Senator DOBSON.—They have not been adopted in Great Britain.

Senator KEATING.—No, owing to the reasons explained in the text-book of Mr. Scrutton, from which I have quoted.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What is the date of that Commission?

Senator KEATING.—The date of its report is 1878. It is further provided in the measure that the author of a book or artistic work shall be the first owner of the copyright in that book or work; that the author of a dramatic or musical work shall be the first owner of the performing right; and that the author of a lecture shall be the first owner of the lecturing right. I may mention with regard to lectures that a lecturing right may be preserved by the author in a very simple manner—by announcing orally before he delivers his lecture that he reserves to himself the lecturing right, or by means of a written announcement placed conspicuously in the hall where the lecture is delivered; the idea being, of course, that it may not be suggested that once a man has prepared his lecture and delivered it to the public he has necessarily dedicated it to the public.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That has been decided in Caird's case in regard to University lectures. A man is entitled to take notes for his own use, but not for publication.

Senator KEATING.—There are special provisions in the law with regard to certain University lectures. It is obvious that, should the author so desire, a man should be restrained, after having heard a lecture, from re-delivering that lecture orally, just as he should be restrained from taking a full note of it and publishing it as a book. A provision is therefore made in the Bill to reserve the lecturing right in a lecture to the author of it, provided that he complies with some very simple conditions. Of course, if he prints his lecture and publishes it, he makes it a book, and may at once secure the protection which belongs to copyright in a book. Provision is also made for the case of joint authors and separate authors, and also for the case of encyclopædias and periodicals, and articles contained in such publications. These, however, are all of them rather matters for consideration in Committee. Provision is made in the clauses regarding copyright in articles published in periodicals, which secure in all circumstances due consideration, both for the owner of the magazine or periodical, and for the writer of the article. Provision is also made in the Bill for insuring that copyright shall be personal property, and be capable of being dealt with as such. In clause 29 it is provided that, although the right of translation is reserved to the owner of a copyright, unless a translation of his book into a particular language is made within ten years from the date of publication, a person desirous of translating the book may make an application to the Minister, who may call upon the author or owner of the copyright to show cause why the applicant should not be allowed to make a translation. If the owner or author is not in a position to show cause, the Minister may grant the application of the person desirous of making the translation.

Senator WALKER.—Is it intended to restrain American publishers from sending copyright books to Australia, as they do not extend recognition to our copyright law?

Senator KEATING.—It is provided by the Customs Act that copyright books cannot be introduced into Australia from piracies of any country. There are other provisions in this Bill of a drastic character bearing upon the same point, to which I shall later on refer. In clause 33 the proprietor of any news agency or newspaper is granted copyright in news obtained exclusively by him abroad for a period of twenty-four hours. Part V. of the Bill deals with infringements of copyright. In this part of the measure Senator Walker will find ample provisions such as he desires. There is, first, the ordinary common law action for damages in case of breach of any of these rights. That applies both to copyright in a book or artistic work, to performing rights, and to lecturing rights. In the case of an action for damages, if the defendant objects to the plaintiff's title, he has to give notice of his grounds, so that the plaintiff shall not be taken at a disadvantage. In clause 50 Senator Walker will find that—

If any person (a) sells or lets for hire, or exposes, offers, or keeps for sale or hire any pirated book or any pirated artistic work; or (b) distributes or exhibits in public any pirated book or any pirated artistic work; or (c) imports into Australia any pirated book or pirated artistic work, he is guilty of an offence and liable to a penalty. But there is a proviso that no person shall be convicted of an offence if he proves to the satisfaction of the Court that he could not, "with reasonable care," have ascertained that the book or artistic work was pirated. We also provide that where there is an infringement of a dramatic or musical right, the person who has let the theatre or place of entertainment where that infringement has taken place, may be prosecuted for an offence, except that if the person prosecuted proves that he "could not with reasonable care," have ascertained that the work was performed in infringement of the rights of the owner, he is not liable. I may explain that in most instances, the managers or authors who own copyrights in dramatic and musical works, invariably circularize the owners of theatres and other places of entertainment, and lists are in consequence generally kept in respect of pieces in which copyright subsists. Clauses 52, 53, 54, and 55, are provisions to which I invite the attention of the Senate, before the Bill gets into Committee. The united effect of them is this: Many piracies take place on the part of persons against whom it is useless to proceed for damages, or to take out an injunction, because, to put it in the vernacular, they are not worth powder and shot. Therefore, some summary remedies have to be provided to give authors protection against such piracies. In this instance, we make provision that a justice of the peace, may, on the application of any owner of a copyright, issue a search warrant, and order a search to be made, the pirated goods may be seized, and the magistrate may deal summarily with the matter of their disposal. We also make provision that the owner of the copyright, if he has reason to suspect that a person has pirated copies in his possession, may, by notice, require that person to deliver up the copies, and if the person does not do so he is guilty of an offence, punishable summarily, and liable to a penalty of £10. But having armed the owner with a summary remedy, it is only fair to the other person and the community generally that the owner should be put in such a position that he will not exercise the power without due caution. Therefore, it is further provided, under penalties, that the owner shall not give any such notice without just cause, and if he is prosecuted for giving notice without just cause the onus of proof is put on him that he is the owner, and that at the time he took action he knew or had reason to believe that such copies were in the other party's possession. These are some of the special provisions of the Bill, by which we propose to give protection to international copyrighted works, so long as they are registered under the Bill. The other provisions simply deal with pirated works generally. Part VI. deals with international and State copyrights, and provides for the protection of all such copyrights in existence in Australia prior to this measure. It is also provided in Part VI. that anybody who has either an international copyright or an Imperial copyright—and the latter includes the international—may register, and thus, in addition to all the privileges, powers, and rights he at present enjoys by virtue of the Imperial Act and the Berne Convention, he may then obtain all the facilities, privileges, and powers which are granted by the Bill, but which neither the Berne Convention nor Imperial legislation secures to him. It is simply provided that if a book be first published in Australia, or published simultaneously here with its first publication elsewhere, it has all rights under this Act apart from registration; and that the owner of an international or Imperial copyright, if he wishes the additional privileges of this Act, may obtain them by the simple method of registration. Part VII. deals with the method of the registration of the copyright, and of the assignment and transmission of interests; and the other provisions relate to the rectification of registration, and the necessity of an owner registering before he sues for damages. The final part of the Bill simply makes provision against the suppression of books, and for regulations. If honorable senators have regard to the condition of the present law—with the Imperial Act, the various State Acts, and the provisions of the Berne Convention in relation to international rights, all operating—they will see how necessary it is to have some clearly defined system of legislation for the whole of the Commonwealth. This Bill is intended to meet the situation, and in great part it follows very largely the lines laid down by the Imperial Commission, which bestowed a great deal of care, attention, research, and thought to the whole subject. I think I can say with confidence that if the Bill be passed in its present—or anything like its present form—it will be regarded, not only in Australia, but in other parts of the Empire, as marking a distinct advance in legislation—perhaps the greatest advance that has been made on this subject, and one well in conformity with, and not behind, the necessities of the times.

Debate (on motion by Senator MILLEN) adjourned.

Senate adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 24 August, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 3.15 p.m., and read prayers.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton).—In one of the Melbourne newspapers published this morning, it is stated that I voted last night for the amendment of the honorable member for Dalley, whereas I voted with the Noes, as I did not consider that the charge made against the Attorney-General had been substantiated. As the journal in question has a large circulation, I think it due to myself and my constituents to make this explanation.

DEFECTIVE AMMUNITION.

Mr. KELLY.—I desire to ask the Minister representing the Minister of Defence, without notice, if his attention has been directed to a statement in this morning's Age to the effect that certain ammunition issued by the Ordnance Department between the 12th dates of 26th May and 2nd August, of this year, has been shown to be very defective? Was the ammunition in question supplied by the Colonial Ammunition Company? If so, I wish to know what action the Minister of Defence proposes to take to see that in future ammunition issued by this company shall be up to the standard requirements.

Mr. EWING.—Does the honorable member refer to the ammunition used in certain rifles which have burst?

Mr. KELLY.—Yes.

Mr. EWING.—Immediately after the occurrences in question, a Board was appointed to inquire whether they were due to defective powder or to faulty rifles, and I am sorry that the report, for which I made inquiry this morning, is not yet to hand. As soon as it is ready, I will let the House know.

Mr. PAGE.—Will the honorable member lay the report on the table?

Mr. EWING.—The House will be given full information at the earliest moment.

ENGLISH MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. FISHER.—In view of the statement of the Premier of Queensland that the Parliament of that State is about to ratify a contract with the Orient Steam Navigation Company, under which the company's steamships will visit Brisbane, I ask the Postmaster-General if this House will be given an early opportunity to discuss the Commonwealth contract with the company for the carriage of mails, upon which the other contract will really hinge. Can he say on what date the House will be asked to ratify the contract?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I am anxious to move for the ratification of the contract as soon as possible, and I hope to be able to do so immediately the debate on the second reading of the Manufactures Encouragement Bill is finished, perhaps tomorrow afternoon, or on Tuesday next.

COMMONWEALTH PRESS WRITER.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I wish to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to a couple of articles which I have received, written by Mr. John Plummer, who is paid to give, according to his own statement, "reliable information respecting the character, resources, capabilities, &c., of the Australian Commonwealth." In one of these articles the writer says that "Ample provision for the establishment of village settlements is also made in South Australia." As that statement is inaccurate, I ask the Prime Minister if he will see that in future Mr. Plummer disseminates only accurate information?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have not read the articles referred to, but I shall have the attention of the writer called to the honorable member's complaint.

ANKYLOSTOMIASIS.

Mr. WILSON.—I wish to know if the Prime Minister has noticed that a fatal case of ankylostomiasis, or dirt-eating disease, is reported from Williamstown, said to have been caused by cotton imported from abroad? Will the honorable gentleman take steps to prevent its further spread?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I will call the attention of the Department interested to the honorable member's statement.

PAPER.

The CLERK laid upon the table the following paper:—

Return to an order of the House dated 10th August, relating to the High Court arrangements and expenses.

CAIRNS CUSTOMS HOUSE RESERVE.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Is it the intention of the Department of Home Affairs to retain the whole of the land at Cairns now occupied as a Customs House reserve, or is it intended to retain only a portion of it?

Mr. GROOM.—The Inspector-General of Works is in Queensland making inquiries in connexion with transferred properties, and will give his attention to this matter. He is to report immediately on his return to Melbourne next week.

SERGEANT FALLON.

Mr. CONROY.—Will the Vice-President of the Executive Council, who represents the Minister of Defence in this House, see that some provision is made for the widow of Sergeant Fallon, who was accidentally killed while on duty at the Randwick rifle range. I understand that if he had been only disabled, provision could have been made for him under the regulations, but that the regulations are defective inasmuch as they do not provide for the giving of an allowance to the relatives of men who have been killed.

Mr. EWING.—The regulations do not provide for the giving of aid to the widow of a militia man who is killed when virtually on duty, and should be altered to meet cases of this kind. If the honorable and learned member will send particulars of the case to the Minister, I am sure that honorable gentleman will deal with the widow as considerably as he would desire.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Will the Vice-President of the Executive Council advise the Minister of Defence to place on the Supplementary Estimates a sum of money to meet this case?

Mr. EWING.—If the case is dealt with favorably, and money is required, it should be given as promptly as possible. It is impossible to place a vote on the Estimates in Chief, and I will submit to the Minister of Defence the propriety of doing what the honorable member suggests.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It would appear from the answers to questions asked in the Senate yesterday, published in one of this morning's newspapers, that a daily allowance of 25s. is paid to the members of the Royal Commission on the Tariff. The statement of the Government, through its mouthpiece in the Senate, is that this allowance is not to be paid to the members of the Commission who are also members of Parliament, if the Commission is sitting in Melbourne while Parliament is in session, but if the Commission is sitting in Melbourne when Parliament is not in session, it is to be paid to such members of Parliament as do not reside in Melbourne. Further, when the Commission sits in a State other than Victoria during the session of Parliament, the allowance will be paid only to those members of Parliament who are members of the Commission who do not reside in that particular State. The answers would seem to indicate that if the Commission is sitting in Melbourne, the Chairman, who lives in Victoria, will be paid for attending its meetings, but that a member of Parliament residing in a State other than Victoria attending a meeting in that State will not be so paid. I wish to know from the Prime Minister if that is what is meant?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. The allowance is payable at all places where sittings are held, other than the place at which the member resides, with the exception of Melbourne during the session of Parliament.

In the replies referred to, place, not State, was meant.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I should also like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to some comments on the Commission in to-day's Age. After animadverting in the severest terms upon the work of the Commission, the writer of the article in question says—

Week after week passes away and the Commission makes no effort to discharge the duty for which it was mainly appointed. Its Chairman has been from the first one of the causes of the Commission's barrenness. He had the direction of its efforts, and instead of taking such steps as would have made possible a progress report upon a few of the most urgent cases, he has dissipated his inquiries over a wide range of comparatively useless investigation. He has made the mistake from the first of endeavouring to magnify his office rather than of making it useful. He has talked grandiloquently of a "monumental report," when common sense pointed to a limited and specialized effort. It is a matter of common gossip in the lobbies of the House that he has entirely failed to obtain the confidence of his fellow Commissioners.

That is news to most of us—

Indeed, the disastrous failure of the Commission is very largely owing to Sir John Quick, the Chairman.

Does the Prime Minister propose to take any steps to deal with this serious reflection on a Royal Commission appointed at the instance of this House? Has he any view which he would care to express in regard to the leader from which I have quoted?

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the Government were called upon to answer all the comments which the press chooses to make on the actions of Parliament, we should do no other work.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Parliament should defend its Commissions.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, as the Ministry is ready, when necessary, to take action to defend itself. Not a day passes but criticism of the most hostile character appears in regard to the actions, not only of Ministers, but of Departments, and of public servants; but it is recognised that one of the conditions of free speech in a community like this is that the most opposite and antagonistic opinions shall be permitted to find expression. As one acquainted with the views of the Chairman of the Commission, I know that nothing is further from his wish than that delay should occur. He has been from the first most anxious to press forward the inquiry at all times, and having made great sacrifices in accepting the office of Chairman, is prepared to make even greater sacrifices to expedite the work of the Commission. What is implied by the article which has been read is that the newspaper in which it is published is, in accordance with its policy, pressing in the strongest fashion for the early consideration of certain specific industrial complaints. Because the Chairman of the Commission has not adopted the line of action which the writer considers best, he censures him, as public men are continually being censured, without what appears to me an adequate allowance for difference of views or consideration of all the facts surrounding his work. The task of the Commission is one of the most complex and intricate which could well be cast upon any body of men. The Commission having thought fit to approach the work in a judicial manner, the newspaper contends that another course should have been adopted. No doubt there are a number of persons outside injuriously affected by the existing Tariff who hold opinions similar to those expressed in the press, and who give utterance in the strongest language to the view that their cases—that is, the cases of special hardship—should be first considered.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — And that the money derived from the taxpayers should be put into their pockets.

Mr. DEAKIN. — It is not a question of putting money into the pockets of a few manufacturers, but of affording employment to hundreds of workmen who have lost their work in consequence of the operation of the Tariff.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Is that intended to be a justification of the language used by the Age?

Mr. DEAKIN. — It is intended to be a justification of its presentation of the views of those who are being specially affected by the operation of the Tariff.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Does it justify the Age in publishing a scandalous libel on the Commission?

Mr. DEAKIN. — We may not agree with the strictures passed by the press on the Commission, or upon this House, and we are not expected to indorse such comments. Journalists, in common with ordinary members of the public, are at perfect liberty to express their own opinions without looking to us for any indorsement. Unfortunately, the press desires to govern this House and every Parliament of every State—that is the constant effort of all newspapers.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — If this sort of thing is to go on, it will be difficult to induce honorable members to serve on any Commission.

Mr. DEAKIN. — It may also be found difficult to induce men to offer their services to the country as members of Parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER. — Order! I would point out that under the Standing Orders no question containing argument can be put, and that Ministers, in replying to questions, are not permitted to indulge in argument. The question was put in a proper form, and the Prime Minister was replying in perfect accordance with the requirements of the Standing Orders; but by interjection he has been drawn into a discussion of the question, and I would remind him that he would not be in order in continuing to argue it.

Mr. DEAKIN. — I confess that I was drawn aside from a direct reply to the question. I desire to say that such knowledge as I have of the proceedings of the Commission, and of the opinions and intentions of the chairman, do not justify the comment upon him to which reference has been made. At the same time, as every honorable member holds his own opinion on this subject, so the great journals of the State are entitled to express theirs. I wish, however, that a purely intellectual argument could be conducted without the introduction of feeling such as has been manifested both inside and outside of the House.

NEW SOUTH WALES POST OFFICE REVENUE.

Mr. JOHNSON asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Whether he is yet in possession of the information necessary to furnish a reply to the following portion of a question asked upon notice on Thursday, 10th inst., and repeated on Thursday, 17th inst. :—

5. What is the amount of revenue received from the New South Wales Department from each of the following sources :—

- (a) Postal?
- (b) Telegraphs?
- (c) Telephones?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows :—

All the information available will be found on page 2 of the Budget papers circulated on Tuesday last, and now in the hands of honorable members.

STATE-OWNED STEAMERS.

Debate resumed from 10th August (vide page 818), on motion by Mr. SPENCE, for Mr. THOMAS—

1. That a Select Committee of both Houses of Parliament be appointed to make full inquiry as to the advisability of the Federal Government owning and controlling a fleet of steamers for the carriage of mails, passengers, and cargo between Australia and the United Kingdom. The Committee, so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, to consist of Mr. Glynn, Mr. Mahon, Mr. McDonald, Mr. McWilliams, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Sydney Smith, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Webster, and the mover, and to have power to send for persons, papers, and records. Four to be the quorum.

2. That the foregoing resolution be transmitted by message to the Senate and their concurrence requested in the appointment of the Committee, and asking them to appoint members to serve thereon.

Upon which Mr. DEAKIN had moved, by way of amendment—

That the words "of both Houses of Parliament," lines 1 and 2; "the advisability of the Federal Government owning and controlling a fleet of steamers for," lines 3 and 4; and "so far as the House of Representatives is concerned," lines 7 and 8; and paragraph 2 be left out.

And upon which Mr. ROBINSON had moved by way of a further amendment—

That the words "Mr. Robinson" be left out.

Mr. THOMAS (Barrier).—The honorable member for Hindmarsh was kind enough to move the adjournment of the debate a fortnight ago, in order to enable me to speak. I desire to thank the honorable member for Darling for having very kindly taken charge of this motion in my unavoidable absence from the House. I have read the discussion which has taken place, and I feel sure that it is not necessary for me to add anything to what has been stated by the mover, who has covered all the ground. I was pleased to notice that very little objection was urged to an inquiry into the subject. The Prime Minister has moved some amendments which I readily accept. I desire that this Committee shall obtain all possible information, with the idea of the Commonwealth Government ultimately becoming the owners of the steamers which carry the mails between Australia and England, because I feel sure that only when that change has been brought about shall we overcome the difficulties which beset us at present. I do not contemplate that the operations of such a line of steamers would be confined to the carrying of mails, but that it would also convey passengers and cargo. I am very strongly in favour of the Commonwealth acquiring a fleet of steamers which will be capable of carrying the mails between here and Great Britain, and also of entering into ordinary business, such as is conducted by the present mail companies. I am contented that the whole question should be inquired into by a Committee, even though my ultimate objective is not made the main subject of inquiry, because I believe that all the arguments that could be brought to bear against my proposal would not be sufficient to outweigh the evidence in favour of Commonwealth ownership of the mail steamers. I understand that some objection is raised, and possibly with some degree of fairness, to the personnel of the Committee. One of the reasons why the Committee as it now stands is not fairly representative of both sides of the House is that when my motion was first framed the Reid Government were still in office. Since then, of course, the disposition of parties has somewhat changed. The honorable member for Parramatta pointed out that too many members of the Labour Party had been nominated on the Committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes, in view of the fact that the objective was socialistic.

Mr. THOMAS.—I originally nominated eleven members, but the Prime Minister suggested that the number should be reduced, and I agreed to the elimination of the names of the honorable member for Grampians and the honorable member for Bourke. The former honorable member consented to be nominated merely as a personal favour to myself, because he was busy in connexion with the Old-age Pensions Commission and in other ways, and afterwards the name of the honorable member for Bourke was withdrawn. Upon the withdrawal of these names five honorable members of the Labour Party and four other honorable members were left among those nominated. The honorable and learned member for Angas asked me to withdraw his name, as he was very busy, and the honorable and learned member for Wannon also desired that his name should be withdrawn. As that would leave upon the Committee too many members of the Labour Party. I now move—

That the words, "Mr. Glynn," and "Mr. Webster," be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words, "Mr. Chanter" and "Mr. Gibb"; and that the words, "Mr. Storrer" be inserted.

The Committee will then be constituted of three members of the Opposition, four members of the Labour Party, and two members of the direct Ministerial Party.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That would not be fair.

Mr. THOMAS.—In view of the fact that the Labour Party and the Ministerialists represent two-thirds of the members of the House, I do not see that any objection can be taken to the selection, except possibly by members of the direct Ministerial Party.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They could not raise an objection.

Mr. FULLER.—The list now embraces the names of five members of the Labour Party, including that of the honorable member for Riverina.

Mr. McWILLIAMS (Franklin).—Although I was absent at the time that the honorable member for Barrier framed his motion, and was not consulted by him, I was quite prepared to serve upon a Committee upon which all parties of the House were fairly represented. I shall not, however, be willing to act upon a Committee such as that now proposed.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—I think that the proposed Committee will be able to do excellent work, especially under the conditions proposed by the Prime Minister. In the first place, it was proposed that the Committee should have a socialistic objective, but the modification suggested by the Prime Minister places it in quite a different category. If the fullest possible information be obtained with regard to the conditions under which mails, passengers, and freight are carried between Australia and the old country, the very greatest benefit will be conferred upon our people.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Barrier has told us that he will, as far as he can, direct the energies of the Committee to the achievement of his socialistic object.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I take it that the honorable member feels that the amendment of the Prime Minister would preclude him from making the direct inquiries he first contemplated. Whilst certain honorable members might reasonably have declined to act on a Committee with an object such as that first proposed, it seems to me that no one need shirk the responsibility of assisting to conduct an inquiry such as that now contemplated. I am satisfied that if the matter is thoroughly investigated the very greatest benefit will result to the mercantile community, because excessive commissions have now to be paid by shippers who send cargo from Australia to the other end of the world. The conditions that prevail in respect of the carriage of our mails are familiar to honorable members, and will require very careful investigation. I am sanguine that evidence elicited from witnesses who would appear before the Committee would prove of very great assistance to honorable members, and I venture to predict that the next mail contract which is entered into with any of our large shipping companies would contain very much more favorable conditions to the Commonwealth than does the existing contract, owing to the information which would be derived from men who are thoroughly conversant with the conditions that obtain in the shipping circles of Australia.

Mr. FULLER. — A Royal Commission would perform the work much better.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I believe that the honorable and learned member is correct in affirming that a Royal Commission could investigate this matter much more thoroughly than could a Select Committee; but I have not risen for the purpose of proposing any amendment to the motion. At the same time, I think that the honorable and learned member for Illawarra has made a very valuable suggestion. I am of opinion that the Committee proposed would accomplish much more good than is at present conceived by this House, and that its report would prove of a most valuable character. I support the amendments of the Prime Minister.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley). — I think that there is too great a tendency in this House to agree to the appointment of Select Committees, which, in time, become converted into Royal Commissions. It seems to me that if a return were prepared showing the cost already incurred by the Commonwealth in Royal Commissions, the public would be staggered by the bills which have been paid by the Treasurer.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—A Select Committee would be no cheaper than a Royal Commission.

Mr. WILKS.—Exactly.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It would not, compared with a Commission, consisting of members of Parliament.

Mr. WILKS.—The tendency to appoint Select Committees and Royal Commissions without rhyme or reason simply because some honorable member suggests a "catchy" question, is absolutely unjustified. To-day the honorable member for Barrier merely endorsed a bald resolution—he did not attempt to support it by any evidence showing that an inquiry into this matter is warranted. No man, I claim, can determine the limits to which an inquiry by this fossicking expedition would extend. If it is to be of any use at all, its members would have to visit, not only the centres of the leading States of Australia, but probably the United Kingdom.

Mr. POYNTON.—Does not the honorable member think that the subject is worthy of inquiry, seeing that we are paying so much for the carriage of our mails?

Mr. WILKS.—The data submitted is not sufficient to warrant the House in countenancing the motion for one moment. If it can be shown that excessive charges are being made by the mail companies, or that there is inefficient transport of the mails, there might be some justification for the proposal. But it is preposterous to institute a fossicking expedition simply upon a bald resolution, and no one should more keenly oppose the creation of such a body than the Prime Minister himself. If he wishes to husband the financial resources of the Commonwealth, now is his opportunity to do so. If he fails in his duty in that direction, what is to prevent any honorable member from tabling a seductive resolution in favour of the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into almost any matter coming within the purview of Federal legislation? Under such circumstances, it is easy to conceive of the whole House being busily employed in travelling round the country. The history of this Parliament has been characterized by the appointment of too many Select Committees and Royal Commissions. Only to-day we find one of the powerful Melbourne newspapers voicing its dissatisfaction with the work of the Tariff Commission. In the face of such an expression of opinion, are we to appoint another Committee of the character proposed? Every honorable member must have heard the absolutely indecent wrangle which took place in the Chamber this afternoon regarding the personnel of the proposed Committee. In the blandest manner possible, we heard the honorable member for Barrier suggest the names of certain honorable members to serve on that body, four of whom are direct members of the Labour Party and two others in the closest sympathy with them—I refer to the honorable member for Riverina and the honorable member for Bass.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Two honorable members who will vote Socialism every time.

Mr. WILKS.—I will not go so far as to say that; but certainly those two honorable members have shown themselves in sympathy with the caucus movement, and caucus legislation. It has been proposed that six honorable members from the other side of the Chamber, and two honorable members from the Opposition shall serve upon the Committee. What respect could the Commonwealth pay to the recommendations of a body of that character. In view of the fact that the Ministerial party number only nineteen all told, whereas the Opposition, excluding Mr. Speaker, totals twenty-eight members, it would be a lop-sided Committee. The balance of the House is represented by members of the Labour Party. Tested from the stand-point of those figures, not even proportional representation is proposed in regard to the personnel of the Committee. I say that before appointing any further Select Committees, we should tabulate the cost of Royal Commissions and Select Committees up-to-date, and let the public judge for themselves how little return they have received from the expenditure incurred in this direction. Moreover, the House has yet to decide that it is socialistically inclined. I could understand the Prime Minister declaring that it was the policy of the Government to introduce a system of State ownership of steamers; but for a private member to take that stand, and for this Chamber to indorse it, would be an admission that we are prepared to receive from a Committee a report of a socialistic character. Until more reliable data is forthcoming, I shall oppose the appointment of this or any other Select Committee.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—When this motion was submitted, I must confess that I felt some surprise at finding that the Government concurred in the appointment of the Select Committee even with the modifications proposed by the Prime Minister. It is perfectly obvious from the honorable and learned gentleman's amendments, that the Government are not at present prepared to consider as within the pale of practical politics the suggestion of the honorable member for Barrier that a fleet of steamers should be purchased and controlled by the Commonwealth. But instead of taking up the bold position of declaring that they would not sanction the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into that matter, the Government emasculated the resolution and were content to saddle the country with an unknown expense, notwithstanding that there was no hope of reward accruing to the community from such an investigation. I understand that the honorable member for Barrier has accepted the amendments of the Prime Minister. This is a motion which came in like a lion, and is going out like a lamb of very poor quality—a lamb which certainly would not be graded under the Commerce Bill as fit for export. If there was any prospect of the inquiry proving of some benefit to the community, I should not stand in the way of the appointment of the Committee. But what is to be gained from such an investigation? It is proposed to appoint a Select Committee to make full inquiry as to the carriage of mails, passengers, and cargo, between Australia and the United Kingdom. Can such a body acquire from any source, information which cannot, and should not, be acquired by the Government in the course of its duty? What source of information will be open to the Committee which is not accessible to the Postmaster-General and his Department?

Mr. THOMAS.—What about the Old-age Pensions Committee and the Government of which the honorable and learned member was a Minister?

Mr. McCAY.—That interjection is entirely irrelevant. I again ask what information can be obtained by this Committee which cannot be acquired by the Government?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Its members will find that out.

Mr. McCAY.—Then the Committee is to be appointed to ascertain if it can discover something which the Government cannot find out?

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is the object of the appointment of all Committees.

Mr. McCAY.—I beg the honorable and learned member's pardon. Committees are usually appointed only when it is reasonably clear that they can gain information which is not so readily available to the Departments of the Commonwealth. I say without hesitation that the Postmaster-General's Department can secure more reliable information, and in a less space of time, than can possibly be acquired by the proposed Committee. The object of the motion is perfectly clear. The honorable member for Barrier and his friends in the Labour corner, would constitute a majority of the Committee, inasmuch as there would be five members of their party upon it, out of a total of nine members. In other words, there would be a majority of gentlemen serving upon it who have the reputation—deservedly or otherwise—of being Socialists, and who have no hesitation in affirming that Socialism is the proper form of government to adopt. They exhibit no lack of boldness in proposing the first big experiment in the direction of nationalization—an experiment in which it would be quite impossible for the State to succeed. This proposal would mean more by a great deal than the nationalization of a monopoly. It would mean the nationalization of a service which could not be made a monopoly, except by subjecting the commercial community to such enormous inconvenience that even our socialistic friends would shrink from tackling the job. That is the nature of the proposal in its original form, but though the Prime Minister has taken all the heart out of it, these bold Socialist warriors are content to accept everything that has been proposed by way of amendment. I can understand a man holding a view, and standing up for it; but I must confess that I am surprised at the attitude of those who, having made a suggestion of this kind, and having resolved to institute a fishing inquiry, which cannot result in any good, have abandoned the whole principle concerning which they desired to have an investigation. What does the honorable member for Barrier expect such a Committee to accomplish? I notice that the Postmaster-General in the Watson Administration is to be a member of it. What does he expect to find out as a member of the Committee that he could not ascertain as Postmaster-General?

Mr. MAHON.—As members of a Select Committee, we can examine witnesses upon oath.

Mr. McCAY.—We have seen witnesses giving evidence upon oath before Select Committees and before the Tariff Commission. I am not going to say that they are prepared to swear lies; but I do say that sworn evidence is not always the best testimony which can be obtained. I do not wish the Commonwealth to incur further expense by the appointment of a body of this character without some justification being shown for it. Not a word has been said to justify any such proposal. There has not been a suggestion that wrongs exist which can be righted by means of the information which would be furnished to this House and the community by a Select Committee, and, until that has been done, no case can be made out for its appointment. This is the first Select Committee whose appointment has been asked for without any justification being shown for its creation. The question of the carriage of mails, passengers, and cargo between Australia and the United Kingdom is undoubtedly a difficult one, but it is not one which can be settled by the sort of information which this Committee could elicit from the witnesses it is likely to examine. For example, would it call the representatives of shipping companies and force them to disclose all the secrets of their business—a power which I doubt very much whether it could exercise? If that is intended, I venture to think that its members are more sanguine than they are justified in being. No arrangements are made between the Commonwealth and shipping companies other than by open bargaining in the ordinary course of business. If it be suggested that the Commonwealth is at present paying money for the carriage of its mails which it ought not to pay, no one knows better than the honorable member for Coolgardie that, as far as the existing arrangements are concerned, it could not have hoped to get its work done at a less cost.

Mr. MAHON.—It could be done if there were no shipping rings.

Mr. McCAY.—That is the point. The honorable member ought to know that a contract for the carriage of mails between Australia and the United Kingdom is not to be undertaken by any one unless he can satisfy the Government that he is a man of substance. Speculative brokers who make offers to the Commonwealth to carry out large contracts, without giving any substantial guarantee of their ability to perform them, are not to be seriously regarded. When the honorable member for Coolgardie interjects that if there were not a shipping ring in existence this service might be carried out at a more reasonable cost, he betrays what, after all, may be the intention—although, perhaps, the unconscious intention—of the majority of the proposed Select Committee—that is, to find that no satisfactory arrangement can be made for this service in the absence of a nationalized system of steamers. In other words, those who are to be appointed to this Select Committee wish to deal with the whole question in a way that the amendment was designed to prevent.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not think the amendment will prevent the Select Committee from considering the whole question.

Mr. McCAY.—Even if the motion be passed as amended, the Select Committee, if it finds that the evidence justifies it, may report that the Commonwealth alone can properly carry out this system. The Prime Minister could not possibly have realized that fact when he moved the amendment, otherwise he would have opposed the motion. I am not going to be a party to inquiries that suggest that the Commonwealth is going to attempt to become a public owner in the very direction in which public ownership would be accompanied by difficulties—difficulties far greater than those which must naturally surround the ordinary assumption of such powers. A monopoly cannot be created in this direction. I should have thought that the socialistic party would begin with something less ambitious than a proposition of this kind. If, on the one hand, the motion, as amended, will mean nothing more than an inquiry into facts, with which every one is fairly well acquainted, and which certainly could be ascertained with very little difficulty by the Postmaster-General's Department, I cannot support it; and if, on the other hand, it will leave the Committee, with its majority of avowed Socialists, open to discuss the whole question as originally proposed, I must still vote against it. I should be very glad to hear some reason, good, bad, or indifferent, for the creation of this Select Committee, and as to why the Government should be ready to indulge so cheerfully in further expenditure in this direction. Public funds have apparently no useful purpose to serve. I am ready to be convinced of the justice of any case, but those who question the wisdom of appointing this Committee are entitled to expect its advocates to give some reason for its creation. We should not vote for it merely because it has been submitted by a member of a party which controls the movements of the House, and has been agreed to by its obedient supporters in an altered form. Are we to support the motion simply because honorable members in the Ministerial corner say, "We have the numbers, and are going to have this inquiry in some form or other." That seems to be the position, and until some good reasons are adduced for the appointment of the Committee, we shall do wrong in agreeing to the motion.

Mr. POYNTON (Grey).—The reason for the opposition to this motion is obvious. The mistake that has been made lies in the fact that the motion was submitted from the Ministerial corner. I, for one, however, wish to know why the Commonwealth should have to pay so much for the carriage of its over-sea mails?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — Cannot the honorable member trust the Government to inform him?

Mr. POYNTON.—The Postmaster-General in the late Government informed representatives of the press a little time ago that an attempt was being made by the Orient Company to rob Australia—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What?

Mr. POYNTON.—To extract a larger sum of money from the Commonwealth in respect of the mail service than was justifiable.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Then the word "rob" was not used.

Mr. POYNTON.—That was the effect of the words which the late Postmaster-General used when dealing with the question. The honorable member for Parramatta is not always very careful in the choice of his words, but I am quite prepared to accept all responsibility for any statement I may make. It is well known that until quite recently we paid £70,000 per annum for the carriage of our mails between Australia and the United Kingdom, and that the Orient Company endeavoured to extract £150,000 a year from the Government in respect of this service. Those who are always ready to raise the socialistic bogey asserted that the demand for an increased subsidy was due to the trend of socialistic legislation—that it was practically the result of the provision in the Post and Telegraph Act that black labour shall not be employed on subsidized mail steamers. Much to their chagrin, however, they found that the company would not support them in that contention. The company itself admitted that the demand for an increased subsidy was not due to the white labour provisions of the Act.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member is wrong in his figures. We formerly paid, not £70,000, but £85,000 per annum for this service.

Mr. POYNTON.—The reason given by the company for demanding a subsidy of £150,000 was not that they would in future be required to employ only white labour, but that they were losing money on the Australian service. They wished the Postal Department practically to make up a guarantee equal to 5 per cent. on the capitalized value of their Australian service.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I rise to a point of order. It is a well-known rule, Mr. Speaker, that we may not anticipate a matter that is already set down for discussion on the notice-paper. The honorable member is now dealing with the amount of the subsidy required for the carriage of mails under the contract recently entered into by the Postmaster-General, and which contract, according to the statement made this afternoon by the Minister, will be submitted to the House in the course of a day or two. I submit that the honorable member may not traverse that phase of the question at length, as he appears to be doing.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Parramatta is correct in saying that no discussion which anticipates the debate on notice of motion No. 2 of Government business can now take place. The honorable member for Grey can discuss the question of the mail contracts only in so far as it relates to the motion for the appointment of a Select Committee.

Mr. POYNTON.—I was not aware that I had exceeded my right in this respect, and I venture to submit that the whole question of the carriage of mails may be reviewed under cover of this motion. I do not intend, however, to assist the opponents of the proposal in their desire to delay the appointment of the Select Committee. The Orient Company now charge something like £800 for the carriage of a ton of mail matter to England, although they will carry a ton of merchandise at from £1 to £3. As a matter of fact, the charge which they make for the carriage of frozen produce is only about £4 per ton—

Mr. KNOX.—What about the time allowed for the conveyance of the mails?

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member will find that for some years very little saving of time has taken place. We have now entered into a contract with the Orient Company for the carriage of our mails from Australia to the United Kingdom at a cost of £120,000 per annum. It is nothing to honorable members of the Opposition that we should throw away a large portion of that sum of money, and in their opinion it is monstrous that an honorable member sitting in the Ministerial corner should suggest an inquiry into the whole of the circumstances surrounding the carriage of our over-sea mails. When such a proposal is made they urge that it is a socialistic one. Everything depends upon the brand of Socialism put forward. I am satisfied that if the question were put before the public they would indorse my contention, that it is only reasonable for us to inquire whether or not we ought to pay £120,000 a year for this service.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Let us put the question before the public.

Mr. POYNTON.—That is what we desire to do, but, in the first place, there should be a thorough investigation into the facts.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Then the honorable member cannot trust the Ministry.

Mr. POYNTON.—I wish that the impetuous members of the Opposition would allow me to speak. The passing of this motion will commit the House to nothing.

Mr. MCCAY.—Except expense.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—What expense will it involve?

Mr. POYNTON.—Is it not fair that some inquiry should be made? In the course of the next few years we may have to renew the present contract with the Orient Company, and we have no guarantee that they will not then demand £150,000 or £200,000 a year for the service. Of all the propositions calculated to assist the producers of Australia this is one of the most important that has been submitted to the House.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The secret butter rebates would not have been made had there been an inquiry.

Mr. POYNTON.—Quite so. That in itself is a justification for the appointment of a Select Committee. The Opposition has taken exception to the motion simply because it has been submitted by the honorable member for Barrier.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Who has declared that he will prosecute the inquiry for socialistic purposes.

Mr. POYNTON.—Why should the Opposition fear a fair investigation?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Because it is a chimerical idea.

Mr. POYNTON.—Is the honorable member's brand of individualism so bad that he is afraid of an investigation in this case? The brand of Socialism that I am proud to support is such that I invite its closest investigation.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Will the honorable member agree to there being equal representation on the Select Committee?

Mr. POYNTON.—My only desire is that there shall be an honest inquiry.

Mr. KELLY.—Will the Labour Party agree to a Committee consisting only of honorable members of the Opposition being appointed to inquire into Socialism?

Mr. POYNTON.—Judging from some of the speeches delivered by members of the Opposition, they are not in a fit state to be entrusted with so important a task. They have yet to learn the alphabet of Socialism. That, however, is not the question before the House. We desire an honest investigation in regard to the carriage of our mails.

Mr. KELLY.—Let us have an impartial inquiry.

Mr. POYNTON.—If we had equal representation no doubt the Committee would be equally divided in regard to its findings.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—When the motion was before us on a former occasion a suggestion was made as to the personnel of the Committee, but it seems to have been ignored.

Mr. POYNTON.—I do not think that it has been ignored. Honorable members know that the position of parties has entirely changed. No one is more anxious than is the honorable member for Barrier to have an honest inquiry.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—There are only two parties on this question.

Mr. POYNTON.—Honorable members of the Opposition profess to be against any kind of Socialism, but when a socialistic proposal like a mail contract is brought forward, they call it State control. I have very great pleasure in supporting the motion, though I do not bind myself to vote for the proposed personnel of the Committee. I wish for an investigation into the arrangements for the carriage of our mails, because I think that it will show us how we may save, not the few paltry pounds that the inquiry will cost, but thousands of pounds, both in the present and in the future.

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra).—Before the honorable member for Barrier adopted the amendment of the Prime Minister, there was something to be said for his motion as a straight-out socialistic proposal by one whom we all know to be one of the strongest Socialists in the House, if not in Australia. But, in deference to the Prime Minister, who, with his colleagues, are the servile members of the socialistic party which controls from the corner benches the destinies of Australia, he has agreed to throw on one side his socialistic principles. I have heard no reason from him for the appointment of the proposed Select Committee, though I have listened very carefully to what he had to say.

Mr. THOMAS.—The honorable member for Parramatta said that the honorable member for Darling had given very good reasons.

Mr. FULLER.—I am speaking for myself, and I did not hear the honorable member give any solid reason for the appointment of the proposed Select Committee. The Committee, if appointed, is to inquire into the carriage of mails, passengers, and cargo between Australia and the United Kingdom. As has been suggested by the honorable member for North Sydney, we might fairly trust the Government to give us all the information available in regard to the carriage of mails. There is no possibility of a Committee obtaining information in regard to the question from any source which is not available to the Government. So far as passengers are concerned, they may very well be left to look after themselves. Those who travel on the mail boats between Australia and the old country are not the class of persons about whom honorable members like the socialistic member for Barrier concern themselves. What we are all concerned about, however, is the carriage of cargo. Seeing how much Australia is dependent upon her export trade, the carriage of cargo from Australia to England and other countries is a matter of very great concern to her producers. But I ask the honorable member for Barrier how the proposed Select Committee can obtain any information on this subject which could not be obtained from Sussex-street, Sydney, or from Flinders-street, Melbourne. Has he any idea as to the present rates of freight prevailing? I undertake to say that neither he nor six of the other proposed members of the committee, if they were questioned on the subject, would be able to inform the House what rates are paid now for the carriage of perishable produce from Australia to London. The only two members whom it is proposed to appoint to the committee who have any knowledge in connexion with the subject are the honorable members for Flinders and Macquarie. We can get from the Government all information about the carriage of mails, the passenger traffic does not concern us, and for an investigation into the carriage of cargo, the honorable member for Barrier should at least have procured the services of men who would properly represent the big producing interests of Australia. I object to the appointment of the Committee, because I think that the investigation proposed is not what is needed, and that the proposed personnel is unsuitable.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby).—I have wondered during the debate this afternoon whether the Opposition have held a caucus on this subject since it was last discussed, because the acting leader of the Opposition on that occasion pronounced his benediction upon the motion as amended by the Prime Minister.

Mr. WILKS.—He was very foolish, then.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I hope that the honorable member will not denounce his leader.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—This is quite an open question.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It ought to be an open question.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The proposed personnel of the Committee makes it, not an open, but a settled question.

Mr. KELLY.—Does the honorable member think that the Committee will be impartial?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not know what names have been proposed, though I understand that the original personnel has been altered.

Mr. KELLY.—Six of the names proposed are those of members sitting on the corner benches.

Mr. POYNTON.—That is not so.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—From many points of view, such an arrangement would be very sensible, though I do not advocate it in this case. Of course, we all wish to have an absolutely fair representation on the Committee, and at the instigation of the mover of the motion, I now move—

That the words "Mr. McWilliams," line 9, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "Mr. Henry Willis."

The proposal of the honorable member for Barrier, as amended by the Prime Minister, has the entire approval of the acting leader of the Opposition, and the suggested inquiry is one which, on the face of it, should be supported, because, if there is one thing about which the public and Parliament should have full and complete information, it is the conditions under which mails, passengers, and cargo, are conveyed from Australia to the old world. We must necessarily have such information before we can indorse any new contracts with steam-ship companies. We wish to know how the increasing requirements of Australia are being met, and whether there is any truth in the statement which is continually being made by newspaper writers and public men, that Australia is suffering loss by her White Ocean policy. We wish also to know what is the effect on the cost of the mail service of requiring compliance with certain provisions in regard to carriage of perishable produce. We desire to know whether the best machinery available is being used, and why the subsidy has been increased.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I submit that the honorable member may not discuss this question of mail subsidy.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Boothby is not discussing the merits or demerits of the contract for the conveyance of mails entered into by the Commonwealth with the Orient Steam Navigation Company; he is merely expressing his desire to know why the subsidy is being increased. He suggests that the reason could be ascertained by the inquiries of the proposed Committee, and he will be in order in following that line of argument. He may not, however, discuss the merits of the mail contract.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I have no desire to do that. It was by the investigation of a Royal Commission that the public of Australia were informed of the existence of secret rebates in connexion with the carriage of butter.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It was because the existence of secret rebates was known that the Butter Commission was appointed.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The facts may have been known to the honorable member, who is in the inner commercial ring, but they were not public property.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—They were published in the press.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The people at large were made aware of them by the inquiries of the Commission. In the same way, the Old-Age Pensions Commission has brought to light valuable facts which would probably not have been generally known but for its inquiry. For instance, I understand that in New South Wales one of the banks receives £10,000 per annum for performing work which is carried out in Victoria at a cost of £150. Further, it is stated that the cost of management of the old-age pensions scheme in New South Wales amounts to £20,000 per annum, as compared with £1,800 in Victoria.

Mr. JOHNSON.—What has that to do with the shipping business?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The question is whether it is desirable to conduct an inquiry into our shipping business.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The facts mentioned by the honorable member are given in Coghlan.

Mr. BATCHELOR. — Some honorable members are omniscient — the honorable member, for instance.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — I am acquainted with the contents of a book which is published throughout Australia.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Honorable members have not time to wade through the large number of publications which are distributed throughout Australia, and it is desirable that the salient facts in regard to matters of high public importance should be prominently brought before them by means of inquiry. At no time in our history have Commissions done more useful work than recently. Take, for instance, the Lands Commission in New South Wales; that has performed most valuable service. I want to know something more in regard to the carriage of our products from Australia to the Home markets, and the conditions of our mail contracts, and I am not prepared, in the light of the information at present available to us, to trust even the present Government to enter into arrangements with the mail companies.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That means that the honorable member is not prepared to trust his own party.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not think that any section of the House should trust the Government without the fullest information being furnished with regard to their proposals. This is a matter in which the producers of Australia are most vitally interested. I have been told by a member of a State Government—not a member of the Labour Party—that the practice has arisen of buying up cargo space in some of the ocean steamers, and retailing it to producers at higher rates; in fact, cornering cargo space. If the proposed Committee can show that it is possible to insert a clause in future contracts, which will overcome that difficulty, some good will have been accomplished.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — There is already a clause in existing contracts which is intended to obviate any possibility of undue monopoly of space.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The proposal for the appointment of the Committee appears to me to be such a reasonable one that I cannot understand the opposition to it, except, of course, such as may come from the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and the honorable member for North Sydney, who were members of the Government which entered into the contract with the Orient Company. Honorable members who oppose the proposal because its original objective was socialistic in character are taking up a most illogical position. The motion does not now bear a socialistic complexion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It does, so far as the names suggested are concerned.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I frankly confess that I do not know what "Socialism" means. I have given up all attempts to distinguish between what is socialistic and what is not. The word "socialistic" has become positively meaningless. It has been used to describe proposals of all kinds. I thoroughly agree with the motion, because I am sure that it is intended to secure an absolutely fair inquiry by an impartial tribunal.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—The honorable member for Boothby insinuated that I was opposed to this proposal because I happened to be a member of the late Ministry which completed the contract with the Orient Company. I can assure the honorable member that if a committee were proposed to inquire into the matter, I should not be found opposing it—in fact, I should urge no objection to an inquiry into any action of the late Government. This, however, is an entirely different question. The motion has changed its aspect since it was first introduced. In the first instance, the idea was not that which the honorable member for Boothby is supporting, but something entirely different. The proposal was—

That a Select Committee of both Houses of Parliament be appointed to make full inquiry as to the advisability of the Federal Government owning and controlling a fleet of steamers for the carriage of mails, passengers, and cargo between Australia and the United Kingdom.

Is there not a straight and clear intent in that motion? Is it not a question as to whether the Commonwealth, in addition to other experiments already made or proposed, should carry its many powers and influences, and its rights of ownership, beyond its own borders, over the seas of the world?

Mr. THOMAS.—That is the idea.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Honorable members must judge from their respective stand-points whether such an inquiry is necessary. Now an entirely new proposal is made. What I have mentioned is not now the professed intent.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But it is their intent still, all the same.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is not said to be the intent now, but there are two ways of arriving at the one end. There is nothing to prevent a committee appointed upon the amended terms proposed by the Prime Minister from recommending that a fleet of steamers shall be acquired and run by the Commonwealth.

Mr. THOMAS.—If there were, I would not sit on the Committee.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—There is the frank admission of the honorable member that he would not sit on the Committee unless it could make such a recommendation.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS. — The Committee could not make such a recommendation unless the evidence justified it.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But we know that some members of the Committee would enter upon the inquiry with preconceived ideas on the subject.

Mr. TUDOR.—That does not apply to the members of the Labour Party.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The members of the Labour Party come from various directions. They are supported by certain leagues.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—They are supported by the constituencies, and not by the leagues.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—They have to sign the pledge of certain associations, which have a distinct policy, and I wonder that honorable members should try to evade the issue. The policy of the associations to which I refer is State ownership of all the means of production, distribution, and exchange.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable member is quite wrong.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am not wrong. I do not know what the personal views of the honorable member may be, but that is the policy of the party. That was the policy adopted by the Inter-State conference of the Labour Party.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member is absolutely wrong.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. I must remind honorable members that interjections of such a character as will disturb the course of an honorable member's speech are absolutely disorderly. It seems impossible for the honorable member to make any progress on account of the repeated interjections to which he is being subjected. Honorable members will have an opportunity to address the House later on, and I would ask them for the present to be content to listen to the honorable member for North Sydney.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I recognise that it is desirable to maintain order, but I do not object to reasonable and proper interjections, which I am quite ready to answer. It astonishes me that the members of the Labour Party should claim that their party—I do not say every individual member of it—is not in favour of the ownership by the State of all the means of production, distribution, and exchange.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I say that the honorable member is making a deliberate misstatement.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. No honorable member must say that another honorable member is making a deliberate misstatement, and I must ask the honorable member to withdraw the remark.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I regret having to withdraw the remark, because the statement of the honorable member is absolutely incorrect, and he ought to know that it is incorrect.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I certainly do not. I know that the Labour Party, or a section of its members, are endeavouring to run away from it; but I say that they nailed that principle to the mast. I do know that, and the public of Australia know it.

Mr. CARPENTER. — The honorable member does not know it.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do know it, and the public of Australia know it. Some members of the Labour Party are endeavouring to pull down the flag which they nailed so dramatically to the mast. But they only attempt to pull it down in this House. Let them go to their Conferences, and state what they are stating here. What did the leader of that party say at the Labour Conference in New South Wales? Did he not state, not only that he was a Socialist, but that he did not know how any man could belong to the labour organizations unless he were a Socialist?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And he said that that must be a sine qua non.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — Did he not say that, in his opinion, the objective of the Labour Party was the full socialistic programme which has been defined by honorable members themselves?

Mr. McDONALD.—Hear, hear!

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member for Kennedy—whom I respect—does not deny it.

Mr. McDONALD.—Why should I?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But it is being denied by other honorable members, and I have been told that I am wilfully stating what is false.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is not true of South Australia.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—When I made that statement, I said that I did not speak of individual members of the party.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is not true of any member of the Labour Party in South Australia.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—In view of the statement of the leader of the Labour Party at the Conference to which I have referred, I claim that the socialistic programme is, generally speaking, the policy of that party. Yet I was told, when I made that declaration, that I was making a deliberate misstatement.

Mr. CARPENTER. — Only as regards the Conference.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I did not repeat my statement in regard to the Conference; but I was under the impression that that was the vote of the Conference.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable member said that it was.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But I did not repeat it. I said that the socialistic programme was the policy of the Labour Party generally, if it was not the policy of every member of it. At any rate, it is the policy announced by the leader of that Party in this House. The author of this motion has declared that he would not accept it in its amended form, unless he had an opportunity of carrying out what the resolution, in its original form, proposed. How can he achieve his object? Obviously through the personnel of the Committee. What is the proposed constitution of that body? Its constitution is such as to make the result of its inquiry practically a foregone conclusion. I agree with other honorable members who have stated that we are incurring a great deal too much expense in connexion with the appointment of Select Committees and Royal Commissions, and that, in many cases, these bodies are finding out—as was mentioned by the honorable member for Boothby—what was thoroughly well-known and what had been published to the world prior to their creation. The honorable member for Boothby alluded to the discovery by the Old Age Pensions Commission that the cost of the old-age pension system in New South Wales was enormously in excess of that of Victoria. That was well-known previously.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Not by this House.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I have heard the right honorable member for Balaclava allude to it. Further, it has been mentioned in the Parliament of New South Wales, and it will be found in the reports of the Statistician of that State. Yet the Commission apparently considers that it has made a discovery. I do not say that Select Committees which have been appointed have not accomplished useful work, but I do claim that if ever there was work for a Government to do it is that which is outlined in the motion under consideration—assuming, of course, that the proposal is legitimate. If, on the other hand, it is intended only as a means by which the purchase of a Commonwealth fleet of steamers may be recommended, that is an entirely different matter. The only opportunity that the House can have of ascertaining whether or not that is the object is by the constitution of the Committee.

Mr. THOMAS.—How many members does the honorable member think that the Opposition ought to have serving upon it?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not say how many should come from any particular side. As the question at issue seems to be one as between a State-owned fleet of steamers and a privately-owned fleet, there ought to be an equal number of honorable members upon the Committee holding diverse views.

Mr. THOMAS.—The Opposition can have four members upon it, and we will be content with five.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That would settle the matter.

Mr. THOMAS.—I do not mean five labour members.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If the opinions of the five members suggested are identical, why appoint a Committee? Why not send in the report? It has been represented that it would assist the Government materially if this Committee could make an inquiry and report. In that connexion, I say that its appointment would be likely to place the Government in a position similar to that which was occupied by the late Ministry. It would probably cause them to delay taking action for a renewal of the contract until they were very close to the period when the existing contract will expire. Under such circumstances, any Government must be, more or less, in the hands of the particular shipping line running the service, and it is highly desirable—I am sure the late Postmaster-General will agree with me—that efforts should be made to secure prices from tenderers at a far earlier date than was the case in connexion with the present contract. The Ministry ought to be settling about that work at once. They ought not to await the report of any Committee. If they do so they will again be placed in the unfortunate position of having to conclude a new contract with greater haste than should be necessary. That is not desirable. I am opposed to the appointment of the Committee, because I think that it will involve an unnecessary expense unless there is some charge attached to the motion. If a charge is attached to it, by all means let it be inquired into, but, if not, the appointment of the proposed body will constitute an unnecessary expense. It is not within the powers of a Committee to ascertain as effectively as a Government what can be done in the way of cheapening the mail subsidy. Such a body cannot open negotiations and ask prices from abroad. That must rest with the Government.

Mr. WILKS.—The Committee could not do so unless its members visited the United Kingdom.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Even if they visited the United Kingdom they would not have the powers of a Government to inquire from different firms the price at which they would accept the mail contract or to advertise for tenders or to bring firms into competition with one another. They have no such powers. How then could they handle the question better than could the Government? I believe that we should hold the Ministry responsible for entering into contracts for the conveyance of our mails. Let them use the powers which they have for that purpose—powers which are greater than those which any Select Committee can possess—and let them submit their proposals to the House. Of course, I recognise that that is not the object of the motion. The honorable member for Barrier has clearly stated that he desires to see a fleet of steamers owned and controlled by the Commonwealth, and that he hopes to secure his object by the appointment of this Committee. That is an honest declaration.

Mr. THOMAS.—If it were not for that, I should not persevere with the motion.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That being the object of the honorable member, I may say that I am absolutely opposed to a fleet of steamers being owned by the Commonwealth.

Mr. THOMAS.—Surely the honorable member is not so wedded to his ideas that he objects to an inquiry. I have already stated that the Opposition are at liberty to nominate four members of the Committee out of nine.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Let the honorable member propose that the Committee shall consist of ten members, and let us have five members from each side of the House upon it.

Mr. THOMAS.—If the honorable member will agree to the motion, the Opposition can nominate five members out of the ten.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I cannot say anything in regard to that proposal. I must leave it to the acting leader of the Opposition. If the Government had adopted the right attitude in connexion with this matter, they would have said that the inquiry was their business, that they could deal with it more effectively than could any Select Committee, and that they declined to be guided in their action by the opinions of a private member of this House.

Mr. CARPENTER (Fremantle).—I regret having come into conflict with the last speaker. I am not going to apologize to him, more than to say that I regret I should have repeated a misstatement in this House, seeing that upon the first occasion it was made I sought to assure him by interjection that he was mistaken.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Will the honorable member say when that occurred, so that I may refer to it in Hansard.

Mr. CARPENTER.—It occurred last week—I forget the exact occasion. However, I have no wish to waste time by referring to the matter at length. I do not think that the honorable member would wilfully mislead the House. I believe that he was sincerely mistaken, and that his mistake arose from not having acquainted himself with the facts. In order that there may be no further repetition of the misstatement, or of the ill-feeling which may be aroused by it, I wish to quote from the proceedings of the recent Inter-State Labour Conference, to which the honorable member referred. He stated that that Conference decided in favour of nationalizing all the means of production, distribution, and exchange.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Nobody said that.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable member quoted that as the decision of the recent Inter-State Labour Conference, representing the Federal labour movement in Australia. It was to that statement I objected. I can easily understand how the honorable member has fallen into error. There was before that Conference a proposal from Queensland to make that the objective of the party. The exact wording of that proposal was as follows:—

The securing of the full results of their industry to the wealth producers by the collective ownership of the means of production, distribution, and exchange to be attained through the extension of the industrial and economic functions of the State and local governing bodies.

That proposal was defeated by a large majority.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Will the honorable member not admit that the amendment which was proposed was stated to mean the same thing?

Mr. CARPENTER.—I intend to quote the amendment, which was adopted by a large majority.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It was stated that the amendment meant the same thing as the motion.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Is this question before the House?

Mr. CARPENTER.—I think it is. I am going to quote the amendment that was agreed to, so that the honorable member for North Sydney may know what the Conference actually adopted. Having done that, I shall pass on to another phase of the question. The objective decided upon at the Conference was as follows:—

(a) The cultivation of an Australian sentiment, based upon the maintenance of racial purity, and the development in Australia of an enlightened and self-reliant community.

(b) The securing of the full results of their industry to all producers by the collective ownership of monopolies—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And the honorable member now declares that all production is a monopoly.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I have not said anything so foolish, and I do not think that the honorable member would make such a declaration.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—One of the honorable member's colleagues said, the other day, that all production was a monopoly.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The words I have quoted are vastly different from those which the honorable member for North Sydney put before the House.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — It was said that the amendment—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! An incidental reference to the fact that this proposal is, or is not, in accordance with a certain resolution is perfectly in order, but a detailed discussion of the proceedings of a certain Conference—which, so far as I know, had nothing whatever to do with the question of the mail contracts—is not. I have allowed the honorable member for Fremantle considerable latitude on account of the statements made by the Opposition; but ask him now to refrain from dealing further with the resolutions of the Conference.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I should have refrained some time ago from dealing further with this phase of the question, but for the interjections of the Opposition. I had already expressed my intention to pass on to other considerations when I had quoted, for the benefit of the honorable member for North Sydney, the wording of the objective adopted by the Labour Conference.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I thought the honorable member had read it. If he has not concluded the quotation, he may do so.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Paragraph b of the objective continues—and the extension of the industrial and economic functions of the State and municipality.

I hope that, after this explanation, the honorable member for North Sydney will not be guilty of repeating the statement made by him on two occasions in the House, that a certain motion was passed by the Labour Conference, when, as a matter of fact, it was rejected by a very large majority. I was somewhat surprised at the objection raised a few minutes ago by the honorable and learned member for Illawarra with reference to this motion. He said, rightly enough, that the question of the carriage of cargo between Australia and Great Britain might, and possibly would be, of greater importance to the people of Australia than would that of the carriage of mails and passengers. Although I am not going to lose sight of the importance of the question in so far as it relates to the carrying of mails or passengers, I wish to emphasize the necessity for some such inquiry as suggested, in the interests, not only of our producers, but of all others concerned with the carriage of cargo between Australia and Great Britain. The honorable and learned member for Illawarra has stated that it would be impossible for a Select Committee to obtain information as to the terms and conditions upon which oversea cargo is carried. If that be so—if it be difficult to ascertain from the ship-owners, the brokers, or the merchants of Australia what these terms and conditions are—that fact in itself should make us the more determined to have an investigation.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The honorable and learned member for Illawarra said that the Select Committee as proposed to be constituted could not obtain the information.

Mr. CARPENTER.—That is so, and I repeat that if the statement be correct it ought to make us the more determined to appoint a Select Committee to secure the information. I am aware that there is a lack of knowledge on the part of the general public as to the manner in which shipping companies conduct their business. We have all sorts of rumours as to rings and combines, but the shipping companies as a rule make such a close secret of the facts relating to their business that the people really do not know how they are being treated with regard to the carriage of goods to and from Australia. I wish to quote from a report recently presented to the Governor of Western Australia by a Royal Commission on Ocean Freights, which was appointed by the Government of that State.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Can we not take the evidence of that Commission, instead of having a repetition of their inquiry?

Mr. CARPENTER.—What this Commission has done for Western Australia should be done by us for the whole Commonwealth. It is remarkable that the Commission mentioned as one of the possible solutions of existing evils the ownership and control of a line of steamers by the Government of the Commonwealth. The situation has become so bad in Western Australia that traders in that State appear to be almost at their wits' ends to know what to do in order to secure the carriage of their freights at a reasonable rate. Among the recommendations made by the Commission was the following:—

Whilst your Commissioners would welcome the establishment of an Australian Mercantile Fleet under Commonwealth control for the transport of mails and cargo between Australia and the United Kingdom, capable of being commissioned in time of war, we believe this ideal is not within measurable distance at present.

If that Commission, after taking evidence bearing on the shipping trade of only one State, was convinced that the owning and control of a fleet of mercantile steamers by the Commonwealth would prove a solution of the existing difficulty, surely, out of respect to that Commission and to the people whom it represented, we have a right to ask that an investigation shall be made on behalf of the Commonwealth. If time permitted I could quote instances of oppression on the part of shipping combines—or the shipping ring, as it is called—that would open the eyes of honorable members. I shall not say that that which applies to Western Australia applies to the whole of the Commonwealth, but it cannot be gainsaid that the shipping trade between Australia and Great Britain is in the hands of a ring or combine of shipping brokers—not of ship-owners—who absolutely fix rates at their own sweet will.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That is known.

Mr. CARPENTER.—One result of that system is that a cargo can be brought from America via Liverpool to Australia below the freight charged on a cargo direct from England to Australia.

Mr. KELLY.—There is no need for the appointment of a Select Committee to ascertain that fact.

Mr. CARPENTER. — The proposed Select Committee should do for the whole of Australia what this Commission did for Western Australia.

Mr. SKENE.—Does the honorable member mean to say that, after transhipment at Liverpool, a cargo from America to Australia costs less than does a cargo from England to Australia direct?

Mr. CARPENTER.—I repeat that freights for the carriage of cargo from America and Germany to Australia are much lower than are those for the carriage of cargo from England to Australia, and that in consequence of this our trade with Great Britain is suffering. The people of America can send their goods from New York to Liverpool, and thence to Australia, at a lower rate than that at which goods can be sent directly from England to Australia.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — That is not quite correct.

Mr. CARPENTER.—In view of these facts, it is time that an inquiry was made in the interests not only of the producers, but of the consumers of Australia. I need not remind honorable members that business men—merchants and shopkeepers who have to pay these additional freights—pass on the increased charges to the consumer; they actually make a profit on the higher freight they pay. The consumer, therefore, is doubly hit every time he makes a purchase. When the Commonwealth took over the Postal Department, we discovered somewhat to the surprise of many people, that we had been paying a very large annual subsidy to the mail steamers for the carriage, not only of postal matter, but of produce. There was considerable friction when the Government attempted to differentiate between a contract for the conveyance of mails and one which also included provision for large cold storage space on board the mail steamers. I am not going to say that, in any contract we may make, we should not pay due regard to the necessity of securing cool storage on mail steamers, and every possible facility for the carriage of our produce to England; but I do say that, as a Commonwealth Parliament, we have no right, under the guise of entering into a mail contract, to pay a large sum for something which is really no part of such a contract. Let us, if honorable members please, make an agreement with the shipping companies that the mail steamers shall be provided with cool chambers, but let us also know what is the exact cost of carrying our mail matter to and from England.

Mr. KELLY.—I rise to a point of order. The honorable member has again referred to the oversea mail contract which is to be dealt with at a later stage, and two honorable members have already been ruled out of order for doing so.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am not aware that I have ruled any honorable member out of order for anything he has said. When honorable members have proposed to discuss the merits or demerits of the Orient Company's contract, I have indicated that they would not be in order in doing so; but so long as they simply point out the various phases of the contract with regard to which, in their opinion, it is desirable to have the further information to be obtained by the proposed Select Committee, they will not transgress the Standing Orders.

Mr. CARPENTER. — I have not referred to the existing contract, and do not intend to do so; but I hope to convince honorable members that, in entering into any future contract, we should know specifically what is paid for the carriage of our mails, and what is the additional cost which the requirement as to cool storage for the carriage of our produce involves.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The time allotted for the discussion of orders of the day of general business has expired. Is it the honorable member's desire to continue his remarks at a later date?

Mr. CARPENTER.—It is, sir.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is it the pleasure of the House that the honorable member have leave to continue his remarks at a later date?

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.
Leave granted; debate adjourned.

COMMONWEALTH TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I move—

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable—

1. That Commonwealth Treasury notes should be issued, on the lines of the Treasury notes issued by the State of Queensland.
2. That a reserve fund should be established for payment of the notes on demand; provision for similar payment being now in force in the Queensland Treasury.

3. That instead of such issue being put into circulation as in Queensland by being lent to financial institutions at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum, the proposed notes shall be issued on a population basis to the several State Treasurers, and each Treasurer shall credit the amount received as on account of the properties transferred to the Commonwealth.

4. That 4 per cent. of the issue shall be withdrawn from circulation each year and cancelled, and that a sufficient sum each year shall be granted for the purpose of such cancellation.

I have been following this question ever since Queensland issued Treasury notes in 1893, and, in bringing forward my proposal, I am fully aware of the difficulties of the subject and its importance to the Commonwealth. The scheme has naturally been talked about. It has been discussed as if my object were merely to provide funds for the taking over of the transferred properties, and thereby the liquidating of the debts of the States; but that is incidental only. The scheme aims, in the first place, at establishing a Commonwealth issue of paper money. Mr. Coghlan, at page 813 of the latest edition of his Australian statistics, speaking of the Australian note circulation, says that if the notes were guaranteed by the Commonwealth, and made a legal tender, their probable issue might be set down as £6,750,000, the present note circulation of the Commonwealth being only £3,800,000. The conference of bankers held in Sydney in 1895 made a proposal of a similar nature. If the Commonwealth chooses, it can set going £3,000,000 more of currency, which will be as good as gold. My proposal was shaped in the form in which I now submit it, after I had read the proposal of the Treasurer, made at the Hobart Conference, and referred to in the Budget debate last session. He is reported, at page 6145 of Vol. XXII. of Hansard, to have then said—

We ought never to forget that the Commonwealth and the States are composed of the same people, and that, therefore, if we have to pay any State a sum of money for buildings, not only has that State to contribute towards the payment for its own buildings, but that also it has to pay per capita for buildings taken over in every other State. I cannot look upon it as a sound business transaction, that we should borrow a large sum of money in order to pay for the buildings transferred from the States to the Commonwealth, in order to distribute that money amongst the States, thus placing upon them the obligation to pay interest, and to repay the capital borrowed within a certain time. It would mean that we should be adding largely to the public debt of the Commonwealth, and doing no good to the States, either individually or collectively.

Then, at page 6146, he is reported to have said—

The conclusion at which I arrived was that, instead of borrowing immense sums of money, the same result would be obtained by debiting and crediting the amounts to be paid and the amounts to be received by each State.

As a result of debiting and crediting, £904,967 is due to Queensland, South Australia, and Western Australia from New South Wales, Victoria, and Tasmania. The Hobart scheme proposes to pay this money to the three States named, and to raise it from the other three States by annual payments of £40,722, extending over a period of forty-three years.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was not adopted at Hobart.

Mr. CULPIN.—That is the proposal printed in the report of the Hobart Conference.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was the proposal I put forward at the Melbourne Conference.

Mr. CULPIN.—I accept the right honorable gentleman's correction. I think that the proposal was first put forward by him. That proposal, however, makes no provision for the paying off of bond-holders. My proposal, on the other hand, is this: That the three debtor States shall pay to the three creditor States, £36,290 annually for a period of twenty-five years. It will therefore be seen that I would make the payments smaller, and the period shorter. Under this arrangement, Queensland will get £321,278; South Australia, £358,721; and Western Australia, £224,948, and the money, if used as I propose that it shall be used, will wipe out more than £1,000,000 of the indebtedness of those States. This, in brief, is my scheme. I suggest the issue of Treasury notes to a value of, say, £500,000, followed in three or more months by a second similar issue, and then by two other issues, until £2,000,000 of paper currency have been issued. These notes are to be handed on a population basis to the Treasurers of the several States, and credited to the Commonwealth as being paid on account of the transferred properties, which are estimated to have a total value of £9,000,000.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Would the notes be legal tender?

Mr. CULPIN.—Certainly. The States would use the notes at the earliest possible date, and, with the gold which they would thus have in hand—because the notes would take its place—they are to buy in the cheapest market some of their stock for cancellation. Three per cent. stock is to be bought on the London market, according to the Times, at £87, and £2,000,000 would purchase about £2,300,000 worth of such stock, on which the interest would amount to £69,000 annually.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Will the notes be convertible into gold on demand?

Mr. CULPIN.—My motion sets forth that the note shall be payable on demand, and shall be legal tender. Thus £69,000 will be at once saved to the States. The cancellation of notes will go on for twenty-five years, by which time they will all have disappeared, and new issues to buy further bonds, or for the carrying out of public works, will be made. Now for the balances to be paid by the three debtor to the three creditor States. There can be issued to the three creditor States, in a suitable number of issues, notes which the three debtor States will redeem—New South Wales to the extent of £10,947 per annum; Victoria to the extent of £20,906 per annum; and Tasmania to the extent of £4,345 per annum. This in twenty-five years will cancel the indebtedness of £904,967, and Queensland will have received £321,378; South Australia, £358,721; and Western Australia, £224,948; while the gold which the notes will enable them to use will allow them to buy back £1,042,500 worth of debentures, and the interest saved on the transaction will be £31,275. The amount of debentures redeemed by these notes, and neither converted nor re-issued, will be £3,333,333, with a saving of £100,000 in interest, while the note circulation will amount to only £2,904,967. Thus the States which have paid more than their due share into the Federal partnership will be quite fairly, but only fairly, treated. Treasury notes in Queensland cost on the average £2,000 per annum for expenses of issue and management; but the Commonwealth, after the first year or two, could issue the notes which I propose shall be issued, for an expenditure of £5,000. When the States buy back their bonds and debentures, they will effect not only a saving in interest, but a saving in the expense of management now paid to the Bank of England, or some other financial institution. To show the need for something of this kind being done, I wish to quote from the speech delivered by the right honorable member for Balaclava, on 10th June, 1902, when introducing his Loan Bill. He is reported, at page 13431, of Vol. X. of Hansard, to have said—

When certain Departments were transferred, works were being proceeded with in most of the States, and were being paid for out of loan funds. . . . In the meantime, I am financing any very urgent works out of the Treasurer's advance vote.

Further on, he says—at page 13433—

This expenditure is to be charged against all the States on a population basis, and therefore we could not allow the works to remain in abeyance in the poorer States while proceeding with those required in the States which are in a better position

While on page 13434, he is reported to have said—

If we adopt the practice which has been suggested of providing these large sums from revenue, I am perfectly certain that we shall leave the States in a difficult position. . . . In view of their present condition, it would be exceedingly unwise for us to take any such step.

These statements did not induce this House to pass the Loan Bill; but if they were justifiable then, they are justifiable now, for nothing has been done to remedy the sad position of affairs which he pictured. All the States, except perhaps Western Australia, have paid in interest more than the sum total of their borrowings, and yet they all owe, and are likely to continue to owe, the full amount borrowed. I come now to the bedrock of my motion—the Commonwealth Treasury note issue. In dealing with this subject, I shall not quote academic authorities for or against what I advocate. I shall rely upon accomplished facts, and the attempts to float loans which have failed, to show that there is good reason for my proposal. To put before the House the main facts on which I rely, I must go back to the financial crash of 1893. The financial institutions of Australia, with three notable exceptions—the Bank of New South Wales, the Bank of Australasia, and the Union Bank—were then largely assisted by the Governments of the day in rallying from that disaster. I shall not burden the House with an account of what was done in that direction in the five southern States, but shall refer only to the case of Queensland, where prompt and effective measures were adopted for relieving immediate difficulties. The steps taken were remarkable and bold, but not original. The Government of Queensland, by their Treasury notes scheme, have demonstrated to Australia that it is perfectly right and proper for the State to issue a paper currency. The Administration of the day were anxious to avert the threatened collapse and restore public confidence. It was decided that public faith in paper money must be restored, and therefore the Government commenced their task by taking the issue of paper money into their own hands. It had been proved that such a public convenience as paper money ought not to be dependent upon the temporary financial condition of eight or ten banks, and the Government doubtless realized that, inasmuch as the Bank of England issued all the bank notes required in England, the State Treasury might appropriately fill the gap in Queensland. Arrangements were made for a Government note issue. The bank note duty of 4 per cent. was abolished, and a prohibitive duty of 10 per cent. was imposed on all banks wishing to continue their own note issues. Three Bills were promptly introduced by the Government, and became law, viz., the Treasury Notes Advance Act, the Treasury Notes Act, and the Treasury Bills Act. Under the first measure, any bank which had stopped payment, or its manager or liquidator, could apply for an advance of Treasury notes to redeem from public circulation its own discredited notes, provision being made for ultimate repayment to the Queensland Treasurer. The Treasury Notes Act provided that the Treasurer should hold gold to the amount of one-fourth of the value of any notes issued, and should also issue Treasury Bills signed and ready for sale. The Bills were to be vested in trustees until required. Section 3 of the Treasury Notes Act reads as follows:—

All such Treasury notes made, issued, and circulated in pursuance of this Act shall be issued from and bear date at the Colonial Treasury of Queensland, and shall be payable in specie on demand at the Colonial Treasury.

Treasury notes made, issued, or re-issued under the authority of this Act shall be everywhere in Queensland good legal tender of money, by all persons other than the Colonial Treasurer, at the Colonial Treasury, to the amount therein expressed to be payable.

Section 4 provides—

The Governor in Council may, from time to time, apply any sum or sums of money to arise from any such Treasury notes to any service authorized to be defrayed out of the Consolidated Revenue of the Colony, or out of loans authorized by Parliament.

The Act also provided for departmental regulations being formulated whereby notes would be handed out to the banks requiring them, which had to deposit with the Treasurer gold representing one-third of the value of the notes issued, and to pay 2 per cent. interest on the remaining two-thirds of the value. The Treasury Bills Act authorized the issue of Treasury bills, to be vested in trustees, for the same amount as the proposed issue of notes. These bills have never been required, are still intact, and can be utilized to raise money if required. At the end of the first year's work the Auditor-General, in his report on the Treasury notes, said that £240,000 of the reserved gold could be placed out at interest. This advice was unheeded by the Queensland Government. The next year the Auditor-General reported that £250,000 of gold was unnecessarily idle. He also said that he realized that the Act was not intended to produce revenue. The Queensland Act was such a success that the money rolled in all the time, and the first impulse of the Queensland Government was to lend the surplus money to the banks. The accumulation of this gold had been brought about without expenditure on the part of the Government, excepting only the cost of the notes and office expenses, amounting to about £2,000 per annum. The unused notes of the banks were bought by the Government and faced with the Treasurer's promise to pay, and for several months Queenslanders endured that makeshift. I propose to quote some particulars from the report of the Auditor-General of 1903 as to the revenue produced by the Treasury note system. The interest on Treasury notes, amounting to £388,833, lent to the banks at 2 per cent., yielded £7,776 13s.; the interest on Treasury notes gold, amounting to £50,000, lent to the Royal Bank at 3 per cent., yielded £1,500; the interest on Treasury notes gold, amounting to £100,000, lent to the Bank of New South Wales for six months at 2½ per cent., yielded £1,250; the interest on Treasury notes gold, amounting to £75,000, lent to the Bank of New South Wales for another six months at 2½ per cent., produced £937 10s.; and interest on Government debentures, amounting to £300,400, at 3½ per cent., yielded

Mr. Culpin.

£10,514; the total being £21,978 3s. 4d. In addition to these sums, there was £40,000 at current account, which produced no interest, and the reserve money, amounting to £336,208. The next year an addition was made to the Government debentures bought with Treasury notes, and the amount increased to £386,522. With the exception of the £388,833 of notes lent to banks at 2 per cent. interest, there has been sufficient money held to pay off every note with gold. The Government have very properly invested some of their surplus cash, and £40,000 has been generously placed on current account without interest. Coghlan says that in 1893 the average bank note circulation in Australia was £3,912,062, the Queensland share of this amount being £458,236. At present the note circulation of Australia amounts to £3,844,866, of which Queensland is credited with £620,000. It would appear from this that Treasury notes are more acceptable to Queenslanders than are bank notes to the people of the other States. The bank note duty realizes in Victoria £18,434, in New South Wales £28,743, in South Australia £8,055, in Western Australia £7,852, and in Tasmania £3,262, the total for the five States being £66,346. The revenue derived by Queensland from the Treasury note issue is equal to one-third of the total amount realized by the bank note tax in the other States, whereas the population of Queensland amounts to only one-eighth of that of the Commonwealth. I should like to say a few words with regard to the different note systems. The Bank of England practically has a monopoly of the note issue of Great Britain, and all the joint stock banks must go to that institution for their paper currency. This phase of the question is overlooked by bank advocates, who wish to retain paper money as a bank privilege. The Queensland Government have adopted the position of the Bank of England as an issuer of notes. In the United States the practice adopted is the reverse of that followed in England. In the United States a bank which deposits Government bonds can issue notes of an equal value. This is a case to which the oft-quoted text may be applied—

For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath.

The banks in the United States having interest-bearing bonds are privileged to issue notes, but the borrower who has not the wherewithal to carry on is often stripped and turned out a beggar. It will be necessary to explain a simple phrase used by bankers, and applied to a great instrument of profit making. I refer to "till money." This does not refer to money in the till, but to that great power which banks of issue exercise to create money on paper, namely, credit, when they can use it to advantage. The United States banks and the English joint stock banks have to pay for their "till money." The Bankers' Conference held in Sydney in 1895, at which the bankers of Victoria and New South Wales were represented, proposed to amend the Australian note issue, to obtain Government indorsement for their notes, and to pay the Government a better price for the privilege. They asked that £2,250,000 worth of notes should be ranked as notes for circulation, and a further £2,250,000 worth should be given to the banks to hold as "till money." This would have given the banks notes to the value of £4,500,000. So that the bankers themselves practically admit that we want more note issue. Every bank in England, except a remnant of privileged note issuers, wanting any form of till money can only get it by paying for it at Threadneedle-street. Morton Breckenridge, the champion of the Canadian banks, says in Volume X. of the publications of the American Economic Association, page 402—

How great is the saving of interest on the hard cash which, without the ability to use unissued notes, the banks would be obliged to hold as till money, is not particularly difficult to calculate.

On the following page he says—

If the banks were deprived of this advantage, it is safe to say that they would be obliged to withdraw some $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 now employed in the trade and industry of Canada.

I quote these passages to show what till money means. Now, for the other side of the shield. When Treasury notes were first issued in Queensland, the three strong banks I have named, hoped, by refusing to touch State notes, that they would cause the scheme to fail. In doing so they deliberately deprived themselves of till money, or its substitute, Treasury notes, at 2 per cent., instead of their own bank notes at 4 per cent., and till money gratis. There is no till money in Queensland, but the bank-note rate was 4 per cent., and the banks were allowed to use an equal number of notes as till money upon which they paid no duty. Now, in Queensland, every note has to be accounted for, either in gold, or by paying 2 per cent. interest upon it. I take it that that rate of interest, which is an extremely low one, is equivalent to giving the banks till money. These banks imported gold, and for twelve years they have not taken any State notes at 2 per cent.

Mr. BAMFORD.—What are the names of those three banks?

Mr. CULPIN.—I refer to the Bank of New South Wales, the Bank of Australasia, and the Union Bank. A champion of these banks, writing to the Brisbane Courier in April, 1903, complained that for every Treasury note they used, £2 in gold had to be paid. That seems to be a very curious statement, but from their point of view it is actually correct. They had been using a promise to pay £1 on demand, so long that to do so they considered was their privileged right, and when they redeemed their promise by paying £1, and then paid £1 for a Treasury note, their innocent champion said that they were paying £2 for a Treasury £1 note. The Canadian system was referred to by our first Treasurer, the right honorable member for Balaclava, in introducing the Loan Bill, and last session my leader intimated that he favoured proposals in that direction. "Confiscation" was the epithet applied to his proposal. Morton Breckenridge speaks of the Canadian Dominion notes held by banks as the 40 per cent. reserve in the following terms:—

The Government have forced from the banks a permanent loan without interest of from $10,000,000 to $14,000,000.

Again, he says—

The justice of a forced loan for 16 per cent. to 22 per cent. of the entire banking capital of the Dominion need not be examined.

It is evident that the banks' champion in Canada is at one with some honorable members opposite upon that question. The Dominion notes are backed by 15 per cent. of gold, and 10 per cent. of Dominion debentures guaranteed by the British Government. These notes throughout Canada are treated as the equivalent of gold just as Bank of England notes are in England. Morton Breckenridge gives equal value to them in the following passage which will be found upon page 430 of Vol. X of a publication by the American Economic Association—

For the four and a half years preceding 1st July, 1894, the amount of specie and Dominion notes held by all the Chartered banks at the end of each calendar month has averaged 9'11 per cent. of their total liabilities on corresponding days. The lowest percentage shown by the Bank statement was 8; the highest 10'08 per cent.

This, it will be observed, is quite as high as the proportion of money kept on hand by the English Joint Stock Banks, although for most of them, gold, and its practical equivalent, Bank of England notes, are the only till money, and form part of their business machinery.

I should like honorable members to notice that gold and Bank of England notes, as well as specie and Dominion notes, are phrased together as of equal value. Again, banking return forms give one entry for specie and Dominion notes, and one sum only is quoted embracing both denominations. There is no tax on the note issue in Canada. A bank holding £40 of Dominion notes can issue £100 of its own notes. Honorable members opposite call that "confiscation." What I wish to see is the whole of the £100 issued by the Commonwealth. The amount of gold held in Queensland shows that a one-fourth gold reserve is unnecessarily high. I would allow the reserve to be one-fifth, which is 33'3 per cent. higher than the reserve gold held for Dominion notes by the Canadian Government. I may add that in Canada there is what is called a bank redemption guarantee fund of 2½ per cent. for two years, making 5 per cent. upon the amount of bank notes issued. Yet the Maritime Bank failed in 1887, and its dollar notes sold for 40 cents. This is not likely to occur to Dominion notes, Queensland notes, or to our notes when we get them. If the privilege of using our own notes is attached to the scheme, so that our Treasurer can pay them away, we can arrange a reserve without difficulty. We handle £11,000,000 each year, and 1 per cent. of that amount, replaced by a portion of our note issue, will give us our reserve. Morton Breckenridge's statement in reference to banks applies to us. He says—

The only way for a bank to get its notes in circulation is to pay them over its counter in the ordinary course of business.

The Panama Canal trouble, which was referred to last week in the Sydney Morning Herald, is analogous to the position which we have here. The railway combine, realizing that the canal imperils their supremacy, by buying over the engineers, and slandering the canal, are doing their best to block its success. We have to recollect also that all practical men in finance are trained, employed, or interested in financial institutions, and we must expect difficulty in getting our side advocated by other than laymen like myself. Bank notes are used by bankers in the place of specie money, at the risk of the people, for the bankers' benefit. If paper money is used by the people's Government, the risk borne carries a corresponding advantage. The Government reap the profit on behalf of the people. That the Commonwealth wants money is shown by the attempts which have been made to get a loan sanctioned. I have shown that, according to Coghlan, over £3,000,000 more of note issue can be used if an absolutely reliable security is offered. Further, I have pointed out that in Queensland, where good, indefeasible paper alone is used, the profit therefrom to the Government—the profit from that one-eighth of Australia—is one-third as much as the other seven-eighths get from their paper money. The redemption of notes is a necessary feature of my scheme. A promise to pay is all the better if after one, ten, or fifteen, or twenty years the amount involved must be paid.

Mr. MAUGER.—What is the advantage of that?

Mr. CULPIN.—The honorable member was not present during the delivery of the first portion of my address, otherwise he would realize what a saving in interest would be effected by the adoption of my scheme. When we borrow we neglect to pay back our loans, but we must pay our interest, and this periodic cancellation is only equivalent in burden to that which we now pay in interest alone, although every penny we spent in that way would be a net reduction of our debt. The low price which our stock realizes in London would be a cause for rejoicing—not for weeping. Our transactions in stock for the future must be in buying—not in selling. I cannot conclude my remarks without quoting the words used by Mr. Justice O'Connor in introducing the Loan Bill in the Senate. They will be found recorded in Hansard, page 2691. of the first session of the Commonwealth Parliament. They read as follows:—

The best security we can possibly have is the security of the Government.

I know that when he made that statement he was, as we used to say in the old country, "putting the best side to London." But this House, I trust, will endorse what he said by insisting that for an issue of paper currency the best security we can have is the guarantee of an industrious and prosperous people, as represented by their chosen Government.

Debate (on motion by Sir JOHN FORREST), adjourned.

EXPORT OF AUSTRALIAN HARVESTERS.

Mr. ROBINSON (Wannon).—I move—

That a return be laid on the table of the House showing the number of harvesters of Australian manufacture exported from Australia from 1st January, 1901, to this date; such return to specify the destination of such exports.

The return, if granted, will be of some statistical value, not only to honorable members, but the public generally.

Mr. FRAZER.—What about the number of harvesters imported into Australia?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am informed that an honorable member moved some time ago for a return showing the number of harvesters imported into the Commonwealth, so that all that I now wish to learn is how many harvesters, manufactured in Australia, are being exported. If the motion is not to be opposed, it is unnecessary for me to speak at any length.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—As far as possible, we shall furnish the return for which the honorable and learned member moves.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That is all I desire.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I think it is highly desirable that this return should be furnished. At the present time, there is a proposal before the Parliament to expend a sum of £4,000 to encourage the manufacture of reapers and binders in Australia.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That question is not now before the House.

Mr. CONROY.—I think I am entitled to show that if this return be furnished, it may prove that the industry is well established, and that it is unnecessary to amend the Tariff in a way that has been suggested.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have no option but to rule that a debate which anticipates the decision of another matter on the business-paper is out of order. If the honorable and learned member can make a speech on this question which will not anticipate a later debate, he will be perfectly in order.

Mr. CONROY.—In view of the discussion that lately took place in this House as to the value of harvesters generally, and the action of the Minister of Trade and Customs in increasing the duty on imported machines, it is highly desirable that we should know how many of these machines are actually being made in Australia and exported.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—And why we should not send out more?

Mr. CONROY.—I have no objection to these exports being increased. If the industry can stand on its own basis, it is deserving of our praise, but I should not ask the people to contribute to it any more than I should expect the people of Australia to contribute to any industry in which I was engaged. I should like to know how many men are employed in manufacturing these machines, and of the conditions generally under which the industry is being carried on.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Tariff Commission will report on that phase of the question.

Mr. CONROY.—In view of certain evidence given before the Tariff Commission by a gentleman whose name has been mentioned in the House, I am afraid that such information will not be forthcoming. The witness in question made a statement that, in the Argentine Republic, harvesters were indented at £60.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I regret to have to again interrupt the honorable and learned member, but I must remind him that the question is simply whether or not a certain return shall be laid on the table of the House, and that that question alone can be discussed.

Mr. CONROY.—Am I not at liberty to give reasons for asking for such a return?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable and learned member is perfectly entitled to say why a return should or should not be produced; but he is not at liberty to discuss certain evidence which he asserts has been given before the Tariff Commission. That is a matter entirely foreign to the production of this return.

Mr. CONROY.—Do you rule, Mr. Speaker, that no evidence that may be brought forward in regard to harvesters can now be discussed?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not rule anything of the kind. I have ruled that the honorable and learned member may discuss any matter showing the desirableness or otherwise of this return being produced; but if he proceeds to discuss any subject other than one relating to the production of the return, he will be out of order.

Mr. CONROY.—My desire is that the return shall be laid on the table of the House, in order to contradict certain evidence that has been taken before another tribunal. Evidence was submitted to the Tariff Commission to the effect that harvesters were indented in the Argentine at a given price, and the return will show whether that statement was true or not.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It seems to me that there is nothing whatever in the motion as to the price of harvesters, and nothing in it to show that the return, if produced, would indicate whether the price mentioned by the honorable and learned member was correct or incorrect.

Mr. CONROY.—To put myself in order, I move—

That the following words be added—"the price of the harvesters, the places to which they were exported, and the firms by whom they were exported."

This amendment will give us an opportunity to discuss the general question. From a report lately presented to the House it would appear that one of the manufacturers of these machines made an untrue statement when before the Tariff Commission. While it was one of those statements to which the people have probably become accustomed, the fact remains that the Minister of Trade and Customs considered it of such importance that he acted upon it. The Minister took action on the oath of this man that he had positive evidence that £60 was charged for these harvesters in the Argentine, and representations were made to the British Consul there, with the result that it was found that they were entered at £41 each. The Tariff Commission was therefore deliberately misled by the person who gave that evidence. This gentleman has been moving in other directions, and it is highly desirable that steps should be taken to frustrate his efforts. Do the Government offer any opposition to the motion?

Mr. DEAKIN.—We are prepared to accept the terms of the motion, as submitted by the honorable and learned member for Wannon, and quite apart from the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Werriwa.

Mr. CONROY.—If that be so, I shall not press my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Mr. MAUGER) proposed—

That the following words be added—"also the number of harvesters imported into the Commonwealth from 1st January, 1901, to this date."

Mr. HUTCHISON (Hindmarsh).—The honorable and learned member for Werriwa stated that the object of his amendment was to show that we are exporting harvesters from the Commonwealth, and I am glad, therefore, that the honorable member for Melbourne Ports has moved this amendment. Had he not done so, I should have moved an amendment to the same effect. The fact that harvesters are being made here shows that there is no necessity for their importation, and that there is room for a great expansion of the local industry, which, I hope, we shall see in the near future.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I am glad that the return has been asked for. If the local makers of harvesters can send their machines abroad to compete with the manufactures of foreign makers, they can surely compete with those manufactures in Australia, where the foreign makers are at a disadvantage. They must, therefore, be getting a monopoly through the action of the Minister of Trade and Customs. The honorable member for Hindmarsh evidently believes in monopolies, because he would prevent the importation of harvesters into this market.

Mr. MAUGER.—Is it not better to have a monopoly here than in America?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not wish monopolies to be created either here or in America. Mr. McKay has made from £20,000 to £30,000 during the last year.

Mr. MAUGER.—Rubbish.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Will he show his books to prove or disprove my statement?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I fail to see in the statement any connexion with the motion.

Mr. BROWN.—Is the motion in order? If I remember rightly, a similar motion was carried last session, to which I added an amendment, asking for information with respect to the importation and exportation of machinery. That return has not yet been complied with.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not know if the motion to which the honorable member refers is identical with that now under discussion, but, if it were, that fact would not make this motion out of order.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—Do the Government accept the motion?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have no objection to it.

Mr. CROUCH.—The publication of the information asked for will do a lot of harm to a certain firm which is aimed at. Have they consented to it?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am not aware.

Mr. ROBINSON.—It is a contemptible and dirty insinuation to say that any firm is aimed at.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable and learned member must withdraw that remark.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I withdraw it; but the honorable and learned member for Corio makes a most unwarranted statement in saying that the motion is aimed at a certain firm. There is no basis of fact for such a statement, and he should be ashamed to have made it.

Mr. CROUCH. — The honorable and learned member is aggravating his offence.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable and learned member for Corio objects to that remark, the honorable and learned member for Wannon must withdraw it.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Then I withdraw it.

Mr. CROUCH:—It would do away with my opposition to the motion if I knew that this firm had consented to the publication of the information asked for.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—More than one firm is concerned. There are at least two firms in South Australia.

Mr. CROUCH.—The more there are the better; but I venture to say that it will do a large amount of harm to McKay and Company, whose Sunshine harvester, manufactured at Ballarat, is exported in large numbers, and to the other local firms who are in this business, if their foreign trade rivals are informed of the destinations to which Australian harvesters are sent. The honorable and learned member for Wannon has recently been supplied with information, in connexion with a debate in this House, by the Massey-Harris Company, a trade rival of McKay and Company, which imports machines to Australia.

Mr. ROBINSON. — The Massey-Harris Company has not approached me in any way about this return.

Mr. CROUCH.—Then the honorable and learned member is accidentally rendering a great deal of assistance to the importers of harvesters. The Sunshine harvesters have been sent to Peru, Chili, and to the Argentine.

Mr. McCAY.—Where did the honorable and learned member get that information?

Mr. CROUCH.—It is a matter of public knowledge, and has been stated in the press.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Then why object to the return?

Mr. CROUCH.—Because it would give an advantage to the trade rivals of the local manufacturers of harvesters. I am sorry that I have not had an opportunity to consult Messrs. McKay and Company as to whether they think the publication of the information asked for will injure their export business. The honorable and learned member for Wannon would have an equal right to ask for the names of the consignees to whom they send their harvesters. Cannot honorable members see that that might injure the local manufacturers? Those of us who are interested in building up Australian manufactures should see that nothing is done to assist Canadian and American firms which are endeavouring to crush out local production. But, perhaps, as the time allowed for private business has nearly expired, I may be allowed to continue my remarks on another day.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is it the pleasure of the House that the honorable and learned member for Corio have leave to continue his remarks on another day?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I object.

Mr. CROUCH.—I intend to move—

That the words "such return to specify the destination of such exports" be left out.

It may be that the production of this information will not do the harm that I anticipate, and the attitude of the Government towards the motion supports that view; but, as I am not aware of what the manufacturers themselves think about the matter, I am of opinion that it would be better to omit those words. In the United States of America, President Roosevelt, under what may be called an elastic clause of the Tariff Act, has power, when he sees that there is a certain volume of imports into that country from abroad—

SUPPLY.

ADDITIONS, NEW WORKS, AND BUILDINGS.

DEPARTMENT OF HOME AFFAIRS.

In Committee of Supply:

Division 1 (Trade and Customs), £5,158.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan—Treasurer).—We propose to ask honorable members to adopt a course somewhat different from that previously followed in regard to making provision for new works and buildings. We desire to dispose of the works and buildings estimates before the general estimates are dealt with. Previous experience has shown us that generally it is very late in the year before the Estimates are passed, and that very little time then remains within which to proceed with works for which provision is made, and complete them before the end of the financial year. I think that the course we now propose is a good one, because it will enable us to place the works in hand at an early date, and probably obviate the necessity of coming to the House next year and asking honorable members to revote large sums of money.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—A great deal of the delay in the construction of works arises from the neglect to push on with them.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is great difficulty in pushing on with the works. In the first place, plans and specifications have to be prepared, and the Department is not in a position to incur even this initial expenditure until the works have been approved. Therefore, no work can be legally put in hand until the Appropriation Bill has been passed. Honorable members will see at once that if plans and specifications were prepared at considerable cost for the erection of buildings, and Parliament afterwards refused to sanction the expenditure, no money would be available for the payment of even the preliminary expenses.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Has the Treasurer ever known of such a system having been adopted in any other Parliament?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I cannot say that I know of such a case, but I think that the course proposed is a most convenient one.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Very convenient, for the Government.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not convenient for the Government, but of great advantage to the country.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. — This matter should be dealt with as soon as the debate on the Budget has been concluded, and not before.

Mr. DEAKIN. — That would involve a considerable delay.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the discussion of the new works and buildings were involved in the debate on the general estimates, I could see the point of the right honorable gentleman's remark; but I consider that, in view of all the circumstances, it is in the best interests of the country to put the proposed works in hand at once. Honorable members cannot say that they have not had notice of the intention of the Government in this direction, because I intimated about a fortnight ago that we intended to follow this course. There has been no whisper either from honorable members or from the press that any objection would be raised, and I trust that no technical objections will be brought forward to interfere with the passing of this appropriation. The works and buildings estimates, which are included in the schedule of the Bill, provide for an expenditure of £418,911, as compared with nearly £12,000,000 provided for in the general estimates. I do not see why we should delay proceeding with the proposed works until honorable members have talked for two or three months. The change which we have made is, I think, in the right direction.

Mr. CONROY.—Is it true that only about £10,000 of the money proposed to be appropriated will be spent in wages?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I cannot say the exact amount, but necessarily a large sum will be spent in wages, because buildings can only be constructed by the employment of labour, which, of course, has to be paid for. I cannot see any practical objection to the course we are adopting. Honorable members will see by reference to the schedule that under the Department of Trade and Customs, provision is made for a revote of £1,979, and for the expenditure of £185 upon new services. Under the head of the Defence Department, it is proposed to revote £26,245, and to appropriate for new services, £40,271. In the Post and Telegraph Department, it is proposed to revote £23,565, and to devote to new services £56,016; the total being £148,261, of which revotes represent £51,789. It is anticipated that £20,000 of the total amount will not be expended during the year. It is proposed to appropriate for the construction of telegraph and telephone lines, £169,150, but it is anticipated that £20,000 of this amount will not be expended during the year. It is intended to place at the disposal of the Treasurer, £1,500 for the purchase of machinery and plant for the Commonwealth Printing Office, whilst the Defence Department is to have an appropriation of £181,060, of which it is expected that £41,060 will not be expended during the year. In the Defence revotes, provision is made for the construction of a stable and gun park at Brisbane, at a cost of £1,250, whilst £1,909 is to be revoted in connexion with the additions to the Customs House at Sydney. Provision is made for a revote of £1,000 for the construction of a rifle range at Brisbane, £4,900 is to be revoted for the construction of forts and quarters at Arthur's Head, at Fremantle, and £5,996 is to be revoted in connexion with the construction of the fort, and the acquisition of the site at North Fremantle. I trust that we shall be able to spend this money during the current financial year.

Mr. McCAY.—That money voted for the construction of the fort at North Fremantle was not spent last year, because the site was not acquired, and not because of the delay in passing the vote.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — I know that the site was selected two years ago by Major-General Sir Edward Hutton.

Mr. McCAY.—I know that what I state is perfectly correct.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is proposed to revote £9,900 for post-offices in New South Wales, £4,937 for post-offices in Victoria, £1,299 for post-offices in Queensland, £1,754 for post-offices in South Australia, and £5,675 for post-offices in Western Australia. All these amounts were voted last year, but the works could not be completed because of the short time that elapsed between the passing of the Appropriation Act and the end of the financial year. I do not think it is desirable that we should repeat the same operation year after year. All these works for which these sums are to be appropriated have already been approved by the House, and still we have to come back and ask that the money shall be revoted. Under the head of new works, it will be seen that provision is made for fortifications and other defence works in New South Wales to the extent of £9,922, and that it is proposed to spend in Victoria £10,356; in Queensland, £3,821; in South Australia, £3,381; in Western Australia, £11,247; and in Tasmania, £1,544. The votes for new services in the Post-office Department are as follows:—New South Wales, £11,350; Victoria, £15,200; Queensland, £5,846; South Australia, £3,870; and Western Australia, £19,750. As I have already said, it is expected that £20,000 of the total amount of £169,150 will not be spent during the current year. I may mention that provision is made in the amount voted for the Postmaster-General's Department for £30,000 for the construction of a trunk telephone line from Sydney to Melbourne. It is proposed to expend £15,000 upon telephone lines in Queensland, and £10,000 upon similar works in South Australia, whilst £6,000 is appropriated for telegraph lines, and £17,000 for telephone lines in Western Australia. Under the heading of Defence, it is anticipated that there will be an expenditure of £140,000, in accordance with the plan which is being carried out for providing special up-to-date armament and material, and for placing our land forces upon a war footing. It is expected that we shall spend that amount this year, although, if it is possible to obtain the requisite arms and armament within that period, the expenditure will be £181,060. As I remarked the other evening, we are nearing the time when we shall have completed the scheme for placing our land forces upon a war footing, so far as their equipment with arms and armament of the most approved type is concerned. My colleagues will be able to explain to honorable members any details in the Bill connected with their various Departments. The measure provides, I am sorry to say, only for the few works which the Commonwealth is able to carry out. Those works will be constructed out of revenue, and the expenditure upon them represents even less than the amount for which I have been accustomed to ask in a small State. Seeing that we are only asking the Committee to authorize an expenditure of £418,911 upon works for the whole of the Commonwealth, I do not think that any one can charge us with extravagance. Nobody who was unacquainted with the facts, would credit the statement that this great Commonwealth, with 10,000 miles of seaboard, is confining itself to absolutely necessary works, involving an expenditure of only £418,911 for the year.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The Senate saved the Government £18,000 yesterday.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think that the work to which the honorable member refers would have been carried out in a year. Neither do I regard his remark as a fair one. I could retort severely, but I hope that I shall be a more generous political friend to the beautiful State of which the honorable member is a representative than he seems to be to my isolated State, Western Australia.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—It is not a matter of friendship.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I thoroughly understand that it is a matter of duty. I shall be glad to give any further information that I can to honorable members—and I am sure that I may make a similar promise on behalf of my colleagues—in regard to any of the items contained in these Estimates.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I should like to make one or two remarks upon these Estimates at the present stage. I am totally opposed to the course which the Government propose to take in connexion with them. I am not opposed to reasonable despatch in the voting of supplies for necessary works, and I deeply regret that I have to place myself in antagonism to the Government upon this matter, for the simple reason that I anticipate there will come, from some quarters of the House as reasons for the urgency of the course which the Government are adopting, the cry that people are out of work and want it. I submit that great and urgent as such considerations are, and deeply as we may sympathize with the unfortunates who are in need of employment, we have still a higher duty to perform—the duty of guarding to the fullest possible extent, all the constitutional rights which are provided as checks upon a possibly extravagant Government. The Treasurer has told us that the proposals which he has made are in the interests of the country. I venture to say that we shall best consult the interests of the country if we carefully dissect and discuss any proposals relating to finance which this or any other Government may bring forward, and if we observe all those checks and balances which the Constitution has provided upon the extravagance of those who have charge of our Executive functions.

Mr. FISHER.—But there is no proposal to hurry these Estimates through.

Mr. McCAY.—There is to be a proposal to suspend the Standing Orders.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — I understand that the Government propose to suspend the Standing Orders, in order to put a Bill through immediately we have passed these Estimates. I am altogether opposed to the suspension of the Standing Orders, until greater necessity has been shown for adopting such an extraordinary course. The Treasurer has told us that it is a convenient practice to bring down these large Estimates of works, and I submit that they are large, having in view the possibility of expenditure on the part of the Government—expenditure the limitations of which the Treasurer so deeply regrets. I am sure that he is sorry that he has not scores of millions of pounds to spend all over Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — If we had it I should like to spend it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am sure that the right honorable gentleman would. He would very soon make it fly, and I feel certain that his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Customs, would back him for all he knew when the question of the expenditure of public money came to be discussed in Cabinet. Everybody knows that the Treasurer likes to spend money. He has made himself extremely popular before to-day by the adoption of that very means. He regrets that he has not millions to scatter over a smiling Australia. He says that he is adopting this course because it is a convenient one. May I remind him that that reason has been urged for the most corrupt and extravagant proposals which have ever come before the Parliaments of the world. Before to-day kings have found it convenient to dispense with parliamentary control altogether on that account. I submit that there is no more urgent reason for adopting the course proposed than is to be found in the general observations of the Treasurer. I have no hesitation in saying that the proposal of the Government, under all the circumstances of the case, is neither more nor less than an indecent one.

Mr. POYNTON.—Is it indecent to endeavour to provide a little work?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member might as well make that interjection as any other; it is an absolutely foolish one.

Mr. POYNTON.—It is absolutely correct.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That remark, I am afraid, shows the total incapacity of the honorable member to view this matter in its proper relation—

Mr. POYNTON.—I know all about it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—May I venture to say that these remarks only serve to show the demoralization which is coming over this House.

Mr. TUDOR.—Hear, hear.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We are asked to put aside all the ordinary processes of legislation as applied to finance, and to abandon all the checks which the House is supposed to exercise upon Ministerial extravagance—to establish a new precedent in regard to the disposal of these matters—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—With what object?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have no doubt that the right honorable gentleman does not take any account of precedent or custom, no matter how they may be sanctified by time. He has already shown a very decided disposition to make a new departure in connexion with the delivery of his Budget. Now he is endeavouring to remove the control of the finances from the House. No doubt that would be a very convenient practice, and the more a Government is inclined to be extravagant, the more convenient it would be. What are the facts of the case? The Treasurer submitted the whole of the financial policy of the Government to us two days ago. It has occupied a whole year in preparation.

Mr. POYNTON.—That is not correct.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is not correct from the stand-point of the honorable member, but from my point of view it is perfectly correct. I say that the Treasurer's statement, as presented to us, shows the working of the Commonwealth Departments over a whole year.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable member has altered his original statement.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am amplifying that statement a little. I say that from that stand-point the Treasurer's statement is the result of the year's operation of the Departments. If it has taken the Departments a whole year to formulate these proposals, is it fair to ask us at two days' notice to vote huge sums of money, involving large matters of Government policy, in this hasty manner? We have had no time to peruse the various items contained in the Estimates. They have been placed before us, and we are asked, forsooth, to vote the money and to discuss any question of policy which may be concerned subsequently. The other night the Treasurer agreed to an adjournment of the Budget debate for a week to enable the ex-Treasurer—the right honorable member for Balaclava—to peruse the statement submitted to the House.

Mr. CROUCH.—The ex-Treasurer rose to discuss this matter, but the honorable member took precedence of him.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am sure that the ex-Treasurer will be able to answer for himself, and I have yet to learn that the honorable and learned member for Corio is so much of a thought-reader as to know the intentions of the right honorable gentleman.

Mr. CROUCH.—The right honorable member for Balaclava rose to address the Committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — I shall await with the greatest possible interest the statement of the right honorable member for Balaclava upon this matter. I am making my protest against voting this money—involving, as it does, large matters of public policy—before there has been a thorough discussion of the Budget itself. Can we again discuss these matters after the money has been voted? Will it be of any use for us to do so? I venture to say that we are wrongly discussing the whole matter now. We cannot possibly discuss these large questions of policy so hurriedly, and with the small amount of information that is now in our possession. I am not complaining of the wisdom of dealing with these works estimates at the earliest possible moment. I do not wish to be misunderstood upon that point. I agree that every expedition should be used, consistent with the duty cast upon us of thoroughly investigating the items. But I submit that they should only be dealt with after there has been a thorough discussion of the whole of the Budget proposals—immediately after that has taken place, if honorable members please, but certainly not before. That is the point I take in connexion with the whole matter. What was done last year? It is well known that the ex-Treasurer has always urged that we should pass the Works Estimates as speedily as possible, on the ground that more time is thus given for the expenditure of the votes so passed, and that the Treasurer feels that he has greater freedom in dealing with the money. The action taken last year by the Government may have suggested the course now proposed to be followed, but the two cases are altogether different. If the Government would pursue the policy that was adopted by the late Government, I should have no complaint whatever and no ground of quarrel with the Treasurer. I find that the Budget was not delivered last year until the 17th or 18th of October.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There were special reasons for that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not know what led to the delay.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The Government had to wait for the Public Service classification.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—At all events, the Budget statement was not submitted until October, and, notwithstanding the lateness of its delivery, no proposal was made to deal with the Works Estimates until the 24th November—six weeks later. I am not pleading for any delay, except that necessary to enable us to thoroughly discuss the Budget proposals covering the policy regulating the whole of the intended expenditure. The reason for urgency, which existed last year, is not forthcoming in this case. We are now only in the month of August, and the discussion of the Budget proposals will probably be nearing its conclusion soon after the beginning of next month. I submit that the Government should follow the policy adopted last year, shortening, if necessary, the interval between the discussion of the Budget, and the submission of these Estimates. The moment the Budget has been discussed, and dealt with, I shall be prepared to vote these supplies. We have a higher function than that of hastening a little temporary employment for those who are unfortunately out of work, and that function is to thoroughly test and scrutinize the expenditure of the Government, which seems to be so large, extravagant, and statelily in its notions. I have already said that these Estimates involve important questions of public policy, and we have to discuss those questions in view of the Ministerial declaration. Let us, for example, take the Estimates relating to the Department of Defence, under which we are asked to vote about £140,000. In these Estimates we have the items, "Field artillery, guns, harness, waggons, and ammunition, £58,000"; "machine guns, £10,000"; "two 7.5 guns and ammunition, £24,000." I do not wish at this stage to discuss the question whether that expenditure ought to be incurred. I am prepared to believe it is necessary, and that these are largely the Estimates of the preceding Government; but, surely, there are questions of policy involved. We have been told by the Prime Minister that, in his opinion, the whole subject of the defence of Australia ought speedily be placed under review, with a view to a stable policy being decided upon.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We are only proposing at this stage to carry out what we have already agreed upon.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There is much to be said as to the point raised last year by the leader of the Labour Party, in reference to the equity of the proposal to expend £24,000 at the present moment in putting the defences of Western Australia on a secure footing.

Mr. FRAZER.—What about the £30,000 for the telephone services?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I shall come to that point. We spent large sums in perfecting the defences of New South Wales before the Department was taken over by the Commonwealth, and it is a question of moment whether we ought to expend this money in Western Australia until, at all events, the matter of the transfer of State properties has been settled, and their values determined. This is a matter that ought to be dealt with in the general discussion of the Budget before we are called upon to vote these huge sums of money.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We voted the money in question last year, but did not expend the whole of it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We certainly voted it last year, but there was much demur to the proposed expenditure, objections being raised, on the initiative of the leader of the Labour Party, who pointed out how inequitable it would be to make this outlay in Western Australia until the question of the transfer of properties had been determined. I do not wish to discuss these matters, and am referring to them only to show why we should delay the passing of these Estimates until the whole question of policy relating to them has been settled. The Treasurer told us last night that he was strongly in favour of Imperial defence, and that we ought to pay more for our defences.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not say anything about the Imperial Navy. I am not taking back anything I said, but all that I asserted was that we should have to spend more on our own defences. I did not say in what way that expenditure should be made.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Am I to understand—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member is to understand only what I said.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—As the right honorable gentleman refuses to vouchsafe any explanation, I must proceed in my own way. I am indebted to him for his courtesy in declining to assist me to understand what he had in mind.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is all in Hansard.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But Hansard is not available to me at this moment. The right honorable gentleman, at all events, told us distinctly last night that we required to spend more for the purposes of Imperial defence.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—For the purposes of defence.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think the right honorable gentleman used the word "Imperial."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I refer the honorable member to Hansard.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The Treasurer was quite right if he did use that word.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am not saying that he was right or wrong, but in view of his statement I wish to direct attention to the item of £58,000 for field artillery. This appears to me to be putting the cart before the horse. I take it that our sea defences are our first line of defence, and therefore, if we are going to spend these huge sums in procuring field artillery, we ought also, according to the right honorable gentleman's theory, to be attending to our coastal defences more adequately than we are. These are all matters of policy that should be discussed before we vote these huge sums. There is another item of £10,000 in respect to machine guns. We are to incur this heavy expenditure in purchasing machine guns before we have a definite policy of defence, as suggested by the Prime Minister.

Mr. CROUCH.—The £10,000 in question was voted last year.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Even if that be so, the matter should be explained. I believe, however, that the money has not been spent. Before we indulge in this great expenditure upon our land defences, we ought to have some definite statement from the Minister as to the defence policy of the Government. The Prime Minister has been travelling all over Australia, talking in his most eloquent way of the necessity of improving our defences, and practically of assimilating the defence system of Australia with that of Switzerland.

Mr. EWING.—Such a scheme cannot be drawn up in a few days. The honorable member ought to be fair.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Certainly it cannot, but the Prime Minister, by implication, condemns our present system. That being so, a clear, definite, and intelligent policy in regard to the defences of Australia should be placed before the House—either by the Prime Minister or the Treasurer—before we are asked to vote these large sums. If there is an explanation to be given, we ought to have it. Let us discuss these matters adequately, and know in what direction we are trending before we pass these huge votes. Then there is the question of Inter-State telephones, to which reference has been made by the honorable member for Kalgoorlie. I find that a sum of £19,000 is to be placed to the debit of New South Wales, and a sum of £11,000 is to be debited to Victoria on account of their Inter-State telephones. Surely these items raise a matter of special importance, as to which we ought to have a declaration of policy on the part of the Government. We are told that if we vote these sums the Government will then allow us to discuss the question of policy. This is a matter of the most vital concern to the Commonwealth, and the obligation rests upon us to see that these Works Estimates are not hurried through without the fullest, freest, and fairest investigation. I simply ask the Government to deal, first of all, with the Budget proposals. When the discussion of the Budget has been concluded, it will be open to them to submit their public works policy, and there need be no doubt as to the attitude that the House will take up in deciding whether or not they should be passed with expedition. A delay of two or three weeks can make no practical difference in the expenditure of these moneys.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It seems to be a case of live horse and you will get grass.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am bound to say that the more I hear of the right honorable gentleman the more do I think the Parliament ought to be careful in intrusting him with sums of money without the fullest discussion as to their destination, and as to the advisableness of the proposed expenditure.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have been accustomed to being trusted in this way.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I suppose the right honorable gentleman has. From what I hear, he used to have a very free and easy time in the West.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The proof of the pudding is in the eating.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is very easy to get the pudding, and eat it too, when one is acting the part of an emperor in one's own State. I hope we are not going to have a repetition of anything of that kind in connexion with the finances of the Commonwealth. I can conceive of nothing more disastrous to the finances of Australia than the pursuance of a policy that may have been advantageous in the early days of Western Australia. I am not condemning the right honorable gentleman for anything that he did in Western Australia, but suggest that the position of the Parliament of that State is entirely different from that of the Commonwealth. Here we are acting as trustees in monetary matters for the whole of the States. Our position is very different from that of those who are agreeing to the expenditure of money in their own State. Before we have any further voting away of large sums of money, the least we may ask the Government to do is to facilitate the discussion of the Budget, and to finish the financial debate before proceeding to deal with these Estimates.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Balaclava).—The acting leader of the Opposition has forestalled me in the remarks which he has just made. I think that he has put the position very fairly, and forcibly. The Government will not accuse me of desiring to prevent them from getting on with business, and it is my wish to facilitate the passing of these particular Estimates. My experience as Treasurer showed me that the effect of passing these Estimates late in the year, and of the Works Department not having ready in advance the necessary plans and specifications, so that the works for which Parliament voted money could be proceeded with directly the Works and Buildings Bill became law, was that the parliamentary appropriations could not be spent during the currency of the financial year. I therefore intimated, some time ago, that I intended to ask the House to deal with the works portion of the Budget proposals earlier than with the ordinary appropriations for the year; the former practice being to discuss the ordinary appropriations for the year, which took several weeks, before dealing with the works estimates. Now, however, we are asked to go from one extreme to the other, and to do what, in my opinion, it would be highly improper, and, perhaps, hereafter, dangerous to do. I am as anxious as is any one to see necessary public works proceeded with, but it will not make any difference whether we pass these Estimates to-night or three weeks hence, because, before anything can be done tenders must be accepted; and there is nothing in the world to prevent the Government from calling for tenders, and having everything ready a month hence, by which time I am certain that the Estimates will have been passed, because a large part of the amount asked for is made up of re-votes for works in progress. I admit that it is useless to fight the Government on this question, because of their solid majority, but I urge the Prime Minister and the Treasurer not to attempt to rush these Estimates through.

Mr. FISHER.—About when would the right honorable member suggest as the proper time for their discussion?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I am pointing out that the Government will gain nothing by forcing through these Estimates now. Honorable members will desire explanation with regard to many of the items contained in them. Such an item is that which provides for the construction of a telephone between Sydney and Melbourne, to be charged to all the States on a population basis.

Mr. FRAZER.—Then that work is not to be paid for by Victoria and New South Wales alone?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No. According to the practice of the last two years, expenditure of this kind, whether incurred in Western Australia or in any other State, is debited to the Commonwealth as a whole. The suggestion I make to the Government is advanced in all friendliness, with a view to expediting the passing of the Estimates. We are to resume the debate on the Budget next Tuesday, and I am certain that the Government do not anticipate that the Estimates now before us can be finally dealt with in the two or three hours of to-night's sitting, and the few hours at our disposal to-morrow. They perhaps could be forced through if they were not properly discussed; but the Government would make a grave mistake if they adopted such a course. Besides, they would have nothing to gain by adopting it. To say that by objecting to the consideration of these Estimates now we are preventing men from getting work is to make a statement for which there is no foundation in fact. I am as anxious as are my honorable friends on the corner benches that work shall be provided for the people, but such work cannot be proceeded with until the Works Department has all preliminaries ready, so that it will be sufficiently early if we pass these Estimates in a month's time.

Mr. POYNTON.—Why did not the right honorable member see that preliminaries were advanced when he was in office?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I have frequently urged the Works Department to have their plans and specifications prepared in advance of the voting of money by Parliament; but I found it difficult to get them to do so. My suggestion is that we should commence the financial debate on Tuesday next, and deal with the Budget proposals as a whole. We cannot fairly discuss proposals of great moment, such as the Budget, piecemeal; but that is what we are being asked to do. We must either pass these Estimates without discussion, and vote blindfolded, or we must properly consider them, in which case they will not have been dealt with by Tuesday next, when the debate on the Budget is to be resumed. I suggest, therefore, that they should be allowed to stand over until the conclusion of the debate on the Budget, which probably will be concluded within a fortnight. My remarks on the Budget will be of the briefest character, because I have no desire to spin out the discussion on the Treasurer's statement, and I do not know that any honorable member desires to do so. Therefore a fortnight, and perhaps a week, will suffice for the Budget debate, and these Estimates can be brought forward immediately afterwards. In regard to them, I suggest to the Treasurer that he might advantageously follow the practice which I adopted in connexion with my first Budget, and which I intended to adopt in connexion with the others, but found it impossible to do so, namely, to have a short statement prepared, giving all the information available in regard to every proposed work, and to circulate that statement amongst honorable members. If that is done, probably nine out of ten of the proposals will be passed without discussion. I appeal to the Treasurer, and to my old friend the Prime Minister, not to try to force these Estimates through now. The Government have nothing to gain by doing that. No harm may be likely to come from passing this particular set of Estimates at this time, but to do so will establish what I think may be a dangerous precedent. While nothing will be gained by forcing the Estimates through, nothing will be lost by allowing their consideration to be postponed until after the Budget debate, because, in the meantime, plans and specifications can be got ready, and tenders advertised for, returnable, say, in three weeks or a month, by which time the Estimates will have been passed, and the money needed will be available.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What will be the position of the poor people who go to the trouble of tendering for works which are not sanctioned by this House?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—There are works to be tendered for which are certain to be sanctioned by this House.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Then why not pass the Estimates now?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Because we have no precedent for dealing with an important part of the Budget proposals before the statement of the Treasurer has been discussed. I was astounded when I entered the Chamber, and found what was proposed. I shall not take any further part in opposing the action of the Government if they refuse my request; but I urge them, in their own interest, and in that of the Committee, to prevent the establishment of a dangerous precedent, by allowing the discussion of these Estimates to be postponed until the conclusion of the Budget debate, when we on this side of the Chamber will facilitate the passing of them, as much as men can do.

Mr. FISHER.—As the first business after the conclusion of the Budget debate?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Yes, immediately afterwards.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—It is impossible for any of us to listen to the right honorable member who has just resumed his seat without feeling that great deference is due to one of such large experience in both Commonwealth and State finance. The right honorable gentleman, however, spoke under a slight misapprehension, while the acting leader of the Opposition was still more in error. It is not the desire of the Government that the Committee shall pass these Estimates without the closest scrutiny and consideration. We are ready to afford all information needed, and are not attempting to force honorable members to accept them in any unprecedented way. We understood that there was a consensus of opinion that the course now being followed should be adopted.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It was suggested in previous sessions, and recently pressed by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, the leader of the Labour Party, and others. We have complied with the suggestion, under the impression that in so doing we should be acting in accordance with the desires of honorable members generally. I took steps to assure myself that in improving, so to speak, on the excellent precedent set by the right honorable member for Balacava last year in taking the Works Estimates before the ordinary Estimates of the year, we should do nothing contrary to the principles of right parliamentary procedure. We have passed a Supply Bill framed on the lines of the Budget proposals before the financial debate has begun, and are at liberty to deal similarly with these works and buildings estimates. It might well happen that, on occasion, some great principle might be involved, in which case it would be reasonable to request the postponement of that part of the Estimates until the Budget had been dealt with. There are, however, no such items now before the Committee, and the passing of these Estimates will in no way interfere with the discussion of the general financial position. There is no constitutional objection to following the course which the Government has proposed, if honorable members are ready to do so, and we understood that it was their wish that it should be followed. If any novel proposal can be discovered in these Estimates, demanding special consideration, there can be no objection to dealing reasonably in regard to it. In adopting this course, the Government have no intention of achieving any advantage for themselves. But, year after year, Parliament is asked to re-vote sums of money which could not be expended in the year in which they were originally voted. There are a number of such items in these Estimates from last year. The proposals to which they relate have been already thoroughly discussed, and approved by Parliament.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why not deal similarly with the Estimates which provide for the salaries of the public servants?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The House has just voted a month's supply for them before dealing with the Treasurer's statement.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—If any single item in these Estimates has to be postponed, it will prevent the Government from proceeding with the Works and Buildings Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There can be an understanding that, if the Estimates are agreed to, we shall not proceed to expend the money until the Budget debate is concluded.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The Government have another place to consider.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am informed that there are works being proceeded with by the Department of Home Affairs, and the Postmaster-General's Department, which will be stopped if money is not speedily voted. I pay great deference to my right honorable friend's opinion, and he has made an appeal which it is very hard to resist.

Mr. FISHER.—And a promise.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am quite sure that the right honorable gentleman would follow the same course, promise or no promise. He has made an appeal which it is very hard to resist, and to meet his friendly invitation I venture to make a suggestion. I find from consultation with the officers of the Postal and Home Affairs Departments that the requisitions have been received for a certain number of works, for which preparations are now in hand. The amount required by the Department of Home Affairs would not amount to more than £4,000 or £5,000, but a considerably larger amount would have to be appropriated for similar works in the Postal Department. I understand that a number of payments would have to be made for work already done.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Those amounts might be paid out of the Treasurer's Advance Account.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I was just about to say that provision could be made for such payments out of the Treasurer's Advance Account. On the understanding that we shall proceed with the works which are ready, and so give whatever employment we can immediately, I shall consent to my honorable friend's suggestion, and defer the further consideration of these Estimates until he and other honorable members have offered their criticisms upon the Budget. I think that by following this course I shall pay that regard which is due to the right honorable gentleman, and at the same time arrive at an understanding which will enable us to proceed with the more urgent works, and to some extent relieve the pressure. For the present, we shall have to rely upon the Treasurer's advance, but I trust that honorable members will see that the course that we have proposed to follow with these votes is far from being opposed to any constitutional practice, and will be a convenient one. I think that by dealing with the works and buildings estimates at as early a period of the year as possible, we shall make our appropriations real instead of sham votes, and enable the money set apart for certain works to be expended, as it is intended it should be, during the year for which it is voted.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — Parliament would altogether surrender its hold upon the policy of the Government if it passed the works estimates before the debate on the Budget was concluded.

Mr. DEAKIN. — That might be so upon some very special occasions, but I do not think that in the ordinary course there is anything to fear. Under the special circumstances I shall ask my honorable colleague the Treasurer not to proceed further to-night. I trust that honorable members will give us every assistance in dealing not only with the Budget, but with the proposed votes for the works enumerated in these Estimates, regarding which every information will be circulated.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta). — I feel that I ought to make one remark after the speech which the Prime Minister has addressed principally, if not wholly, to the right honorable member for Balaclava.

Mr. WILKS. — The Prime Minister ignored the Opposition.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — I wish to say that, so far as any implied understanding is concerned, he must not take my silence as involving in any way my assent to the proposal.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs). — I was placed in a rather special personal position in regard to a late colleague of mine, who not only advanced a pointed argument, but made a personal appeal; and in my natural desire to respond to his suggestion in the spirit in which it was made, confined my remarks to him, but without the slightest intention of ignoring the position occupied by the honorable member for Parramatta.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — All I wish the Minister to understand is that I am not a consenting party to any bargain such as he has suggested.

Mr DEAKIN. — I am quite satisfied to allow the honorable member to take his own course, so long as he realizes that I was speaking by way of reply to a personal appeal, and may have appeared to ignore him, without having the slightest intention of so doing.

Mr. FRAZER (Kalgoorlie). — I do not feel at all satisfied with the position the Prime Minister is taking up on this occasion, and I almost feel disposed to think that his attitude —

Mr. CONROY. — What is the use of the honorable member's yapping, if he does not intend to bite?

Mr. FRAZER. — It is a novel thing to hear the honorable and learned member yapping, because when he was sitting over on this side of the Chamber he was not even allowed to open his mouth. I am glad to say that honorable members on this side are at liberty to express their opinions upon any subject and at any time, and I am prepared to express mine to the extent of voting upon the question as to whether we should proceed further with the business now before us. The Prime Minister, in my opinion, for weakly yielding, deserved the rebuke which he received from the leader of the Opposition. Estimates were presented providing for revotes amounting to £51,000 for works which were authorized last year, and which should be proceeded with without any further delay, and yet the Prime Minister immediately complies with the request of the ex-Treasurer, and consents to set aside the business in hand. The right honorable member for Balaclava suggests that there is no precedent for pursuing the course proposed by the Government; but my view is that we should not think of precedent in connexion with a matter of this kind. There is every reason why we should proceed with the consideration of the works estimates to-night rather than in three or four weeks' time. The members of the Opposition appear to be bent on taking advantage of every opportunity to prevent business from being transacted. They have in some cases extended their speeches over a number of hours, in order to delay business and discredit the Government in the eyes of the country. They are apparently intent upon showing the electors that the Government can do no good, and they are now going to the length of preventing us from revoting moneys for the construction of works which should have been completed last year. They are denying our artisans and others an opportunity of securing that employment which should be furnished for them at the first opportunity. If the members of the late Government were so anxious to serve the interests of the unfortunate workers, why did they permit works to be delayed to such an extent that it has become necessary to revote £51,000? I think that question demands an answer.

Mr. WILKS.—Has the honorable member the authority of his party for speaking in this way?

Mr. FRAZER.—I have the authority which my conscience gives me for any action that I may take. I am not at the behest of the leader of a band of honorable members who are prepared to prevent other honorable members from freely expressing their opinions. A few weeks ago I had an experience of some members of the Opposition which has made me particularly cautious in my dealings with them. When honorable members can sit on the Opposition benches, and hear every word that is said at the table to an honorable member whose face is turned away from them, they are very clever; and when they tell us that their present action is taken in the best interests of the country, I am not prepared to accept their assurances. I regret exceedingly that the Prime Minister should have seen fit, even at the request of the right honorable member for Balaclava, to postpone this business. We are abandoning one position because there is no precedent for it, and are establishing a much more dangerous precedent, namely, that of paying for works out of the Treasurer's Advance Account. I do not think that the Treasurer's vote should be drawn upon to pay for works for which the appropriations have to be partly revoted. Now is the time for us to express our opinions upon such proposed revotes. I am not pleased with the position, and I am prepared, if honorable members opposite will assist me—

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—No, no.

Mr. FRAZER.—Honorable members are prepared to make private arrangements which may be easily broken, but they are not prepared to enter into a public arrangement with a view to facilitating the business of the country. The Prime Minister has had experience of the "wreckers" who came across from the Opposition benches to defeat him on one occasion, and that should have made him very careful of accepting their plausible assurances. I do not at all approve of the present position of affairs, and I hope that a majority of honorable members will be in favour of proceeding with the business to-night.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—In that study of the law to which the honorable member for Kalgoorlie is devoting himself with so much praiseworthy zeal, he will find that he will have to be guided by precedent to a very large extent. It is simply because they have stood the test of time that they exist, and any departure from the great principles involved in them is always fraught with much more danger than is an adherence to them. I venture to say that it would be a very bad thing indeed if the House allowed these items of expenditure to pass before the Budget statement had been discussed. Honorable members should recollect that we have now arrived at a very critical stage in the history of the Commonwealth. This year, after paying for the cost of the Commonwealth services, only a surplus of about £460,000 will remain, and out of that we shall probably have to spend £350,000. It will thus be seen that the Commonwealth will have only about £110,000, which it may use for purposes of administration. I wish to point out why we should most carefully scrutinize every proposed increase in expenditure. The sum I have mentioned is so small that it will not enable us to administer very many new Acts, and it is idle to pass enactments if we cannot administer them. In a large territory like Australia I suppose that any Act of importance will cost from £15,000 to £20,000 per annum to administer. Consequently, it is apparent that by the time we pass five or six more statutes we shall have reached the end of our tether. Under such circumstances, I ask honorable members when the Budget debate is resumed upon Tuesday next to recognise that there is one matter of paramount importance, namely, a system of sound finance.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We have heard that statement before.

Mr. CONROY.—If the Treasurer has heard it before it has fallen upon deaf ears. The more one regards the system of finance the more he must see how intimately it is bound up with the progress of the people. Without a sound system we shall embark upon a career which will bring ruin into thousands of homes, because, after all, it is the great masses of the people for whom we must have regard. We must take care that the rate of interest upon capital is not increased. By so much as we destroy credit, by so much do we destroy that which is of the greatest aid in the acquisition of wealth. I do trust that in the discussion which will be initiated upon Tuesday next we shall all scrutinize the Estimates of expenditure very carefully, and do our best to cut them down to the lowest point possible consistent with sound administration. In the present instance I think that the Prime Minister is to be commended for the course which he has taken. I am sure that if the honorable member for Kalgoorlie had been present during the sittings of the first Commonwealth Parliament he would have recognised that even his impetuosity, added perhaps to my own, would be quite powerless to coerce a House into doing something of which it does not approve.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby).—I wish to ask the Treasurer whether he can give us any definite idea as to when this matter will again come up for consideration. The Prime Minister has stated that its discussion would be resumed after the right honorable member for Balaclava and two or three others had spoken upon the Budget. Upon the present occasion we had a full day's notice that these Estimates were coming on for consideration, and, although there are some matters in them which will excite no comment, there are others which may provoke discussion. In these circumstances, I ask that the resumption of the debate shall not be sprung upon the House without sufficient notice having been given.

Mr. HUTCHISON (Hindmarsh).—I do not regard the statement of the ex-Treasurer in the same light as does the Prime Minister. I think that the right honorable member for Balaclava gave the Committee the very best reason why we should pass this portion of the Estimates to-night. He assured us that everything is "right as right can be"—so right that the Government could proceed to call for tenders for carrying out the works enumerated in the Bill. Personally, I am of opinion that we have been too long bound by bad precedents. I admit that we ought to scrutinize these Estimates very carefully, but I am sure that if they had contained one item which was open to challenge the Opposition would have found it long ago. The whole of yesterday's sitting was wasted in the discussion of a most trivial matter. If that is an indication of the way in which the work of the session is to be conducted, it is very difficult to hazard an opinion as to when these Estimates will be passed. If I thought that any important matter of policy was involved in any of the items, I should be the first to advocate delay. But if such a thing could be suggested, I am sure that the watchful deputy leader of the Opposition would have mentioned it ere this. I do think that it is time we endeavoured to do a little more for those persons who at the present time are starving. We have been doing too little for them, and indulging in too much wrangling. In my opinion, we should pass these Estimates, and provide what employment we can for those who are so badly in need of it.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I should like to understand from the Prime Minister whether he intends to proceed with these works before the Budget debate has been concluded.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the Budget debate is finished within a reasonable time we do not intend to proceed with the larger works, but only with the minor works to which I have referred.

Mr. McCAY.—I see no reason why the Government should not undertake the responsibility of immediately proceeding with the smaller works, for which the plans are ready. Although I am strongly opposed to the proposal to push these Estimates through before the Budget debate has taken place, for reasons which I shall mention in a moment, if I did not know that the practice of the Departments is such that they are not ready to proceed with the bulk of the works, I should be prepared to consider them. But the fact is that the Departments do not begin to get their plans and specifications ready until the passing of the works estimates is assured. When I was Ministerial head of the Defence Department, I was preparing to issue instructions—so far as defence works were concerned—that as soon as the Budget was introduced and the Estimates circulated, the plans and specifications of those works were to be got ready, in order that they might be proceeded with the moment that they were sanctioned. I am perfectly certain, however, that that practice has not been followed in the Departments to any material extent. I am quite sure that the Minister of Home Affairs, so far as he is acquainted with the facts—and it is quite impossible to carry all these details in one's head—will confirm my statement, that there is no substantial readiness to proceed. If the Departments are instructed to prepare their plans and specifications, and to get their conditions of contract drawn and approved, I am satisfied that long before they are ready to proceed with any material amount of work, the Budget debate will have been concluded, and these Estimates will have been passed. From my own personal knowledge, I feel sure that there will be no delay in providing employment to men outside by the adoption of the course proposed.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is not what the officers of the Department tell me.

Mr. McCAY.—I have been endeavouring to draw from the Minister of Home Affairs an interjection as to whether my statement is correct, and his silence impresses me as significant.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have been assured by the head of his Department that it is ready to spend £4,000 or £5,000.

Mr. McCAY.—That is an infinitesimal amount. I venture to say that there is not £20,000 worth of work out of the £400,000 provided for in these Estimates which is ready to be proceeded with. If the Departments are instructed to prepare their plans and specifications in anticipation of the Estimates being passed, there need not be an hour's delay in providing employment.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—After a long experience, I do not agree with the honorable and learned member.

Mr. McCAY.—One of the reasons why there is such a large amount revoted in this year's Estimates is that the Works Bill was not approved by Parliament till November of last year. While the Treasurer was speaking of these revotes, I took the trouble to run through some of them in the Defence Department, with which I am familiar, and I find that out of £26,000, at least £12,000 is being revoted for reasons utterly apart from the delay which occurred in passing the Bill last year.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There are two sides even to that question.

Mr. McCAY.—I am not referring to the works at Arthur's Head, Fremantle, but I am referring, amongst other matters, to the North Fremantle forts. It was the difficulties which arose in connexion with the site which occasioned delay in that case.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There was no difficulty experienced, except in buying the land.

Mr. McCAY.—That is all.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why was there so much delay about that?

Mr. McCAY.—If the Treasurer will inquire from the Department of Home Affairs he will obtain very good reasons for the delay which has taken place. There are thousands of pounds in the nature of revotes this year, which have no relation whatever to the time at which the Works Bill was passed last year. I merely rose to say that, so far as I am able to judge from my limited experience as a Minister, there need be no delay in providing employment to persons outside by the adoption of the course which has been agreed to by the Prime Minister, if the Departments are instructed to get their plans and specifications ready in anticipation of the approval of Parliament.

Mr. GROOM.—They have been doing so.

Mr. McCAY.—If these Estimates were passed to-night, I do not think there would be £5,000 worth of work begun within a month from now out of the proposed expenditure of £400,000, quite apart from the fact that a large proportion of that sum will be spent in the purchase of goods ordered upon indent from England. I feel that we ought to thank the Prime Minister for the courtesy with which he readily recognised the reasonableness of the objections that were raised. That recognition casts upon me an obligation to assist the Government so far as I can to pass these Estimates with as little delay as possible as soon as the Budget debate has been concluded. Some questions of vital concern are involved in these Works Estimates. I believe, of course, that those relating to Defence are correct, because they are exactly as I left them on retiring from office. Even an item in respect of which I left a minute suggesting that it should be omitted remains in these Estimates, and the House may consider that it is right that it should. But the whole question of the defence policy of the Government is involved in connexion with the vote for special warlike stores.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is much the same vote as we have passed before.

Mr. McCAY.—That is so, yet I could, if necessary, show that the whole question of the defence policy of the Government is involved in that item. The Treasurer shakes his head, but he will permit me to hold some opinions at all events on this question.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We are simply carrying out the scheme.

Mr. McCAY.—Quite so; but there are other matters involved, and it would be very inconvenient to be called upon to discuss the defence policy of Australia piecemeal. I rose only to say that, as the Government have met my views in this matter, I shall do all that I can fairly be asked to do in seeing that, as soon as the Budget debate has been concluded, the Works Estimates are passed with as little delay as possible.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—The honorable member for Hindmarsh has lectured the Opposition for the action taken by us in regard to this matter; but the very fact that the Treasurer has consented to the postponement of the Works Estimates shows that we have taken up a justifiable position. If the honorable member for Hindmarsh and his party had been sitting in opposition, and we had been on the Government benches, we should have had very different treatment from that which we have received to-day at their hands. We have simply urged that the Government should adhere to principles that have been recognised for years in all Parliaments. If the course proposed by the Government had been in accordance with the usual procedure, the action of the Opposition would have been censurable; but I feel that we were justified in calling the attention of the House to the fact that it was proposed to make a distinct departure from the usual custom. I am pleased that the Treasurer has given way, and shall do all that I can to help him to pass these Estimates as soon as we have dealt with the Budget.

Progress reported.

MANUFACTURES ENCOURAGEMENT BILL (No. 2).

SECOND READING.

Debate resumed from 23rd August (vide page 1383), on motion by Sir WILLIAM LYNE—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—When the debate was interrupted on Tuesday evening, I was pointing out that the sum of £250,000, proposed to be given by way of bonuses under this Bill for the encouragement of the iron industry, would be expended chiefly in the interests of an English syndicate. That statement was repudiated by the Minister of Trade and Customs, who said that, as a matter of fact, all the money required for the works would be raised in Australia. During the interval I have had an opportunity to examine the evidence given before the Royal Commission on the Bonuses for Manufactures Bill, and find that my statement was absolutely correct. I do not propose to read Mr. Darby's report bearing on this point unless it is the desire of the House that I should do so; but I am in receipt of a copy of the Trustees and Investors' Review for August, in which reference is made to this very question. It clearly shows that this money is not going to be raised in Australia, but will really benefit an English syndicate. I specially commend the article to those who hold opinions similar to those entertained by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. The Trustees and Investors' Review is published purely in the interests of financiers, and those having funds to invest; it regards such schemes as this purely from a commercial stand-point, and it is, therefore, interesting to note that in dealing with this question it sets forth that—

The evidence of Mr. Jamieson shows that the deposit was thoroughly examined by an English expert, Mr. Darby, managing director of the Brymbo Steel Works, in England, who reported on behalf of English capitalists—who were prepared to find capital for establishing iron and steel works if the inquiry proved satisfactory.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Who is the author of the article?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I can only say that this is a well-known publication. The article continues—

Mr. Darby's report evidently satisfied his principals—

Not his Australian principals, but English principals who sent him to Australia in their interests, and paid his expenses—as, according to Mr. Jamieson's evidence, they were prepared to find capital to the extent of £1,100,000, provided the bonus named in the Bill were provided, or a 15 per cent. duty were imposed. The evidence of Mr. Jamieson proved beyond a doubt that the industry can be established by the encouragement proposed if other intolerable conditions are not imposed.

I call the attention of honorable members to the concluding words of the last sentence, and propose later on to show that the "other intolerable conditions" to which the writer refers are really the socialistic provisions of this Bill. I venture to assert that if those provisions be passed, English capitalists will not be prepared to invest their money in the industry. They will not be prepared to make an investment which it is said by the advocates of this bonus will be attended with such beneficial results to the workers of Australia. It must be remembered that such publications as the Trustees and Investors' Review are issued with the object of influencing investors, and that statements appearing in them must, from a financial point of view, bear some semblance of authority. In the opinion of the writer of the article from which I have quoted, the passing of the socialistic provisions of this Bill will have a very injurious effect upon British investors. We must recognise, apart from the statement of the writer himself, that such must be the case. If such stringent conditions are imposed, English capitalists will not even touch the scheme.

MR. CHANTER.—What were Mr. Darby's objections?

MR. JOHNSON.—I am perfectly willing to read Mr. Darby's report if honorable members desire me to do so. I have refrained from quoting it, simply because I do not wish to occupy too much of the time of the House, and because, also, of my desire to carry out an implied promise to the Prime Minister that in view of the concession which he extended to me last night in allowing the debate to be adjourned, I should curtail my remarks as much as possible. I certainly intend to do so if I am permitted to proceed without undue interruption. When dealing with this Bill on Tuesday evening, I referred to one aspect of it which, to my mind, is a very serious one. I pointed out that although it is proposed that the payment of the bonuses under the Bill shall be limited to a certain period, we have the evidence of those who expect to reap the benefit of the bonus system that at the expiration of that period, they will ask either for the continuance of the system, or for the imposition of a duty. It will thus be seen that the Bill before us involves something more than an expenditure of £250,000. It means either the continuance of the bonus system after the time limit fixed by the Bill has expired, or the imposition of a higher duty. I have already quoted evidence in support of this contention. I have shown that Mr. Sandford and others stated, when before the Commission, that if the bonus system were not continued for a further period, or an equivalent duty imposed, the industry would have to be abandoned. That being the case, we are simply asked to throw away £250,000. In any event, that must be the result of the passing of this measure, because the Commonwealth itself will not derive a benefit, even to the extent of one farthing, from the proposed expenditure. Every penny will go to the enrichment of a private syndicate. There is no getting away from that fact. We may seek to gloss it over as we will, but the bald truth remains that this expenditure will serve no national or public purpose, and is designed solely for private gain. If honorable members turn to page 52 of the report of the Royal Commission, they will find what Mr. Jamieson said would be the position when the bonuses provided for in this Bill cease. He was asked by Mr. Winter Cooke—

Why do you want protection if things are still coming all the same?

It is a very material point that notwithstanding that bonuses are to be given for the encouragement of the iron industry, iron manufactures are to come in as before. Mr. Jamieson admitted that for years to come, many iron products in the form of manufactures will continue to be imported. Let me read some further questions which were put to him on the point—1079. The duty you ask for is merely an estimate?—Yes.

1080. Then it may be found that this guesswork of 12½ or 15 per cent. is not sufficient?—I would not call it mere guesswork. Men, before they were prepared to put down their money, sent out an experienced man to get the necessary data. That gentleman was introduced to this country merely as a nominee of others at home. We had the paying of his accounts, but he was nominated by those at home as the man who could give them the best opinion.

1081. We are aware that the estimate was carefully made; but, the industry having been established, if the estimate were proved to be wrong, what would happen—an application for more duty?—In going into a business of this description, or any new business, you cannot make a dead certainty; you have to run risks. What you mean is that there is a possibility we might ask for more duty.

1082. That has been the experience in Victoria, at all events?—That may be; but I cannot look into the future.

1083. That is a danger I wish to point out?—Then the best thing would be to make the duty 20 per cent. at once.

So that the voracious promoters of this syndicate want not only a bonus but concurrently a protective duty of 20 per cent. The protectionists who support this proposal, in the belief that it will immediately benefit the local manufacturers of iron and steel goods, will be greatly deceived.

Mr. FULLER.—I desire to call attention to the state of the House. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. JOHNSON.—In this connexion I should like to read the following evidence—

1075. How long do you think it would take before the company would be able to supply Australia with all the iron required?—We should expect to be able to supply half, or perhaps a little less than half, within two or three years from the time the works were finished.

1076. In the meantime, in regard to the other half, the consumer would be paying more for his iron than he would pay if there was no duty?

Mr. Jamieson fenced that question. He replied—

I would not say that. I should not think that he would. It is rather an intricate business.

He went on to say—

We propose to produce only certain classes, such as pig-iron and steel rails. All other classes of machinery, or special finished articles, will very likely be made abroad for many years to come.

Mr. FULLER.—I desire to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that there is not a quorum present in the Chamber. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. JOHNSON.—I wish now to deal with the question of the cost of production, and I think that I shall save time by at once directing the attention of honorable members to the evidence taken by the Royal Commission on the point. It is worthy of note that Mr. Jamieson, who was questioned very closely in regard to this matter, displayed great unwillingness to give the Commission any information about it.

Mr. FULLER.—I desire to draw attention to the state of the House. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. JOHNSON.—The other night I stated that Mr. Sandford has estimated the cost of producing iron in Australia at something under 35s. per ton; but, as doubt was cast on that statement, I shall read his evidence on that subject.

Mr. FULLER.—I desire to draw attention to the state of the House. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. JOHNSON. — This is what Mr. Sandford said in reply to question 1126—

Mr. FULLER.—I desire to again draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the state of the House. There are not twenty-five members present.

Mr. SPEAKER.—There are twenty-five, including myself.

Mr. JOHNSON. — Mr. Sandford was asked if he had formed any estimate as to the cost of producing iron at Lithgow, and he replied that he had.

Mr. FULLER.—I call attention to the state of the House. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. JOHNSON.—Mr. Sandford was then asked question 1127—

Are you prepared to reply to a question as to what your estimate of the cost is?

To that question he replied—

Yes, I am. After supplying modern blast furnaces, thoroughly well equipped, and every necessary appliance, from material already secured in the shape of the iron ore, coal, and limestone, pig-iron could be produced at Lithgow for under 35s. per ton.

Mr. FULLER. — I call attention to the state of the House. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have already said that this estimate took into account the fact that Australian labour is dearer than that employed in connexion with the manufacture of imported iron. Let me read some more of Mr. Sandford's evidence—

1128. That, of course, would be a rate which would enable you to compete with foreign competition?—Yes. I may say that I formed my judgment in part from the action taken by a member of the Commission when Minister for Mines in New South Wales, in appointing Mr. Jacquet to inquire into the question. Mr. Joseph Cook has, in my opinion, done as much or more than any other man in New South Wales in connexion with this matter by appointing an expert like Mr. Jacquet to see what we have in Australia. Mr. Jacquet's conclusions were confirmed by Mr. Enoch James, and I may say that when Mr. Enoch James was here we had over a dozen applications outside of known properties from people willing to supply us with ore, showing that the industry only wants to be set going for the manufacture of pig-iron, to have a number of works started in Australia. The best thing ever done for the iron industry of Australia was what was done by Mr. Joseph Cook. It was action anticipating the next best thing to do, and it was done.

1129. By Mr. McCay.—I am not quite sure that I understand what you mean when you say that pig-iron could be produced at Lithgow for under 35s. per ton. Is that taking everything into account?—I give that as an estimate of the net cost at Lithgow.

Mr. MAUGER.—We have read all this.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am reading it for the information of those who have not done so. The honorable member does not wish to hear it, because it breaks down his case. This evidence is of importance as showing that there is no justification for granting a bonus of even one penny. I propose to quote the evidence of experts on this head, whether the honorable member wishes to hear it or not. Mr. Sandford was asked, in regard to his estimate—

Is that taking everything into account?

To which he replied—

I give that as an estimate of the net cost at Lithgow.

When I stated the other night that that estimate had been given by Mr. Sandford, the Minister of Trade and Customs said that it was incorrect, because it had been framed on a wrong basis, and that it did not agree with the estimate of Mr. Sandford's manager.

Mr. MAUGER.—Mr. Sandford himself has contradicted that statement.

Mr. JOHNSON.—He cannot contradict his sworn evidence given before the Commission, and repeated time after time. Mr. Sandford did not rely entirely upon his own calculations, but, at the cost of £1,000, enlisted the services of Mr. Enoch James, an eminent expert in such matters, who made a most minute investigation of the whole subject. It was upon the results of his calculations that Mr. Sandford based his estimates.

Mr. MAUGER.—On several occasions Mr. Sandford has qualified his original statement.

Mr. JOHNSON.—We cannot go behind his sworn evidence before the Royal Commission, which is based upon the calculations made by Mr. Enoch James.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member, of course, knows that the price quoted by Mr. Sandford was net, and that other charges, which he has given in detail, brings the actual cost up to 6s. per ton.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Why was not that stated at the time? Mr. Sandford had many opportunities to amplify his original statement, and we are justified in assuming that he put forward his case in the most favorable light possible.

Mr. McCAY.—Mr. Sandford was in a state of high excitement when he gave the answer to which the honorable member is referring. He certainly was not as collected as a witness ought to be who was giving important evidence of that kind.

Mr. JOHNSON.—But Mr. Sandford's estimate was based upon the calculations made by Mr. Enoch James, and it cannot be urged that Mr. James, as well as Mr. Sandford, was excited. Mr. Sandford cannot shelter himself behind any such excuse now that he finds that the estimate he put forward is not serving his purpose.

Mr. MAUGER.—Surely the honorable member would not take advantage of an admitted mistake.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I take my stand on the evidence given before the Commission.

Mr. GROOM.—Yes, but surely the honorable member will accept Mr. Sandford's statement that he made a mistake.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have never seen any denial by Mr. Sandford of his first estimate.

Mr. CHANTER.—He has published it in the press.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Even allowing that a mistake may have been made, there would still be sufficient margin of profit to the local manufacturer. We know perfectly well that when gentlemen engaged in commercial enterprises, such as that contemplated under the Bill, see an opportunity of obtaining a present of a large sum of money for which they are not expected to give anything in return, they will do everything in their power to improve their chances. I do not blame them, but I think the conduct of the representatives of the people who are prepared to give them such a present is in the last degree reprehensible.

Mr. FULLER.—I desire to direct attention to the State of the House. (Quorum formed.)

Mr. JOHNSON.—I desire to make a comparison between the cost of production of pig iron in New South Wales, and the price of the imported product. According to Mr. Jamieson, imported pig iron costs from £3 15s. to £5 5s. per ton—the price varies—and, according to Mr. W. A. Robertson, the cost ranges from £4 10s. to £5 5s. per ton, and if those prices be correct, a very large margin of natural protection would be enjoyed by the local manufacturer.

Mr. FULLER.—I desire to call attention to the state of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. — There is a quorum present; the honorable member may proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON. — Mr. Sandford estimates that pig iron can be produced at Lithgow for £1 15s. per ton. If the freight to Sydney, 10s. 6d. per ton, be added to that price, the cost landed in Sydney will amount to £2 5s. 6d. That price compared with the cost of imported pig iron would give the local manufacturer an advantage of £2 4s. 6d. per ton, which would amount to protection at the rate of over 50 per cent. Surely that ought to be sufficient to encourage any local manufacturer. The truth of the matter is that the bonus is looked upon in the light of a present. That is shown by the evidence given by Mr. W. A. Robertson, who at page 138 of the report of the Commission, question 2895, was asked—2895. If you got a bonus, you would still want a duty?—Now that the bonus has been offered, we should certainly desire it. To ask us now to do without a bonus would be like offering a man a present and then taking it away.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is merely verbiage.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That statement bears out my contention that this bonus is regarded as a present. Honorable members are practically proposing to make a present of £250,000 of the taxpayers' money to an English syndicate. For what purpose? To benefit Australia? Not in the slightest degree. The payment of that money to the proposed company would not benefit a single man, woman, or child in Australia. It will swell the profits of a rich English syndicate, which, on the face of the evidence of their own experts, have a splendid property from which they could derive high returns without the assistance of any grant from the Commonwealth. There is a very peculiar feature about the shares in this company. We find that they have practically no market value at present. They are supposed to be worth 2s. 6d. each, but it is expected that, if the bonus be granted, their value will be increased to £1 each. I do not propose to deal with this aspect of the matter at any greater length, because the ground has already been covered by the honorable member for New England. I wish now to refer to some of the provisions of the Bill. Clause 4 reads as follows:—

Where the rate of bounty is fixed on the value of the goods, their value shall be taken to be the same as the value of imported goods of the like kind and quality as ascertained for the purposes of Customs duties.

This clause will require to be very carefully considered, because we must not have a repetition of the experience through which we have passed in connexion with the imported harvesters, the values of which were artificially inflated by the Minister on the recommendation of his officers.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The honorable member knows that the Minister had very good authority for his action.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I know that neither the Minister nor his officers had any warrant for what they did, on the evidence of the papers in the case laid on the library table, and we should be careful not to leave the door open for similar action on their part in regard to the valuation of imported iron goods. Clauses 5 and 6 read as follows:—

The total amount of the bounties authorized to be paid in respect of any particular class of goods shall not exceed the amount set out in the third column of the schedule opposite the description of that class of goods.

No bounty shall be authorized to be paid on—

- (a) Pig-iron, puddled bar-iron, or steel, made after the first day of January, One thousand nine hundred and eleven;
- (b) Galvanized iron, wire netting, or iron or steel pipes or tubes, made after the first day of January, One thousand nine hundred and nine;
- (c) Reapers and binders made after the first day of July, One thousand nine hundred and seven.

I have already pointed out that the evidence of men who are interested in the establishment of this industry shows the absolute farce of imposing a time limit within which the bonus shall operate. We know perfectly well that when the bonus is about to expire, an agitation will be raised for its continuance, in order to protect what will be termed a "languishing" industry. Is not that the experience of every enterprise which has received artificial aid from the Treasury? Is it not our own experience in connexion with the sugar bounty? In that connexion, do we not find that long before the period during which the bounty is to operate has expired, an agitation has been created for its continuance, and did not the Government indicate in the Treasurer's Budget speech that they intend to make provision upon the Estimates for an extension of that period? What has happened in the case of the sugar bounty will occur in the case of the iron bonus. It is a perfect farce to insert a clause of that character when we know perfectly well, from the evidence of the very men who will receive this bonus, that it will require to be continued.

Mr. SALMON.—That did not happen in Victoria.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable member must know that we are being asked to pass a provision which the evidence before the Iron Bonus Commission shows will not have the desired effect. Where, I ask, is this system of bonuses going to end? Only last session, the present Minister of Home Affairs proposed that a bonus should be granted to the cotton industry. Thus we shall establish a precedent for supporting any industry which likes to set up a claim for adventitious aid. I say that if we are going to grant a bonus to any industry we must grant bonuses to all. Why should we favour one industry at the expense of others? It is a scandal and a perversion of the powers of Legislature to convert public money to purposes of this kind. Coming to clause 8, I find it provides that—

All bounties in respect of pig-iron, puddled bar-iron, or steel, shall be granted on the condition that the manufacturer shall, if required, transfer as hereinafter provided the land*, buildings, plant, machinery, appliances, and material used in the manufacture of the goods.

There we see the first indication of an attempt on the part of the Government to bend its will to the socialistic ideas of its supporters in the Ministerial corner. That is amplified in the next clause, which states that—

The person claiming any bounty shall, before receiving the same or the first instalment thereof, give his bond to the Commonwealth, in the sum of the aggregate amount of bounty which he may thereafter receive (hereinafter called the secured amount), conditioned to be void if he fulfils all the following conditions:—

- (a) to pay to the workmen and employes employed in the manufacture of the goods the rate of wages fixed as hereinafter provided, or, if no rate is so fixed, the highest wages usually paid in the State to workmen and employes doing similar work; and

Mr. FULLER.—I beg to call attention to the state of the House.

Mr. CROUCH.—Upon a point of order, may I direct your attention, sir, to standing order No. 59, which provides that any member who is guilty of persistently and wilfully obstructing the business of the House shall be dealt with in a certain way. I submit that the honorable and learned member for Illawarra, by calling attention to the state of the House so frequently, without cause, is obstructing the business of the Chamber. He has called attention to the state of the House when there is a quorum present, and I submit that it is time for you to take action.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable and learned member for Illawarra calls attention to the state of the House when there is no quorum present there is no more to be said, but I hope that he will not again call attention to the state of the House when there is a quorum present, and so interrupt business in so serious a way as he has done.

Mr. FULLER.—I object entirely, sir, to your statement that I am acting in the way that you suggest.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable and learned member rise to a point of order?

Mr. FULLER.—Yes; I submit that I am entitled, as a member of the House, to call attention to the state of the House at any time I think fit.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable and learned member is entitled to call attention to the state of the House when he has reason to believe that there is not a quorum present. But he has again and again called attention to it when a quorum has been present. If the honorable member, who is addressing the Chair is to be continually interrupted by the honorable and learned member calling attention to the state of the House, and necessitating a count of the House, I think he will admit that he is committing a breach of the orders which affect the conduct of business.

Mr. FULLER.—I submit that upon the six or seven occasions when I called attention to the state of the House, you, sir, have ordered the bells to be rung.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable and learned member desires to raise a point of order he is at liberty to do so. If he desires to dissent from my ruling, he is at liberty to move in that direction. But otherwise I must ask the honorable member for Lang to proceed with his speech.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I venture to say that paragraph a of clause 9 contains the only good feature which is to be found in this Bill. I refer to the attempt which is being made to preserve a high rate of wages. But, unfortunately for the possible success of the measure, that very clause is one of those which will operate prejudicially to the successful flotation of this company upon the London market, that is, if the writer in the Trustees and Investors' Review is correct in his surmise. In referring to this measure he says—

The new provisions in the Bill are evidently for the encouragement of manufacture by a State as against private enterprise. It cannot be expected that capitalists will look at the industry which is not to be under their control, but under the control of the President of the Commonwealth Court of Conciliation. The Government evidently regard themselves as partners in the business by providing a bonus, and desire to actively interfere in the management. The fixing of wages by the Arbitration Court is no new power, it already exists in case of dispute between employer and employé, where unions are formed. The fixing of prices, at which the manufactured article is to be sold, however, is an unnecessary and undue interference in the business, particularly as no steps have been taken to secure the home market.

So that the view taken by an expert financial writer is that capitalists will not feel very keen about investing their money in this particular venture if socialistic restrictions and conditions are embodied in the Bill. Clause 9 continues—

Neither directly nor indirectly to sell or cause to be sold any of the goods in respect of which bounty is paid at a price higher than that fixed as hereinafter provided; and

(c) in the case of a bounty in respect of pig-iron, puddled bar-iron, or steel, to transfer to the State in which the goods are manufactured all lands, buildings, premises, machinery, plant, and equipment of any kind, used in or in connexion with the manufacture of the goods, if so required by the Governor of the State, within months after the date of expiry of the bounty with respect to that class of goods; such transfer to be in consideration of fair compensation for the property transferred, to be assessed, in case of dispute, by the President of the Commonwealth Court of Conciliation and Arbitration, whose determination shall be final and conclusive, and without appeal.

I submit that that is a most extraordinary provision. We are asked in the first place to make a free grant of £250,000 to this English syndicate, and within six months after the bonus has expired—not during its continuance—the Government may purchase the property which has been established as the result of the Commonwealth Government subsidy.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It is quite optional whether we do that or not.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The State Government may purchase the industry if it is required by the State. The State is to pay compensation, so that the taxpayer will again be called upon to hand over a large additional sum of money to this already heavily subsidized English syndicate. I say that the proposal is monstrous and utterly indefensible.

Mr. FULLER.—I desire to call attention to the state of the House. There is no quorum present now. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. JOHNSON.—Further, I find that the President of the Conciliation and Arbitration Court is to be the sole judge of the amount of compensation which is to be paid. I do not wish to dwell upon this point, because it has been amplified by the leader of the Opposition, and by the honorable member for New England. I merely wish to say that to me it appears extraordinary that no provision is made for expert evidence upon which to base a valuation. The President of the Arbitration Court is to be the sole arbiter. I think that we are asking too much of His Honor when we expect him to be familiar with all the details of such an immense industry as this. Clause 10 provides—

The Minister may at any time, but not oftener than once in six months, refer to the Commonwealth Court of Conciliation and Arbitration the question of fair wages to be paid, or fair price to be charged, as in the last preceding section mentioned; and his determination shall be final and conclusive, and without appeal.

The President of the Arbitration Court is to be placed in a position which I think he cannot reasonably be expected to occupy without provision being made for expert assistance. There are other clauses in the Bill which, under other circumstances, I should criticise, but upon which I shall defer comment until the measure reaches the Committee stage, when I propose to offer the strongest opposition to the Bill. Before resuming my seat, I wish to read two or three clauses from a report signed by six members of the Royal Commission on the evidence submitted. As the House is aware, there were twelve members of this Commission, and six reported in favour of the bonus system, and six against it, the only difference being that the Chairman was among those who signed the report in favour of the Government proposal. As a protectionist he gave his casting vote in support of the bonus system. I have no objection to offer to the adoption of that course by the right honorable gentleman in question. No doubt he formed his conclusion on the evidence submitted to the Commission, but, amongst those who signed the dissenting report, was the leader of the Labour Party, who is a protectionist.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable member will find the name of a free-trader appended to the majority report.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am aware that the late Sir Edward Braddon signed that report, but the position is not materially affected by that fact. Paragraph 3 of the dissenting report reads as follows:—

The Bill provides for the payment of £324,000—

The Bill now before us provides for the payment of only £304,000, a sum of £20,000 having been deducted in respect of the bonus originally proposed to be paid for the production of spelter—of the people's money to private individuals engaged in an enterprise for their private gain.

For their private gain be it understood—

There can be no guarantee that the bonuses proposed would permanently establish the industry, though it is probable the inducements offered might be instrumental in forming speculative companies.

4. One of the witnesses, Mr. Sandford, managing director of the Eskbank Iron Works, New South Wales, stated that he had made an agreement with an English syndicate to spend £250,000 in extending the Lithgow works if the Bill passed.

Honorable members will observe that that is just about the amount proposed to be given by way of bonuses for the establishment of the iron industry—

In answer to another question, Mr. Sandford said that to make pig-iron he wanted a plant involving an expenditure of from £100,000 to £125,000. This estimate is less than half the sum proposed to be paid in bonuses.

In other words, it is proposed that the Commonwealth Parliament shall agree to the payment of bonuses aggregating twice the amount to be expended in the direction of plant and buildings.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Mr. Sandford has a large plant at Lithgow at the present time.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am aware of that, but the English syndicate will in all probability so arrange matters that he will not derive much benefit from this measure. I shall now read what the report has to say as to the experience of Canada in this regard. But for the promise I gave the Prime Minister last night, that I would curtail my remarks, I should have dealt fully with the experience of Canada in connexion with the bonus system but in the circumstances, shall do no more than refer to what the report has to say on this phase of the question—

The Canadian experience is not encouraging. The bonus system for iron production was first instituted there in 1883. Subsequently a Bill was passed, in 1897, further continuing the system.

The payment of the bonuses was limited to a certain period, but at its expiration a demand was made for the continuance of the system. We may expect the same thing to happen in Australia, if this Bill be carried—

Another Bill was carried in 1899 providing for the diminution of the bounties by a sliding scale expiring in 1907. In July of this year the Dominion Government decided to postpone the operation of this sliding scale for one year, which practically means a further increase in the bounties paid.

I think that it is our duty to carefully consider the statements made in this report, based as they are upon evidence submitted to the Commission. We have a right to ask ourselves whether the experience of Canada is not likely to be the experience of Australia? Do we not know that, as a matter of fact, it will be our experience, if we pass this Bill?

Mr. STORRER.—How do we know anything of the kind?

Mr. JOHNSON.—We know that it is only human nature for one to seek to get as much as possible at all times. When there is a chance of gaining more by simply asking for it, these people are not likely to remain in the background. In clause 6 of the report, we have the following statement:—

Nearly all the witnesses examined before the Commission agreed that the payment of bonuses would be useless unless followed by a duty. Experience shows that if the payment of bonuses be commenced the liability of the Commonwealth will not be limited to the sum proposed under the Bill, but that further Government aid will be sought.

This bears out what I have contended from the first. Paragraph 7 reads—

The evidence failed to show that there was any commercial necessity for the bonuses proposed. Mr. Sandford said he could produce pig iron at Lithgow under 35s. a ton. Allowing for freight to Sydney, Melbourne, and other parts of the Commonwealth, he could, on this showing, compete favorably with any imported pig iron. Other witnesses, who, however, had less experience than Mr. Sandford, doubted the correctness of his estimate of cost.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member is quoting from the report signed by those who are opposed to the principle.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am quoting from a report which was signed by the leader of the Labour Party, a prominent protectionist, amongst others.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The minority report.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It cannot truthfully be called a minority report when it is signed by six of the twelve members of the Commission. The report continues—

But, on the supposition of his having made an under estimate, he would still, even without a bonus, be in an excellent position as compared with the imported commodity.

I have already shown that this is the position by comparing the price quoted by experts with that which was submitted even on the amended basis of 61s. per ton. Clause 8 of the report reads—

No effort was made to bring forward witnesses against the Bill. Notwithstanding that fact, the evidence given failed to establish a case in its favour. Several witnesses thought the establishment of ironworks in the Commonwealth premature, and much of the evidence was strongly against any attempt by the Government to establish the iron industry by the payment of bonuses. It will thus be seen that the case for the granting of bonuses broke down on the evidence, not of those who were opposed to the principle, but of those who favored it, and came forward to give reasons for its adoption. I desire to say, in conclusion, that I regard this Bill as a most impudent and barefaced attempt to use the public Treasury for the purpose of enriching a private syndicate. I shall use every legitimate means in my power to oppose the Bill line by line when it reaches the Committee stage. It is really one of those measures that ought to be submitted to a Select Committee. I do not know whether the Government are prepared to adopt that course, but they certainly ought to do so. There are many other points with which I had originally intended to deal, but, in compliance with the promise I made to the Prime Minister last night that I should endeavour to complete my speech within an hour, I do not propose to further discuss the question at the present stage. I have only to repeat that I shall do all that I can to oppose the granting of these bonuses, when the Bill reaches the Committee stage.

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra).—In view of the fact that it is now 10.15 p.m., I think it only reasonable to ask the Government to agree to the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Not yet.

Mr. FULLER.—Then I am prepared to proceed. In submitting the Bill to the House the Minister of Trade and Customs said he was not responsible for its drafting. We know that it was prepared by the Government draftsman, but we must certainly hold the Minister responsible for the principles which it embodies.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — Hear, hear—and very good principles they are.

Mr. FULLER. — They might be very good principles if they were dealt with in separate measures, but they have been crowded into one Bill for a special purpose. The Bill is really a double-barrelled one. In the first place, it provides for the granting of bonuses—the desire of the Government being to placate those who, like the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, are staunch protectionists, and believe in the system—while in the second it embodies certain conditions as to the ultimate nationalization of the industry that are calculated to satisfy the socialistic party and their supporters. I should like to point out to the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, who approves of this Bill, that when we were discussing it twelve or eighteen months ago, he asserted that he was in favour of the nationalization of the iron industry of Australia.

Mr. MAUGER.—I am now, if I can secure its nationalization.

Mr. FULLER.—My strong objection to the Bill is that the Ministry, who are now the servile and subservient supporters of the socialistic party in this House, have not only made provision for the payment of bonuses, but have inserted certain clauses in the Bill for the nationalization of the industry, in order to meet the wishes of that party. Notwithstanding the strong way in which he spoke on this matter some time ago, the Prime Minister, who is now the slave of those on the cross benches, has provided in clause 9 for the nationalization of the industry. Why has he not made a straightforward proposal in that direction, if he believes in this step?

Mr. MAUGER.—I made the same proposal three years ago, when the first Bill was before this House.

Mr. FULLER.—If the honorable member believes in the nationalization of the industry, why does he not insist upon the Ministry proposing it straight out? I believe in neither the granting of a bonus nor the nationalization of the industry, but if I were compelled to vote for one of the two I would vote for the latter. What I say now is exactly on all-fours with what I said when the measure was last before the House.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable and learned member's leader once declared for the granting of bonuses.

Mr. FULLER.—I am not to be intimidated by that statement. I speak on my own responsibility, and stand here as an independent member, to represent the interests of my constituents. That has been my attitude ever since I entered the House. Provision is made for the resumption, under the order of the Governor of a State, of the ironworks which may be successfully established by means of the bonus. That will be a nice little business for Mr. Justice O'Connor, as President of the Arbitration Court of Australia, to adjust, though whether he will be able to give satisfaction to those connected with the industry, and to convince the members of this Parliament that the arrangement is in the interests of the Commonwealth, is a question which can be answered only in the future. In inserting this provision in the Bill, the Government are showing a most servile obedience to the cross benches, the like of which has never been shown by any previous Administration which has held office in Australia. The Barton Administration, in which some of the members of this Government were Ministers, afforded us instances of subservience and servility, but their "Yes, Mr. Watson," was a small thing to the "Yes, Mr. Watson" of this Government in connexion with the Bill now before us. Those who had the honour to be members of the Iron Bonus Commission know the strong opposition which was shown by the leader of the Labour Party to the granting of a bonus to private persons.

Mr. MAUGER.—They also know the strong position taken in regard to the matter by the first Minister of Trade and Customs, who is as great a radical as there is in Australia.

Mr. FULLER.—He was so strong a radical in connexion with this matter, so strong a believer in the principle of one man one vote, that he himself took two votes in order that a favorable report might be published.

Mr. MAUGER.—He used his casting vote as chairman. It was the only thing he could do.

Mr. FULLER.—The members of the Commission numbered twelve, including the chairman, six being in favour of the granting of the bonus, and six being against it, and the result of the action of this great radical in exercising his right to cast two votes, while his fellow members had only one, was that he was able to present a majority report in favour of the granting of bonuses.

Mr. MAUGER.—What was the chairman for, if not for that purpose? What is the good of a chairman if he is not to have a casting vote?

Mr. FULLER.—I have too high an opinion of the right honorable member for Adelaide to think that he would consent to act in that way to carry out the wishes of others, and it was an insult for the honorable member to say of him, "What is the use of a man being chairman of a Commission if he will not do this sort of thing to suit his party?"

Mr. MAUGER.—I did not say anything like that.

Mr. FULLER.—That is what the honorable member insinuated.

Mr. MAUGER.—No.

Mr. FULLER.—Then, I withdraw my remark. I opposed this proposal when it was previously before the House, and I do not intend to reiterate the arguments which I then used. They are on record in Hansard, and I am prepared to stand by them; but I was very much struck on that occasion by a remarkable statement which was made by an honorable member of the Labour Party, to whose word I attach a good deal of weight—the honorable member for Darling. In speaking in opposition to the Manufactures Encouragement Bill, then before the House, the honorable member used the following expressions, which are to be found recorded at page 13532 of the Hansard of the first session—

I am satisfied that if we leave the production of iron to private enterprise our action will result in the establishment of a monopoly, and all monopolies are bad.

No attempt was made to refute the arguments used by the honorable member. He further stated—

I shall never be found voting the money of the taxpayers of Australia for the boosting of a private firm to enable it to pay enormous dividends.

I should like to direct the attention of every honorable member to that statement. Setting on one side the clauses of the Bill relating to the nationalization of the industry, are not the whole of its provisions intended to hand over the money of the taxpayers to a private firm, to enable it to establish a monopoly in Australia, and to pay huge dividends at the expense of the Commonwealth? If that it not its object, I should like the Minister in charge of the Bill to explain what it is. I think that the Minister in charge of the Bill should be present.

Mr. KELLY.—I rise to a point of order. I think that a larger number of honorable members should be present. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. FULLER.—I was referring to the fact that the Minister in charge of this Bill is not present, and I was also about to express my regret that the leader of the Labour Party is also absent. No one is more sorry than I am that ill-health should prevent the honorable member for Bland from attending here, and no one more cordially wishes to see him restored to his usual robust health and back in his old place. At the same time, when an important matter of public policy is being launched we are entitled to know what the great Labour Party intends to do, and to expect that the deputy leader of that party will make a pronouncement.

Mr. THOMAS.—What is the difference between giving a bonus here and granting it to a shipping company?

Mr. FULLER.—So far as I am personally concerned, I have never been a party to granting a bonus to a shipping company. I understand, however, that the honorable member for Barrier and the honorable member for Melbourne Ports are both prepared to support the extension of the period over which the sugar bonuses are to be paid.

Mr. MAUGER.—I am.

Mr. FULLER.—Then I stand in direct opposition to the honorable member, because I shall vote directly against any such proposal. I would ask the honorable member for Barrier whether he intends to vote for this measure, which is designed to put money into the pockets of private speculators, or whether he is in favour of nationalizing the industry?

Mr. THOMAS.—I believe in nationalizing the industry.

Mr. FULLER.—I presume that there is not a man in this country who would not desire to see the iron industry established in our midst, but there are the strongest possible objections to the granting of a bonus under the conditions now proposed. I had the honour of taking part in the inquiry conducted by the Iron Bonus Commission, and, in common with my colleagues on that Commission, I gained a large amount of knowledge, such as would not be available to honorable members in the ordinary course of their experience. I venture to say that, however clever a man may be, he cannot when reading over evidence in connexion with a technical matter such as this, form anything like a correct idea of its value without having seen the witnesses. A large mass of evidence was taken by the Commission, the value of which no honorable member of this House—apart from those who had the honour of being Commissioners—and no man in this country, can accurately estimate. In cold type that evidence conveys a very different impression from that which was left upon the minds of the Commissioners when it was given by the witnesses who appeared before them. What I am now saying applies equally to the testimony taken before any Commission. We all know what human nature is. I believe that if this Bill be passed, a great injustice will be done to the taxpayers of Australia, because a few private individuals will be afforded an opportunity of dipping their hands deeply into the public purse. Yet, when this important matter is under consideration, we find that Ministers are absent from the Chamber, and that honorable members occupying the corner benches are practically silent. To-night, I had repeatedly to call attention to the state of the House. Even when a Bill of this character, involving as it does, an expenditure of £324,000, is under consideration, we find that the Government are unable to keep a quorum. Such a condition of affairs is absolutely disgraceful. It is no wonder that the people of Australia decry Commonwealth politics, and declare that Federation has been a failure. To-day, from one end of the Continent to the other, we hear complaints in reference to the Commonwealth Government and Federal politics. It is because Ministers flout this House and the country, and because honorable members upon the cross benches are content to allow the Government to do as they like in matters of this kind, that there is such a public outcry. At the present time, the names of some of our leading politicians are a by-word throughout Australia. I have spoken strongly, because I feel strongly. In introducing this Bill the other day, the Minister of Trade and Customs said that there was no necessity for him to speak at length, seeing that he had already made two speeches upon the measure. Evidently he forgets that since he made those speeches a Royal Commission has exhaustively investigated this question. The Minister, however, during the course of his remarks, made only one reference to the labours of that body. He stated that Mr. Jamieson, in his evidence, declared that the industry, if established, would provide employment for 3,000 men. I have looked through the official report of the evidence, and I fail to find that he made any statement of that character. The Minister further declared that Mr. Carson—I do not know who he is—stated that if the bonuses were granted, instead of employment being found for 3,000 men, work would be provided for 10,000 or 13,000 hands. Honorable members can search the whole of Mr. Jamieson's evidence, but they will fail to discover any statement of the kind attributed to him by the Minister. The fact is that the honorable gentleman endeavoured to bolster up this business in the same way that the honorable member for Riverina attempted to bolster it up the other night. He talked about the 3,000 men who would be engaged in the industry if a bonus were granted upon the production of pig iron. He said that it would lead to the establishment of a flourishing industry; but he failed to produce a single particle of evidence in support of his statement.

Mr. CHANTER.—Because I wanted to save time and get on with the business.

Mr. FULLER.—That is a very convenient method of saving time. The sworn evidence of witnesses before the Commission is in absolute contradiction to the statement of the honorable member.

Mr. CHANTER.—Let us pass the second reading of the Bill, and in Committee I will produce my authority for the statement which I made.

Mr. FULLER.—I do not propose to allow this Bill to pass its second reading if I can prevent it. Why does the honorable member wish the measure to get into Committee? Simply because it will please his protectionist friends. If it does reach the Committee stage, we shall find the Labour Party pressing the Government to nationalize the industry. Just as in New South Wales a few years ago, an endeavour was made to sneak in protection, so will an endeavour be made now by the Labour Party with the help of the Government to sneak in Socialism. I shall do my best to prevent them accomplishing their object.

Mr. POYNTON.—Did not the honorable and learned member vote in favour of nationalizing the industry?

Mr. FULLER.—I would vote any day for the nationalization of the industry in preference to the granting of the proposed bonuses. Honorable members of the Labour Party favour the nationalization of the industry, but are prepared to accept a miserable compromise in order to keep the Government in power. Why do they not stand to their guns? Why do not the Socialists who favour the nationalization of the iron industry, say straight out to the Prime Minister, "This industry must be nationalized. That is our belief, and the belief also of the people who have sent us here." The Prime Minister's socialistic education, however, is hardly so complete, as to allow of that being done. When the motion submitted by the honorable member for Barrier was before the House this afternoon, the honorable and learned gentleman showed that his socialistic education was not such as to allow him to support the ideals of the party to the extent that they desired. I am not blaming the Labour Party for the views which they hold. I honour them for the openness with which they proclaim them, but I certainly condemn them for proposing to support a Bill which, according to the statement of the leader of the party, and of the sworn evidence of Mr. Lamond, secretary of the Labour League in New South Wales, will simply produce a monopoly in Australia. That is a state of affairs which every member of the Labour Party professes a desire to avoid. It is because I believe that if these bonuses are given to a syndicate to establish the iron industry, we shall have a monopoly that will crush all industries—industries like Mort's Dock—dependent on cheap iron, that I am opposed to the Bill.

Mr. WATKINS.—Does the honorable member think that Mort's Dock is not something in the nature of a monopoly? What influence has prevented a dock from being made at Newcastle?

Mr. FULLER.—Perhaps the honorable member will tell me.

Mr. WATKINS.—It was the influence of the Mort's Dock people.

Mr. FULLER.—A request was made to the Government to build a dock at Newcastle, but it was refused. As a matter of fact, Mort's Dock was erected by private enterprise.

Mr. WATKINS.—But it has been fed by Government patronage.

Mr. FULLER.—It used to employ between 2,000 and 3,000 hands at wages as high as those obtaining in America, and nearly double those prevailing in England, What did the manager of that company, Mr. Franki, say in regard to the bonus proposals of the Government? In this connexion I shall quote, not something alleged by a Mr. Carson to have been uttered by Mr. Franki—a statement on which the Minister relied—but the sworn evidence of the man himself. Until recently Mort's Dock was a very prosperous company.

Mr. WILKS.—Until the advent of protection.

Mr. FULLER.—The company carries on its operations in the honorable member for Dalley's electorate, and, as he says, it was one of the most flourishing institutions in the State until the inauguration of a protective policy for Australia.

Mr. WATKINS.—It flourished on the loan expenditure of the State.

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable member knows nothing about the matter. Will he deny that Mr. Franki gave evidence before the Commission that a duty of 12s. 6d. per ton on pig iron would be outrageous?

Mr. WATKINS.—He certainly did make that statement.

Mr. FULLER.—That being so, I wish the honorable member to say what he thinks would be a fair duty to impose. The honorable member is silent. I take it that, like many others who propose to support the Bill, he is not prepared to say anything in regard to the payment of these bonuses. Together with those who think with him, he is ready to allow the Bill to pass in any form that the Government desire. Such a state of affairs is much to be regretted. I am satisfied that a number of honorable members of the Labour Party will vote against the Bill, while others, like the honorable member for Newcastle, will vote for it. In justice to his constituents, who are dependent upon the coal industry, the honorable member should hesitate to vote for the payment of bonuses that will benefit private speculators not in Australia, but in London. Why should we pass a Bill which will be the means, not of making our own people rich—not of putting money into the pockets of our taxpayers—but of giving persons in other parts of the world an opportunity to speculate? I object to the Bill from start to finish, and shall do my utmost to prevent its becoming law. The Commission, of which I was a member, took exhaustive evidence in Melbourne, Sydney, Lithgow, and Newcastle. We examined about thirty-five witnesses, and ultimately presented a majority and minority report. The majority report was affirmed by the casting vote of the right honorable member for Adelaide; but what I desire to draw attention—particularly of honorable members on the cross benches—to is the minority report signed by the six members of the Commission, whose names are attached. That minority report is signed by, amongst others, the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, who is one of the leading members of the Labour Party in this Parliament. The honorable and learned member has occupied high positions, not only in the Federal Parliament, but in the State Parliament of New South Wales, and no name stands higher than his in the party to which he belongs. For weeks past the honorable and learned member has been the intelligent representative of trade unions in the Arbitration Court of New South Wales. Some honorable members seem to think that there is no good in lawyers, but members of trade unions in New South Wales seem to think there is a lot of good in "Mr. Lawyer Hughes," who is now representing them so ably. The honorable and learned member is no ordinary man; he is the accredited representative of trade unions, and a leader of the Labour Party, and his name appears at the head of the list in opposition to the granting of a bonus to the iron industry. What does that mean? It means that the honorable and learned member, like his colleagues on the Commission, including the then honorable member for Kalgoorlie, Mr. Kirwan—

Mr. WATKINS.—How many meetings did Mr. Kirwan attend?

Mr. FULLER.—Then we have the name of the honorable member for Bland; does the honorable member for Newcastle wish to know how many meetings that honorable member attended?

Mr. WATKINS.—I know that he attended a good many.

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable member for Bland is the honoured leader of the Labour Party to-day, and, as a member of the Royal Commission, we find him in strong opposition to the granting of a bonus. Will the Labour Party sit quiet under these circumstances? We have not heard a single word from the cross benches in connexion with the matter. Has the honorable member for Bland gone away, and instructed his representative, the deputy leader of the party, to refrain from saying a word on his behalf? Has the honorable member for Bland, by reason of the extraordinary combination which resulted in placing the present Government on the Treasury bench, changed his ideas in regard to the report which he signed in common with us? The hour is late, and I again ask leave to continue my remarks on a future day.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is it the pleasure of honorable members that the honorable member shall resume his remarks on a later day?

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—I regret to say that, although we have been dealing for four or five sittings with the second reading of this Bill, we are making very slow progress, and that, in view of the business on the paper, it is impossible to accede to the honorable member's request. The honorable member has spoken for an hour, and we are able to afford any further time he thinks necessary. We have heard this report of the Commission read, and the comments of honorable members before; but if the honorable member thinks it necessary to repeat them, well and good. In the interests of business, we ask him to be good enough to condense his remarks, so that he may finish to-night.

Mr. FULLER.—I object to the Prime Minister saying to me that he has heard all this before. I do not care whether he has heard it before or not; he shall hear it again from me. The Prime Minister has been absent during the whole of the debate, and when he says he has heard all this before he is saying what is absolutely untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable and learned member must withdraw those words.

Mr. FULLER.—I withdraw the words, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure the Prime Minister will understand that I made the remark in the heat of argument.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I assure the honorable and learned member that I have heard the report and similar comments before.

Mr. FULLER.—Then I shall give the Prime Minister an opportunity of hearing them from me as a member of the Royal Commission; and probably the honorable gentleman may, after hearing me, be inclined to change his mind.

Mr. MAUGER.—How much time does the honorable and learned member intend to take?

Mr. FULLER.—That is for me to say. I have no doubt that the Melbourne Age, if it expresses an opinion in the morning, will say that my remarks were frivolous, and that I wasted a lot of time. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports, who was a member of the Royal Commission, knows that what I am saying is perfectly correct. The honorable member attended the meetings at Melbourne, Sydney, and Lithgow, though not at Newcastle or Brisbane, and he heard the evidence which I am about to quote. I do not wish to make any reflection on the honorable member, but it was a remarkable fact, to which my attention was called at the time, that the confidential report, which was handed to me and other members of the Commission by the chairman one afternoon, appeared the following morning at full length in the Melbourne Age. This was remarkable; and it was generally understood that that report in the Age was supplied by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. The report of the Commission, which I am about to read, was drawn up in no careless fashion, but had much consideration bestowed upon it.

Mr. MAUGER.—I rise to a point of order. My attention has just been drawn to the fact that the honorable member has asserted that I gave what was confidential information to a newspaper.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is not a point of order. If the honorable member for Melbourne Ports desires to make a personal explanation, he may do so as soon as the honorable member for Illawarra has concluded his remarks.

Mr. MAUGER.—But it is a serious matter, which should not be allowed to go unexplained until the end of the honorable member's speech.

Mr. SPEAKER.—A point of order may be raised in the course of a speech, and the speech may be interrupted in order that it may be considered. But a personal explanation can only be made at the conclusion of a speech.

Mr. FULLER.—If I have done the honorable member for Melbourne Ports an injustice, I withdraw what I said. I shall not deal with the majority report, because I feel satisfied that honorable members are already acquainted with it, and I do not wish to occupy time any further than is necessary. But I do wish to direct attention to the report which, though it is signed by six members of the Commission in the same way as is the majority report, is called the minority report. I happened to be one of the six Commissioners who signed this so-called minority report, but I may say that, so far as their intelligence and attention to the business of the Commission are concerned, they do not stand behind those signing the majority report in any shape or form. I direct attention to the fact that the report to which I now refer was signed by Mr. Hughes, the honorable member for West Sydney, and by Mr. Winter Cooke, an ex-member of this House. Those who had the honour of knowing Mr. Cooke know that he was a man of more than ordinary attainments. The report is also signed by Mr. Kirwan, who drew it up. It was perused by the honorable member for Bland, who also signed it, and I undertake to say that there is no honorable member in this House who can go through the evidence submitted to the Commission and from it disprove a single statement in the report to which I refer.

Mr. WATKINS. — That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. FULLER.—I throw out the challenge to the member in charge of the Bill, and also to the member for Newcastle, who was one of those signing the so-called majority report. I defy any one to show that the minority report is incorrect in any of its statements. This afternoon we had a motion for the appointment of a Select Committee. Various statements in support of that proposal were made by the honorable member for Barrier, and other honorable members on the cross-benches, but here we have a report, not from a Select Committee, but from a Royal Commission accompanied by a mass of sworn evidence, and I ask whether honorable members propose to take any notice of it, or intend to completely ignore the labours of the Commissioners? We gave the utmost attention to the matter, considered the whole of the evidence given from start to finish, and six Commissioners honestly and conscientiously drew up a report in opposition to the bonus proposal. I admit that the six other Commissioners just as honestly and conscientiously signed the so-called majority report, but I am still entitled to ask the Minister in charge of the Bill, and honorable members who propose to support it, to show me any respect in which the minority report is wrong. I understand that the Postmaster-General has taken up the challenge. I am delighted that the honorable gentleman should have accepted it, though I know his capacity, his keenness in debate and his skill in the discovery of little points in support of the cause he has espoused. If the honorable gentleman can tell me from the evidence given before the Royal Commission that any statement appearing in the minority report is not justified, I shall be the first to admit that I have made a mistake; but it must also be remembered that there are others as well as myself who must be satisfied on the point.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We have to be shown that the report signed by the other six Commissioners is not substantiated.

Mr. FULLER.—The Postmaster-General in taking up my challenge must show that the honorable member for Bland, whose name is also attached to the minority report, is wrong. When a measure involving an important departure in policy is about to be launched in Australia, we are entitled to hear from the leader of the Labour Party whether he has changed his opinion in connexion with this matter.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—May not the position have changed since then?

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—The political situation has changed.

Mr. FULLER.—I have admitted that circumstances have changed. I have shown that a Royal Commission has since been appointed, has taken evidence, and has come to certain conclusions after hearing the evidence of the various witnesses examined. I have shown that two reports have been submitted, each signed by six Commissioners, and that amongst those who have signed the report in opposition to the granting of these bonuses are two leading members of the Labour Party, the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, and the honorable member for Bland, the leader of the party.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Was there not a belief at the time that a State would nationalize the industry?

Mr. FULLER.—I should like to remind honorable members that it was on the motion of the honorable member for Bland that the matter was referred to a Royal Commission. The honorable member was one of those who were strongest in opposition to bonuses to establish a big monopoly, and to put the money of the people into the pockets of private individuals. On those grounds he moved a motion for the reference of the question to a Royal Commission.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Did not the honorable member think that the industry could be nationalized at that time?

Mr. FULLER.—I shall let the honorable member for Hindmarsh know all about that. I repeat that it was through the action of the leader of the Labour Party that the first measure of this kind was referred for inquiry to a Select Committee, which subsequently became a Royal Commission; and that after he had heard the evidence taken during that inquiry, he was more strongly opposed to the granting of bonuses to private individuals than he had been before. I ask the Postmaster-General, who appears to be in charge of the measure at the present moment, if the Bill provides for the nationalization of the iron industry. As he does not answer, I assume that he does not know what the intention of the Bill is. Ministers seem to be in the same position with regard to this Bill that they were in with regard to the Commerce Bill, which the Attorney-General thought provided for the grading of butter, and the Minister of Trade and Customs thought did not, they being thus in direct opposition on a question affecting one of the most important industries in Australia. I again ask the Prime Minister if the Bill provides for the nationalization of the iron industry. He does not answer my question.

Mr. CHANTER. — Question time has passed.

Mr. MAUGER. — It will soon be here again.

Mr. FULLER.—I am prepared to go on until question time comes again if honorable members compel me to do so. I can speak for ten or twelve hours on this subject without repeating myself. I feel very strongly in regard to the matter, because I was a member of the Royal Commission, and attended most of its meetings. I heard the evidence of nearly all the witnesses who were called, and was in as good a position as any member of the Commission to form a fair and honest judgment on the question submitted to us. Having given careful consideration to the whole matter, having heard the evidence, and seen the demeanour of the witnesses who were called, I felt so strongly opposed to the granting of bonuses that I signed the minority report, which was agreed to by six of the twelve members of the Commission. As some honorable members now present may not have heard that report, I shall direct particular attention to it. There can be no doubt that, in many respects Australia is favorably circumstanced for the production of iron. The protectionists who sit on the Government side of the Chamber pose as the only members of the House who desire the establishment of manufacturing industries in the Commonwealth, but we free-traders who sit in opposition are as anxious as any protectionist who was ever elected has been for the establishment of such industries. But we desire that private enterprise shall have free and fair play—that men of ability and enterprise shall have the fullest opportunity to carry their ideas into effect, and to develop their businesses for the benefit of this great heritage which has been bestowed upon us by the mother land.

Mr. KELLY.—I direct attention to the state of the House. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. FULLER.—We who are free-traders recognise the desirability of establishing the iron industry in Australia if only in order that we may manufacture guns and implements for defending our shores. We on this side yield in no particular to honorable members on the other side so far as that question is concerned. While we recognise that we are not placed in as good a position as other countries for manufacturing iron, still we are placed in a very favorable position when we have such magnificent deposits of iron, coal, and limestone in close proximity in various parts of Australia. The report of the Royal Commission contains a list of the witnesses who were examined. The Minister of Home Affairs, as well as the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, will bear me out that no attempt was made to call witnesses in opposition to the principle of granting a bonus.

Mr. GROOM.—Why did not its opponents call witnesses?

Mr. FULLER.—Because it was not necessary. The evidence given by all the men who came to support the granting of a bonus was so weak that the Commissioners whose names I have read out twice felt themselves justified in drawing up a strong report, from which I intend to read after I have referred to the witnesses. The list of witnesses contains many names which are well known in the commercial community. Mr. Jamieson,

Mr. Sandford, and others are prominent men in commercial undertakings. All these gentlemen were examined at length. The first witness was Mr. Edward Fisher Pittman, a gentleman who has occupied a high and honorable position in the Public Service of New South Wales for a great many years. He is a geologist, and his knowledge of the iron deposits in various parts of Australia is not excelled by that of any man in Australia, or by that of any of the experts who have been brought here from abroad. He was examined at length by the chairman and other members of the Commission. Although, in view of his official position, we did not ask him to express an opinion on the policy of granting a bonus, still he gave most valuable and interesting evidence in connexion with iron deposits and the possibility of establishing an iron industry here, which every honorable member before he votes on this Bill ought to study at length. If I find that honorable members are obdurate, and are disposed to treat this important question in a light way; if they are not prepared to study the report, it will be my duty, however long it may take, to quote those salient features which I have marked off. The honorable member for Barrier knows that Mr. Pittman is highly esteemed by all mining people in New South Wales, and that his word on these matters has never been questioned. Another expert who was examined was Mr. Jaquet, whose attainments in connexion with mining matters are well known in Australia from one end to the other. In his evidence Mr. Sandford declared that the honorable member for Parramatta, by appointing Mr. Jaquet to make full inquiries concerning the iron deposits of New South Wales, had done one of the most valuable things in connexion with the development of the iron industry. My honorable friend is entitled to great credit for what he then did. The evidence given by Mr. Jaquet concerning the deposits of not only New South Wales, but other parts of Australia, forms a volume which every honorable member ought to study before he votes on this Bill. If it is passed it will afford to certain persons an opportunity of floating a company. We have it on the sworn evidence of Mr. Sandford and Mr. Jamieson, two men who are specially interested in the formation of a syndicate, that although the bonus may be instrumental in enabling them to start the iron industry, it will be of little use to them in the end, unless protective duties are afterwards imposed. This measure has been placed before us by the Minister of Trade and Customs as a Bill providing merely for the granting of bonuses; but we know perfectly well that if the iron industry is started here as the outcome of the bonus, and some hundreds, or even thousands, of men are employed, we shall pass through the same experience as has fallen to the lot of Canada. We know that demands will be made for an extension of the bonus, or for the imposition of high protective duties. In Canada applications have been made for further and higher bounties. The American iron industry was established without the aid of any protective duty, and in Australia, where we possess abundance of natural facilities for carrying on an enterprise such as that contemplated, we should be able to get along without any artificial aid. I had not the advantage of hearing the speeches delivered by the Minister of Trade and Customs or the leader of the Opposition, but from what I can gather from the official reports, the assertion of the leader of the Opposition that Mr. Sandford had stated that he could manufacture iron at Lithgow at a cost of 35s. per ton was questioned. I would appeal to the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, who attended the meeting of the Commission at which Mr. Sandford gave his evidence, to say whether that gentleman did not squarely and fairly state that he could manufacture pig-iron at Lithgow at the price mentioned.

Mr. MAUGER.—He also stated afterwards that he had made a mistake, and sought when it was too late to give further evidence.

Mr. FULLER.—I was one of the members of the Commission, and I was present at most of its meetings; but I never heard before that Mr. Sandford had expressed a wish to modify the evidence he had given, to the effect that he could manufacture iron at Lithgow at 35s. per ton. Will the honorable member say that Mr. Sandford did not assert that he could manufacture pig-iron at Lithgow as cheaply as it could be turned out in any other part of the world? Only last Friday a report of an interview with Mr. Sandford was published in the newspapers. In the course of his statement he said that he was satisfied that we had in Australia good qualities of raw material, though not of the best, and that our raw material could be treated at Lithgow as cheaply as in any part of the world. In the evidence he gave before the Commission, Mr. Sandford stated as one reason why the bonus should be granted, that it would help to enable him to pay freights and compete with foreign products in Queensland, Victoria, and other parts of the Commonwealth. Mr. Sandford, upon being interviewed shortly after his return from a visit to England, Sweden, Belgium, America, and other countries where the iron industry has been highly developed, repeated the statements he made before the Commission. He said—

I have always considered that if the Sydney market would not absorb the output of a modern blast furnace, the proposed Federal bonus would materially help in paying freight and meeting competition in Queensland, Victoria, and South Australia.

As one who was intimately acquainted with the late Mr. Joseph Mitchell in his desire to establish the iron industry in New South Wales, I was extremely anxious that Mr. Sandford should have every legitimate opportunity to establish the iron industry upon a basis that would be beneficial not only to himself, but to New South Wales and the whole of Australia.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I draw attention to the state of the House. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. FULLER.—I have no desire to keep honorable members, but I recognise that this is an important matter to the people of Australia. Some honorable members seem to think that it is of no importance that a large sum of money is to be taken out of the pockets of the people for the benefit of a few; but I think it is my duty, in the interests of the country, to point out these matters, because I feel keenly and honestly about them.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No one disputes that.

Mr. FULLER.—There are half-a-dozen other subjects to which I wish to refer.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We have yet to go into Committee, and the honorable member can refer to them then.

Mr. FULLER.—But I prefer to speak when it suits my purpose. I know that the Prime Minister wants to get the Bill into Committee, but I do not. If I judge honorable members opposite wrongly, I apologize to them, but I really do not believe that they have read the evidence of the Commission. They would not have so much calm confidence in reference to this Bill if they had done so. Let me again invite attention to what is called the minority report of the Commission. They say—

We, the undersigned members of the Commission, are against the passage through Parliament of the Bill for the payment of bonuses by the Federal Government for the establishment of the iron industry within the Commonwealth.

The very first clause is, it will be seen, a declaration against the principle of paying bonuses. The second clause of the report is one to which exception cannot be taken. The members of the minority recognise that the Commonwealth possesses vast deposits of iron ore, of high-grade coal, and other material required in iron works.

Mr. KELLY.—I think there should be a quorum present to hear this report read. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. FULLER.—I have no desire to obstruct business. I thought it would be of interest to honorable members to hear what the minority of the Commission had to say. I had also intended to quote the evidence of Mr. Jamieson and Mr. Franki. But, apparently, honorable members are in a frame of mind in which they are prepared to pass anything without consideration at the dictates of the present Government. It appears that honorable members on the cross benches who believe in the nationalization of the iron industry, and not in the granting of bonuses, are not prepared to stand to their principles. On a former occasion, the honorable member for Melbourne Ports proclaimed that he was in favour of the nationalization of industries. I have looked up Hansard, and have before me a report of his speech. But he and other honorable members are now chiefly anxious to keep the present Government in power. I suppose that one of the most treacherous things ever done in the history of parliamentary government in Australia was the means by which the present Ministry secured possession of the Treasury benches. The Prime Minister denounced Socialism from start to finish. People talk of what the leader of the Opposition has said in condemnation of Socialism in this House and in the country. But he was mild as compared with the declarations of the man who now sits on the Treasury bench, and is kept in power by the support of a party who are so obviously using him for their own ends. The public of Australia ought to understand clearly that while this measure purports to be one for granting bonuses to establish the iron industry, it is really a means by which the socialistic party are sneaking in their policy. It is intended by them that this great industry shall be the starting point in their policy of confiscation in connexion with the industries of Australia.

Debate (on motion by Mr. KELLY) adjourned.

SUPPLY BILL (No. 2).

Bill returned from the Senate without requests.

House adjourned at 11.56 p.m.

Senate.

Friday, 25 August, 1905.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

LETTER-SORTERS: MELBOURNE AND SYDNEY.

Senator GUTHRIE.—I wish to call the attention of the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, to the following letter, which I have received from a constituent:—

I am posting you envelope enclosed. It was a letter sent to me from a brother-in-law in London telling me of my father's death, and asking me to appoint an attorney, as I had to be represented by one in Jersey re dividing the property. The letter was opened in Melbourne or Sydney, and returned to my brother in London. As all light-houses are either under the Marine Board or Harbor Trust there was very little trouble in sending the letter on to one of the Boards, seeing the letter was urgent. I notice in one of our papers where the Federal Post Office people are very smart, as a letter addressed more as a puzzle they had no trouble in finding the owner. I would propose that every post office was supplied with a map of the Commonwealth, or appoint some old sailor to sort the letters for them.

The letter is addressed to Althorpe Island Lighthouse, Australia, and is marked, "Post town not known in New South Wales," and "Post town not known in Victoria." I desire to ask the Minister if he will ask his colleague to cause the sorters in the General Post Offices at Sydney and Melbourne to pass an examination in the geography of Australia, and to supply a map of Australia to the General Post Offices in those cities, so that the sorters may know that there is such a place as Althorpe Island in Australia?

Senator KEATING.—I shall have the matter referred to by the honorable senator brought under the notice of the Postmaster-General.

LAND AT LARGS BAY.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I wish to ask Senator Keating if he can state to the Senate the amounts claimed in the two cases of compensation respecting land at Largs Bay, now pending in the High Court.

Senator KEATING.—I sent to the Department of Home Affairs for the information. It had not arrived before the meeting of the Senate this morning, but if it comes, as I hope, during the day, I shall announce it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Probably it could be got more readily from the Crown Solicitor.

Senator KEATING.—I was referred from his Department to the other.

COUNCIL OF DEFENCE.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

(1) Is it a fact, as stated by the Vice-President of the Executive Council, that the Council of Defence has not met since the present Government came into office?

(2) In the absence of such meetings, by whose authority do individual members of the said Council issue instructions to State Commandants, signing such instructions "By order"?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. There has been one meeting of the Council of Defence since the present Government came into office, which was held yesterday.

2. No instructions, so far as I am aware, have been issued to Commandants by individual members of the Council of Defence, in their capacity as members of such body.

FIRST PARLIAMENT: MR. TOM ROBERTS' PICTURE.

Senator MATHESON asked the Minister representing the Minister of External Affairs, upon notice—

(1) How many copies of the picture purporting to be "The opening of First Parliament of the Commonwealth" have been purchased for £2 as set out in page 17 of the Estimates, 1905-6?

(2) To what use do the Government propose to put their purchase?

(3) By what Minister of External Affairs was the order for these prints given?

(4) Are the prints copies of the picture by Mr. Nuttall, or by Mr. Roberts, or partly of both?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows:—

1. Four (4).
2. One each for Government House, Sydney, Government House, Melbourne, Federal Parliament House, and Prime Minister's room.
3. Sir Edmund Barton.
4. All remarques of Mr. Tom Roberts' picture.

Senator MATHESON.—Arising out of that answer, I desire to ask the Minister of Defence if he can inform the Senate why a preference has been given to Mr. Roberts over Mr. Nuttall?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I cannot answer the question. I know no more about the matter than is contained in the answers. But if the honorable senator will give notice of a question I shall get the information he desires.

Senator STEWART.—Arising out of the question of Senator Matheson, I desire to ask Senator Playford whether a copy of the picture will be placed in the Parliament House of each State?

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think that that question arises out of the answer, which was that four copies of the picture had been ordered for certain places.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The honorable senator can move that further copies of the picture be purchased for the places he refers to.

Senator CLEMONS. — Arising out of the answer, I desire to ask the Minister of Defence if he can tell the Senate whether the copies of the picture which have cost £23 each are framed or unframed, the cost of the frame, and the cost of the picture without a frame?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I have no pretensions to any knowledge of high art, but in the Queen's Hall the honorable and learned senator will see a copy of this picture. I think in a frame.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Arising out of the last question, I desire to ask the Minister of Defence if he is aware that copies of the picture can be obtained from subscribers at about half-price?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am not aware. I am not in the market.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Senator MILLEN asked the Minister representing the Treasurer, upon notice—

If the daily allowance will be paid to members of Parliament who are members of the Tariff Commission when that Commission sits in other States than Victoria when Parliament is not sitting?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answer to the honorable senator's question is as follows:—

The daily allowance will, when Parliament is not sitting, be paid to members of Parliament who are members of the Tariff Commission when that Commission sits in a place in which the member does not reside. The principle to be observed is that when a member is put to expense which he would not be put to, were he not a member of the Commission, the allowance will be paid.

POSTAGE OF HANSARD.

Senator STEWART asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Is it the intention of the Government to amend the Post and Telegraph Act so as to enable Hansard to be posted at newspaper rate, and sold to the public at 4s. per Session, postage paid?

Senator KEATING.—The answer to the honorable senator's question is as follows:—

The question of amending the Post and Telegraph Act is under consideration, and in connexion therewith the provision of a lower rate of postage for Hansard will be dealt with.

SCHOOL SOCIALISM.

Senator MCGREGOR asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

(1) Has his attention been called to an article appearing in the Herald of 23rd August, in which it is stated that lessons are being given to the scholars of the Geelong school calculated to instil into their young minds the principles of Socialism?

(2) If, as a result of such teaching, the scholars should arm themselves and march on Melbourne in warlike manner, will the Minister call out the Military in order to adequately protect this Parliament House?

(3) Will the Minister avail himself of the services of others who may offer to assist in repelling such invaders?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answer to the honorable senator's first question is as follows:—

1. My attention has not been called to the article in question.

I do not suppose that my honorable friend expects me to give an answer to the second and third questions.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I should like the questions to be answered.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I really cannot answer them.

Senator GIVENS.—Very recently the honorable senator answered questions which were far more absurd.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The honorable senator must not say that any questions I answered were absurd.

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES BILL.

Bill read a third time.

ADJOURNMENT.

PUBLIC SERVICE CLASSIFICATION.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—In conformity with the notice I gave to the Senate on Wednesday last, I move—

That the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator CLEMONS.—For a purpose?

Senator KEATING.—The notice given was to allow of a discussion of the classification scheme.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—On this motion I propose to say a few words on the classification scheme and its amendment, as laid before Parliament. I do not regard this as the best method of dealing with the scheme of the Public Service Commissioner. We are placed in a rather awkward position in that we are handcuffed, so to speak.

Senator MILLEN.—I rise to a point of order. I desire to know, sir, whether, on this motion, it is competent to discuss a subject respecting which a notice of motion appears on the business-paper. I refer to the following notice of motion in the name of Senator Neild—

That the amended reclassification scheme of the Public Service Commissioner be now taken into consideration of the Committee of the whole House.

I submit, sir, that if it is competent on this motion to discuss matters of which notice has been given, the notice-paper will become utterly useless, as we could anticipate a discussion on any subject.

The PRESIDENT.—I think that the Senate ought to take into consideration, as I do, the fact that the Ministry publicly announced that they would bring this matter under discussion to-day on the motion, "That the Senate do now adjourn," and we had that intimation before the notice on the business-paper was given by Senator Neild. That, I think, makes a great deal of difference. It seems to me that according to the spirit of the Standing Orders, it is Senator Neild, if anybody, who is in fault, and not the Government. I would call attention to the rulings of last session, which have been printed.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Before you do that, sir, will you allow me to say that while it is quite true that the Ministerial intimation was given on Wednesday, there is nothing on the business-paper to indicate that?

The PRESIDENT.—That is so, but the Ministry handed to me a notice of motion that, contingent on the motion, "That the Senate do now adjourn" being moved, they would call attention to this matter. I said that such a course was absolutely unnecessary, and therefore they did not put the motion on the business-paper. I made that statement before anything was heard of the notice of motion in the name of Senator Neild.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I could know nothing about that, and with great respect to you, sir, I take exception to your action in alleging that I have been guilty of default.

The PRESIDENT.—I have not alleged that the honorable senator has been guilty of anything. I would call the attention of honorable senators to this ruling of last session, under the heading "Anticipating Discussion"—

Even on the first reading of the Appropriation Bill, a senator is debarred from discussing any matters on the notice-paper.

That is very similar to the present case—

This ruling is strictly in accordance with standing order 405, but a rigid adherence to this standing order might lead to undesirable results. A senator, in order to prevent discussion of a subject, might give notice of motion concerning such subject, and after all never move the motion. Discretion must be exercised in the enforcement of the rule.

That is what I said last session, and I hold the same opinion still. I am not going to prevent honorable senators from discussing this question of the Public Service classification, although, perhaps, if I were to interpret the standing order strictly according to the letter, and not the meaning, I might do so.

Senator MILLEN.—I wish to explain that I asked the question merely for the purpose of obtaining information as to the proper interpretation of our Standing Orders. I have no wish to prevent discussion, and indeed, intend to take part in it. I understand that you have given a ruling on this particular case, and that you are not laying down a general principle?

The PRESIDENT.—That is so.

Senator PEARCE.—I draw attention to the fact that we cannot pass any motion on the subject of the Public Service classification in the circumstances in which we are placed. That seems to me to be very inadvisable. Practically, we have no power by this method of bringing the matter before the Senate to deal effectively with the scheme. I totally dissent from the view that that is a proper position in which to put us. I think we ought to be able to pass any motion with regard to the Public Service.

Senator KEATING.—That can be done by substantive motion, at any time.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I ask your ruling as to whether the speech which my honorable friend is making will practically have the effect of removing from the notice-paper the motion which I have placed there, and to which, indirectly, the honorable senator is referring?

The PRESIDENT.—That is rather a difficult question to answer. The Standing Orders provide that the same matter shall not be discussed twice during the same session. It is provided in the Standing Orders that on the motion "That the Senate do now adjourn," no irrelevant matter shall be introduced. I think that is a good rule, which ought to have been adhered to. But the Senate thought otherwise, and passed a resolution permitting irrelevant questions to be raised on the motion "That the Senate do now adjourn." Consequently, we have this difficulty confronting us. In accordance with that resolution, a senator can discuss irrelevant questions; and will that discussion debar the same questions from being discussed again in pursuance of notice of motion? I do not think so. I do not think it ought to do so. I am bound to say that there is no standing order about the matter, and, therefore, I am merely giving my opinion. But the discussion of a question on the motion for the adjournment might merely consist of a very few remarks by one honorable senator, and that ought not to prevent the same matter being debated again on a notice of motion.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The question that has been raised is extremely important. Apart from the actual point that was first raised, but rather on the broader point that arises out of the question put by my honorable friend Senator Neild, I should like to know whether, in your judgment, and in the opinion of the Senate, the method now being pursued is a desirable way of dealing with a big question such as the classification of the Public Service?

The PRESIDENT.—That is not the point. It is not a point of order either.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I rather thought that that was the point raised by my honorable friend Senator Neild, because what he wishes to know is whether the effect of this debate on the motion for the adjournment of the Senate, will be to wipe his motion off the notice-paper.

The PRESIDENT.—That is a point of order; but whether this is a desirable method to pursue is not a point of order.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not mean to raise the larger question of the convenience or facility of the method being pursued, but what I wish to point out is that it appears to me that the result of adopting this course is practically to burk discussion in detail on another motion on the paper.

The PRESIDENT.—I have already given a ruling on that point.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am not making these remarks with a view to question in any way what has fallen from you, but with a view to direct attention to the inconvenience of this method.

The PRESIDENT.—That may be all right, but that is not a point of order.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The motion "That the Senate do now adjourn" means that, if it is carried, no other business can be taken.

Senator PEARCE.—I think that this is an inconvenient method, because our hands are tied. We are prevented from passing any motion. I think that this is a futile way of dealing with the question. There are one or two points in the classification scheme upon which I think the Senate should not merely have a desultory discussion, but should pass a motion.

Senator MULCAHY.—Would not such action really be opposed to the spirit of the Public Service Act?

Senator PEARCE.—I shall deal with that point. It is said that we have practically handed over the entire control of the Public Service to the Commissioner; that we have made him an autocrat; that we have not merely prevented Ministers in Parliament from dealing with officers of the service, but have even parted with the right to review the actions of the Commissioner. Those who make that statement cannot have read the Public Service Act, or they would never make such a mistake. If honorable senators will turn to the Act they will find that the Commissioner is an officer created by Parliament, and has to report to the Executive, which is responsible to Parliament. Why do his reports come before Parliament? To ornament the table? To be looked at, and not even to be read? The position is ridiculous. I am surprised that honorable senators who are sent here in the interest of the public should say that this officer, whom Parliament has created, is to be looked at with awe, that we are not to speak about him, and not to pass motions about his work. Those who hold that view must be trying to reverse the position, and to put the Commissioner before Parliament. Under section 8 of the Public Service Act Parliament has defined the duties of the Commissioner. He is not referred to as if he were superior to Parliament. It is provided that the inspectors shall report to the Commissioner; and in sub-section 2 it is provided that after considering such reports, the Commissioner may propose to the Governor-General in Council—that is, to the Executive, which is responsible to Parliament—

Any particular disposition of officers and offices and the division or class subdivision of class or grade of every officer and re-arrangement or improved method of carrying out any work which appears to the Commissioner necessary or expedient for the more economic efficient or convenient working of any department, and such proposal shall be considered and dealt with by the Governor-General.

If we have given over all our powers to this officer, why need he report to the Governor-General at all? What is the use of his report? What is the object of laying it on the table, as provided by a later section? It is conclusively clear that this officer is under the control of Parliament, and that the whole of his decisions are subject to review by the Governor-General in Council. Sub-section 3 of sub-section 8 says that—

If the Governor-General does not approve of any proposal it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to reconsider such proposal, clearly showing that the Governor-General in Council has power to review all the decisions of the Commissioner. I think that the exaggerated position given to the Commissioner is due to some of the weak Ministers we have had in office. I have heard of Ministers having to work their clerks overtime, or having to go through a lot of formality to get additional clerks to save their officers from working overtime. The Minister who allows that condition of affairs to happen is not fit for his office. The section goes on to say that—

Such fresh proposal shall be considered and dealt with by the Governor-General.

Senator DOBSON.—Not by Parliament until the Governor-General has dealt with it.

Senator MILLEN.—Is there anything that Parliament has not a right to discuss?

Senator PEARCE.—It is not merely a question of discussion; it is a question of direction if necessary.

Senator HIGGS.—And Parliament can direct the Government.

Senator DOBSON.—We can only direct the Executive if they have done wrong.

Senator PEARCE.—We can direct them even if they have done right. Indeed, the honorable senator says that on occasions not only can Parliament direct the Executive, but that a section of Parliament can do so.

Senator DOBSON.—The matter is not ripe for discussion, in my opinion.

Senator PEARCE.—I direct attention to the last paragraph of section 3 of section 8, which says—

Where the Governor-General does not approve of any proposal a statement of the reasons for not approving and for requiring a fresh proposal shall be laid before the Parliament.

That is to say, where there is a conflict of opinion between the Government and the Commissioner, and the Government has called upon the Commissioner for a fresh proposal, the reasons for so doing shall be laid before Parliament—from Senator Dobson's point of view, I suppose, to be respectfully worshipped, but from my point of view in order that Parliament may, if it thinks fit, have an opportunity, as it has the right, to express its opinion on the action of the Government.

Senator DOBSON.—The Executive has not expressed its opinion yet as provided by the Act.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Because the Executive neglects its duty Parliament is to fall into the same rut!

Senator HIGGS.—Executives have approved by silence.

Senator PEARCE.—Whether the Executive has done its duty or not, I take it that this Senate is not going to hand over its power because of a weak Government.

Senator MILLEN.—Three Governments have affirmed that they did approve of the scheme.

Senator PEARCE.—By their silence that may be so.

Senator MILLEN.—And by their affirmation.

Senator PEARCE.—I do not think that any Government has approved of the scheme by affirmation, except, perhaps, the present Government. I believe that previous Governments had no opportunity to deal with the matter.

Senator MILLEN.—The Watson Government did.

Senator PEARCE.—I think the honorable senator is not correct in saying that they approved. It was their intention to bring the subject before Parliament.

Senator DAWSON.—We were only considering the subject when we were jerked out of office.

Senator PEARCE.—Section 8 goes on to provide what is to happen in regard to officers, but there is nothing which indicates in the slightest degree that the Senate is not free to embody its opinion in resolutions, and that those resolutions are to have no effect on the Commissioner. I think that this officer, who is the creation of Parliament, must regard any action taken by Parliament in these matters. My point of view is emphasized by section 11, which says—

The Commissioner shall furnish to the Minister for presentation to the Parliament at least once in each year a report on the condition and efficiency of the public service and of the proceedings of the Commissioner and all Inspectors—not merely a report on efficiency, for the information of members, but of the Commissioner's action in regard to the service—and in such report there shall be set forth any changes and measures necessary for improving the method of the working of the Public Service.

The Commissioner shall in such report draw attention to any breach or evasion of this Act which may come under his notice.

That clearly shows, I contend, that the Senate may deal with the recommendations of the Commissioner, and that we should not give up, as I think we are doing to a certain extent by the method adopted, our power to criticise and express an opinion. As to the report, I wish to say that in my opinion the Commissioner has had a very difficult task of great magnitude. It would be something wonderful if an individual officer were able to reconcile six different services and systems of treatment without causing much dissatisfaction; and we must admit that the report of the Commissioner is very valuable, and redounds greatly to his credit. But we must not shut our eyes to the fact that in some particulars, at any rate, the effect—although I do not doubt the Commissioner's desire to give fair play—has been to inflict injustice on some of the officers of the lower-paid grades and sections of the service. I can quite understand that, as the Commissioner and his inspectors continually come in contact with those in the higher grades of the service, they are more likely to lean to the latter's point of view than to the point of view of those lower in the grades in regard to salary and position. We must, therefore, make allowance if we find a tendency throughout the scheme to give the heads of departments, or those in contact with the heads of departments, more generous treatment than is dealt out to the public servants in the lower grades. One other feature also strikes me. The Public Service Commissioner—and, perhaps, naturally so from his environment—has fallen into the erroneous idea that men who do manual labour are not deserving of the same consideration as are men who do clerical work. Whether in the matter of allowances, of salary, or of treatment generally, the officer in the general division receives an inferior salary and treatment.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Inferior increments, inferior overtime allowances, and inferior holidays.

Senator MCGREGOR.—And have less opportunity for advancement.

Senator PEARCE.—One of the greatest drawbacks is that the officers in the general division have, as Senator McGregor says, less opportunity for advancement; and that fact should influence the Commissioner to compensate them with more generous treatment in other respects. For instance, in the clerical division there is no grading below a salary of £160 per annum. If a man enters the clerical division as a probationer, there is nothing to prevent him, with the good will of the head of the Department and the inspector, from rising to a salary of £160 without waiting for his seniors to die; and on attaining that salary he begins to work up through the various grades. That seems to me to be a perfectly fair proposal. It is quite reasonable that, providing a man is efficient and industrious, he should have a guarantee that he shall proceed, increment by increment, until he reaches that salary. I am not advocating what are called automatic increases, but contending that there should be a reasonable prospect of a man attaining a salary of at least £160.

Senator MILLEN.—Irrespective of the value of the work done?

Senator PEARCE.—I know that is an argument used in this connexion; but should the argument not apply also to the clerical division? Are there no officers in the clerical division doing work not so valuable as that done by other officers in the same division? All I ask is that honorable senators shall apply to the general division the same arguments as they use to justify the absence of grades in the clerical division. What I invite honorable senators to defend is the differential treatment. I know that I shall probably be told by the Government that the Commissioner has been so instructed by Parliament, and that he has no option but to grade officers in the general division. In fact, the Commissioner himself, probably anticipating that this point would be raised, says on the first page of his report:—

The arrangement of the general division into grades, also provided for by section 80 (a), has been completed, and the limits of salaries fixed by regulation are contained in schedule III. hereto.

One of the objections to the grade system, as applied to the lower officers of the general division, and particularly to the letter-carriers, is that, in addition, the salaries of the grades have been fixed, and, further, the number of letter-carriers who can get into the grades is limited. There are one-third of the men in grade 2, one-third in grade 1, and a hybrid grade, composed of assistant letter-carriers, containing the remaining third.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I suppose they carry the bags for the other fellows?

Senator PEARCE.—Although these men have to act on their own responsibility, they are called assistant letter-carriers.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The duties and hours are the same, and this is simply a method of paying small salaries.

Senator PEARCE.—There is no doubt about that. Section 80 of the Public Service Act provides—

The Governor-General may make, alter or repeal regulations for the carrying out of any of the provisions of this Act, and in particular for all or any of the following purposes, namely:—

- (a) For arranging the professional division into classes and the general division into grades, and for determining the limits of salaries and wages to be paid to persons in such classes or grades in the different departments or in any specified department.

I suppose the defence will be that the Commissioner takes this as an instruction to grade the officers of the general division. But the power on the part of the Commissioner to make regulations is purely optional, and if he does make regulations, they should conform to the general principles laid down in subsequent sections. It may be said that this section is an indication that at the time the Act was passed it was the wish of Parliament that the general division should be graded, but the Public Service Commissioner, in grading the general division, and the letter-carriers particularly, has gone a step further. It will be noticed that in the paragraph of the report I have read, he does not quote section 80 as a justification for limiting the salaries or number of the officers in each grade; indeed, it would be impossible to do so. The Commissioner justifies his action by regulations which he himself has made, and my contention is that the Public Service Commissioner, by utilizing to the full the permissive power given to him under section 80, has drafted regulations which practically enable him to extend the wish of Parliament in a direction never intended. If such, however, were the intention of Parliament at that time, I think that, in view of the results, Parliament should intimate to the Commissioner that the system he has adopted with regard to the letter-carriers must be abolished. In regard to the general division, which includes the letter-carriers, we have affirmed the principle of a minimum wage of £110 per annum for those who reach the age of twenty-one, and have been three years in the service. While we have fixed a minimum wage, the Public Service Commissioner has fixed a maximum wage, and the latter for the letter-carriers is £138 per annum. I draw honorable senators' attention to the fact that, short of the office of Deputy Postmaster-General, in each of the States there is no maximum fixed in the clerical division. In that division the way of promotion is open, and promotion carries with it substantial increases of salary. As I have already pointed out, there is no grading in the clerical division until a salary of £160 is reached, whereas in the general division not only are salaries limited—in the case of the letter-carriers to £138—but before these latter can obtain that salary they have to face a rigid system of grading which makes promotion almost impossible, unless they live to a very great age. What is the reason? The only reason that can be given is that these men are not following a clerical occupation.

Senator MULCAHY.—Is the question not really whether the men are being paid a fair wage for the work?

Senator PEARCE.—Should that question not also be asked in regard to the clerical division?

Senator MULCAHY.—I quite agree with the honorable senator.

Senator PEARCE.—A fair rate of wage should, in my opinion, be paid, although my idea of a fair wage might differ from that entertained by Senator Mulcahy. These letter-carriers should have fair treatment and encouragement. First of all, we should safeguard the principle of the minimum wage, below which no man should be admitted to the service. If a man is not worth the minimum salary, he ought not to be given employment in a Department; but once a man is admitted, he should have reasonable prospect, providing he is energetic, vigilant, and sober, of reaching, at any rate, the limit of £160 per annum, as provided for in the clerical division. Up to that point, advances of salary should be given, not automatically, but as rewards for length of service, combined with sobriety and efficiency. That is my idea of fair treatment, which, I take it, any honorable senator would extend to his own employé. A private employer would fix a salary to start with, below which he would ask no man to work; and then the way would be open to reward and promotion, depending entirely upon efficiency and industry. My opinion is—and I have heard other honorable senators often say the same—that in the Public Service we should apply the principle adopted by private employers; that is the only way in which to get an efficient service. The work of a letter-carrier is laborious, and, especially in the summer time, when he has to walk at all hours in the towns and cities, his position is not an enviable one. A letter-carrier has a responsible position, and has to bring to bear a considerable amount of intelligence in the discharge of his work. Any dereliction of duty, especially in sobriety, may lead to loss of employment at any time, and we require for the position men who are good citizens and industrious workmen.

I say, therefore, that we should treat these men in a more generous fashion than we have done in the past. I trust that the representatives of the Government in the Senate will take a note of the various points referred to in the debate, and will bring the suggestions made under the notice of the Public Service Commissioner. I ask that, so far as section 80 of the Public Service Act is concerned, the three grades fixed in the general division be abolished, and the maximum salary raised, so that it may be possible for a man following the occupation of a letter-carrier in the Commonwealth to expect to receive £3 per week after long service. A great outcry was raised when we proposed a minimum wage of £2 2s. per week, but no honorable senator who opposed that provision ever held the view that a man should not be able to secure that salary after he had been a certain time in the service. I think that honorable senators will readily admit that there should be for all workers in the Commonwealth, whether inside or outside of the Public Service, a prospect that, by diligence and sobriety, they might hope to receive a salary of £3 per week. After studying the operation of the grading system proposed, I believe it to be practically impossible for many letter-carriers in the Public Service to rise even to the maximum provided. In the past, when a man in receipt of the maximum salary of his class has died, some other public servant has been moved up into his place, and given the same salary, but, under the classification scheme—and this is where the assistant grade comes in—instead of moving an officer up to take the place and the salary of the man who has died, a probationer is put into the assistant grade.

Senator GIVENS.—It defeats the minimum wage.

Senator PEARCE.—That is so, because until the probationer has been qualified by three years' service, and by reaching the age of twenty-one years, he cannot get even £2 2s. per week. If a system of grading means anything at all, it should mean that when an officer in receipt of the maximum salary of a grade happens to die, the officer next qualified is moved up into his position, and is given the same salary. The system adopted by the Public Service Commissioner does not permit of that. Again, where a limited number of officers are allowed in a certain grade, it should logically follow that there should not be less than a certain number of officers in that grade. But that does not follow in the classification scheme. It seems to me that the more satisfactory way would be to treat the general division as the Public Service Commissioner has treated the lower branches of the clerical division. We should fix a minimum salary, and a decent maximum salary, which will encourage men to become efficient, and we should then let gradation depend on efficiency and industry, and allow the judges of that to be the permanent head and the heads of the different branches of a department. There is another question which particularly affects my own State, that of allowances. I am glad to see that the Public Service Commissioner, in his amended report, has to some extent remedied the injustice inflicted by his first arrangement. In Western Australia, and particularly in the more remote and inaccessible parts of the State, as honorable senators are aware, the cost of living is much higher than it is in the eastern States. The first allowances for extra cost of living provided in the classification scheme were altogether inadequate. They were less in many cases than the allowances previously given by the Federal Government, and much less than those allowed by the State Government in Western Australia. In the case of Broome, where a cable company employs a number of officials, they received higher salaries and much higher allowances than the public servants in the same place. The Public Service Commissioner, recognising these facts, has raised the allowances given to officers in the more inaccessible portions of the States. But I point out that the cost of living, even in the larger towns in Western Australia, is much higher than it is in Melbourne or Sydney. I am entitled to say that an officer performing duty in Western Australia should get the same salary—that is, a salary having the same purchasing power—as an officer performing similar duties in Melbourne or Sydney. The Commissioner should therefore have taken Melbourne or Sydney as a basis on which to arrange a scheme of allowances for places in the Commonwealth where the cost of living is higher. At present an officer getting a transfer from Sydney or Melbourne to Perth is obliged to accept the transfer at a reduction of salary, because, while he gets nominally the same salary, its purchasing power in Perth will not be so great.

Senator WALKER.—We might get over that difficulty by a climate allowance.

Senator PEARCE.—I am not complaining that the Public Service Commissioner has not provided for a climate allowance, but that he has not adopted a proper scheme. Honorable senators will be aware that in the various States allowances are made according to the cost of living in different places, and I argue that what the Commissioner has done for the States he should have done for the Commonwealth as a whole, and, taking one or two cities as a basis, have arranged a scheme of allowances for officers in every part of the continent. Another matter to which attention should, I think, be called, is that in Kalgoorlie and on the gold-fields generally, an artisan desiring to join the Public Service is compelled practically to break the Arbitration Court awards in order to secure employment. In places where there are no Arbitration Court awards, an artisan may have to break the laws of his union by taking less than the minimum rate of wages fixed for his district if he wishes to get into the Public Service. In two States of the Commonwealth there are Arbitration Courts, and in Victoria there is a Wages Board, and the Commissioner, in fixing the rates of wages for artisans, should have taken into consideration the rates fixed by Arbitration Courts and Wages Boards where such tribunals exist.

Senator KEATING.—For the like class of work.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes. These are the chief points I wished to bring forward, but I add, in conclusion, that if I had been given the opportunity I should have submitted a motion in regard to them, and I regret that the course adopted for the discussion of the classification scheme has prevented my doing so.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—In common with other honorable senators, I am forced to recognise the extremely inconvenient method which the Government have adopted of bringing this matter before the Senate.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Inconvenient and unusual.

Senator KEATING.—In unusual circumstances.

Senator MILLEN.—I do not desire to refer to the circumstances in which the matter was first mentioned in the Senate, beyond stating that the whole of the trouble may fairly be charged against the Government. Had they adopted the ordinary precaution of placing a notice on the business paper, as they should have done, and as they do in the ordinary course, there would have been no trouble, and every honorable senator would have had an opportunity to express his opinion. In consequence of the course adopted, we are reduced to this position: that, whilst we can state our opinions and feelings in the matter, we can do nothing more, and if it should happen that, when the time arrives for adjourning this debate, there are still some honorable senators who wish to speak, it appears to me that they will be practically prevented from doing so.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—We can revive the question again.

Senator HIGGS.—It could be revived again on a motion for adjournment, but we should then be in the same position as we are now.

Senator MILLEN.—That is so; we could then do nothing, and it appears to me that there is a strong possibility, if this debate closes to-day, without every honorable senator who desires to do so having spoken, that some technical difficulty may lie in the way of reviving the matter.

Senator KEATING.—I can assure the honorable senator that the Government will place no obstacle in the way of any honorable senator bringing his views on the question before the Senate.

Senator MILLEN.—I am not saying that they will, but I am saying that they have not provided the ordinary business facilities for doing so.

Senator KEATING.—Honorable senators have the same facility for discussing the question on this motion as they would have on any other.

Senator MILLEN.—Honorable senators have said on more than one occasion, "What have we to do with the Standing Orders?" but I do not forget that Mr. President is still in the Chair, and that the Standings Orders are still in force. I can see difficulties, which may not strike Ministers, in the way of reviving a discussion on the question. No honorable senator will say that the course adopted by the Government was the best to take, or the course which should have been taken. The point has been raised of the competency of Parliament to discuss this report of the Public Service Commissioner. It is a new doctrine to me.

Senator MCGREGOR.—It is only a Dobsonian doctrine.

Senator DOBSON.—I never contended that. Senator McGregor does not understand my position.

Senator MILLEN.—Personally I prefer to take Senator Dobson's views from the honorable and learned senator himself, and not to have them filtered through or interpreted by honorable senators on the other side.

Senator DOBSON.—By impertinent interjections continually made.

Senator MILLEN.—The right of Parliament to discuss this and any other question is and must remain unchallenged. A public meeting outside has the right to discuss anything, from the action of the law courts downwards, and surely our right to discuss any matter must be as complete as that of an ordinary public meeting? Further, I think that the Public Service Act distinctly contemplates that Parliament may desire to discuss this question. Certainly, there is no prohibition in the Act against it, and if there were, it could have no effect. Having affirmed the unchallengeable right of Parliament, we may still reasonably ask ourselves what limits we shall place on the discussion, and what is to be the object of it.

Senator MULCAHY.—How we can make it effective.

Senator MILLEN.—Exactly. What I take to be the purpose of discussion here is exactly what would be the purpose of discussion by a public meeting, and that is the expression of our opinions. We are here, not for the purpose of coercing or overruling the Public Service Commissioner, but to point out by criticism of his scheme where he may unhappily have erred, and to offer suggestions. We cannot say that we will force the Public Service Commissioner to do what he thinks is wrong, but I venture to believe not only from the high position he occupies, but from a knowledge of the gentleman himself, that any suggestions made, and any criticisms directed against his scheme by honorable senators will be taken into his serious consideration. That is all I think that Parliament asks. The Public Service

Commissioner is, like all other human beings, liable to err. That he cannot all at once provide a scheme, giving absolute theoretical justice to everybody, is proved by the fact that his amended scheme differs somewhat from his original scheme. That is an admission in the most practical form that not only once, but continually, there will have to be a revision of the work accomplished in this direction.

Senator GIVENS.—The Act provides for such revision.

Senator MILLEN.—One can easily see that, in our Public Service, considering its numbers, and the enormous area over which it is distributed, anomalies will be continually presented. I take it that the highest work the Commissioner can do is to direct his efforts towards removing anomalies, or anything which has the suggestion of unfairness or injustice. When Senator Pearce was speaking, I interjected that two previous Governments had accepted the scheme. I find that I was not strictly correct, because Mr. Watson, when Prime Minister, is reported in Hansard to have said—

I cannot promise that the Government will not accept this scheme, however, because, so far as we are concerned, it has been accepted.

I was correct so far as one Government was concerned, but I was not correct in saying that the succeeding Government had also accepted the scheme. It is quite clear that on general principles it had been accepted by the Watson Government. I desire to refer to one section of the Public Service. I recognise, as clearly as any one can do, the impropriety of bringing before the Senate individual cases. I indorse the wisdom of the sentiment expressed by Senator Keating yesterday, when, in reply to a question as to the rights of public servants to make representations, he said that every case would have to be considered on its merits. Whilst I think that it would be extremely undesirable, as it is illegal, for public servants to seek political influence, still it is quite obvious that if they do suffer under a wrong, it would be a monstrous injustice to prevent them from taking some steps to bring it before Parliament.

Senator DOBSON.—The regulations provide the steps to be taken.

Senator MILLEN.—Let us assume, for the moment, that there is some absolute wrong which the regulations afford no means of remedying. Is it to be said that public servants are not to have open to them that court of appeal which is open to every citizen, and that is the Parliament? I do not wish to be held to be encouraging the too frequent circularizing of honorable senators which has been going on. It would be a dangerous thing if we did anything to encourage that, because, from representations from big sections of the Public Service on main principles, we should find ourselves in the position of being importuned by individuals on imaginary grievances. I think it is not only open to us, but it is our duty to consider any serious objections or disabilities which are felt to exist by large sections of the Public Service, and which are brought before us in a proper and regular manner. I wish to refer to the position of one section of the Public Service in my State. I would remind honorable senators that when the Departments were transferred, the Constitution secured to the officers the maintenance of all their existing and accruing rights. The actual wording of section 84 is as follows:—

Any such officer who is retained in the service of the Commonwealth shall preserve all his existing and accruing rights.

That provision is binding upon the Parliament, and it expressed its willingness to observe the law, when in section 60 of the Public Service Act it affirmed that all existing and accruing rights should be respected by the Commonwealth, and maintained in full force and effect just as if the officers had remained under the States Governments. Starting from that point, I wish to draw attention to the position of the Customs officers in Sydney. By the accident of circumstances, these men have been deprived of the rights which would have accrued to them, and which did exist at the time of their transfer. Under the Public Service Act of 1895, New South Wales, for the first time, instituted a Public Service Board. The officers in the Customs Department were graded, and in it, in common with all other departments, considerable reductions were made, New South Wales having struck a time of depression, and being in the throes of a spasm of economy. A direction was given in section 9 of the Act that the Board—shall at intervals of not more than five years grade the officers employed in all departments of the public service to whom this Act applies.

If honorable senators will remember that the Act was passed in 1895, and that a regrading had to take place every five years, they will see that the regrading of the Customs officers had to take place under that Act just prior to the transfer of the Department to the Commonwealth. Whilst the actual work of regrading these officers took place in October prior to the creation of the Commonwealth, the regrading was only to take effect from the 1st January, the date of their transfer. The result was that, although these men were actually regraded under State control, the regrading was not given effect to, and they were transferred to the Commonwealth on their old grading. It was on the basis of that old grading that the Commissioner apparently proceeded to classify and grade the men under our Public Service Act. That they suffered heavily is disclosed by the fact that the officers in other departments remaining under State control, and classified at the same time, received substantial increases, aggregating £8,000 odd. It is reasonable to suppose that if the officers in the other State departments on their regrading received increments amounting to that sum, the officers in the Customs Department, if they had been regraded under State law, would have received a proportionate increase. As a matter of fact, they lost the entire benefit of their regrading, and, to show that I am not merely expressing my own opinion, I shall proceed to quote a passage from the Commissioner's report for 1904, where he refers to the unfortunate position of the New South Wales officers in these terms:—

As the Customs and Excise Department came over to the Commonwealth on 1st January, 1901, the Board was not in a position to regrade that portion of the service, so that the officers of the Department were transferred without being reclassified, but as the Post and Telegraph Department was not taken over until March, the Board undertook its reclassification of that Department in February so as to have it completed prior to the date of transfer. As a result of this classification the salaries of a large number of officers were increased, amounting in the aggregate to £5,060 per annum . . . so that the officers of the Post and Telegraph Department of the mother State were transferred with all their rights legally adjusted.

The Commissioner says that, owing to the fact that the Customs Department was transferred two or three months earlier than the Post and Telegraph Department, the officers in the former lost rights which were secured to and received by the officers in the latter.

Senator DOBSON.—Did the officers make that a ground of appeal under the Public Service Act?

Senator MilLEN.

Senator MILLEN.—In individual cases it was done. The mere fact that the Commissioner has specially referred to the anomaly which exists is, I think, clear proof that there is an injustice under which the Customs officers are resting. It is not a matter of opinion, but a matter of fact. This raises the question, Why did not the Commissioner make some provision to meet the position? His answer to representations which have been made is, I think, perfectly right from a purely legal standpoint, and it is that he cannot deal with any matters arising anterior to his appointment. There appears to me to be a legal difficulty in the way. The Commissioner took office on a certain date under the Public Service Act. He found certain officers in each Department, and he had to discharge his duties according to the terms of that Act. It was to be assumed that the officers would be transferred in a position of something like equality, but owing to a mere accident, an inequality has arisen, and apparently no power is given by the Act to the Commissioner to remove the anomaly. The relief must come entirely from Parliament.

Senator GRAY.—The Commissioner could do it indirectly.

Senator MILLEN.—That would at once open the door to charges of favouritism, and it would be straining the Act in a most dangerous way. The most casual comparison of the salaries of corresponding officers in New South Wales and Victoria will disclose remarkable anomalies. I do not propose to weary honorable senators by quoting the salaries paid to the corresponding officers in the two States, but I merely make this affirmation that as a result of the transfer in the way I have indicated an officer in New South Wales doing work corresponding to that of an officer in Victoria is paid a lower salary, merely, so far as I can gather, because he passed under the Commonwealth control in a lower grade than he ought to have occupied. That is the only specific matter to which I desire to direct the attention of the Government. I venture to think that honorable senators will support my contention that the case contains a clear element of injustice, none the less because it is unintentional, and the result of an accident. I have no doubt that the officers have a legal redress under section 84 of the Constitution Act, but I do not think that the Government or the Commissioner ought to refrain from extending a measure of justice until it is sought in the law courts. I ask the Government to confer with the Commissioner and see if it is not possible to remove the anomaly of which I have complained, and to mete out to these men not only the legal rights secured to them by the Commonwealth Constitution, but that full measure of justice which the Public Service Act contemplated.

Senator GRAY (New South Wales).—I also wish to congratulate the Commissioner on the complete manner in which he did his work. It is not my intention to make a long speech, because the ground has been traversed pretty freely by other speakers. I am very pleased to be able on this occasion to fall into line with Senator Pearce. I am against the regrading system, because I think we should try as far as possible to give every man who enters the Public Service the incentive that if he, by the exercise of intelligence and industry, shows that he possesses qualities which fit him for a higher position, the entire field will be open to him. I think I am speaking for the commercial classes generally when I say that that is the system which they adopt, and I do not see any reason why it should not be adopted in the Commonwealth service. The matter calls for attention, because there seems to be a distinction drawn between those who are serving as letter-carriers and those who are doing clerical work. The Government should be what I might term a generous employer. I do not say that it should be extravagant, but it should certainly treat its officers generously. I contend that under the schedule placed before us, the postmen, at all events, are not treated in the liberal spirit that the Commonwealth can afford to display. Take New South Wales. I believe that the maximum salary in that State before Federation was £150. Under the Public Service classification it has been reduced by £12 per annum. A salary of £138 a year means £2 13s. 4d. per week. I think that every New South Wales representative will confirm my statement that the cost of living in that State since Federation has increased by at least 20 per cent. I shall not enter into the question of the causes of this increase, but the value of the sovereign as a purchasing medium is, I say, less by 20 per cent. than it was before Federation. So that actually, instead of the postmen getting £2 13s. 4d. per week, they are virtually receiving £2 3s. 4d. We may regard postmen as doing work which is above the quality of that done by ordinary manual labour. Of course, I am not speaking of skilled labour. First of all they have to be men in whom the public have entire confidence. They are subject to laws which are much more severe than those which apply to men who are not Government servants. If a postman commits a serious fault he is not treated as any other person would be. He is liable to serve I do not know how many years' imprisonment for a fault which, if committed by a person in other circumstances of life, would be punished perhaps by a month's imprisonment or a fine. No doubt that is proper, because the public must have absolute assurance that their communications will be sacred, and will be safely delivered. A serious responsibility attaches to postmen. They must be good citizens in the best sense of the term. The hours they work are long. They start at six in the morning, and work till six at night. Although they have perhaps a few hours off duty during the day, they are not able to put those hours to any practical use. These conditions should not be lost sight of in fixing the remuneration of the men. I really think that £150 a year, or even £3 per week, would not be too much to pay to them, considering the nature of the services they render. Of course, like other people, if they are careful men, they wish to put by little savings in order that they may have something to fall back upon when their services are dispensed with. I know it has been stated that to pay a salary of £150 a year or £3 per week to all those who have been a certain number of years in the service would involve an increase in expenditure of £30,000 a year. I have not gone into the figures carefully, but I really cannot understand how so much as £30,000 would be required. Perhaps the Minister will explain that to the Senate. When we consider the extreme richness of this country—which is really a land of Goshen, according to the statements of the Treasurer in his Budget speech—we are justified in believing that a career of great prosperity awaits it, and that the Commonwealth Parliament is warranted in adopting generous conditions of labour for all its servants who faithfully do their duty to the public.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—In common with other honorable senators, I regret that nothing definite can come out of this discussion. We can only criticise the classification scheme of the Public Service Commissioner, and it lies with him, I suppose, as to whether our suggestions are carried into effect or not. The Commissioner has been complimented on all hands upon the magnitude of his task. No doubt it has been a big one, but whether he has accomplished it successfully, as a number of senators seem to think, is to me a matter of very great doubt. He appears to have failed in the most singular fashion to grasp the spirit of the Act with regard to the remuneration of officers. Parliament fixed £110 as a minimum. It never intended that sum to be the maximum. If the Commissioner had given due attention to the spirit in which that provision was passed, he would have come to the conclusion that, as the minimum was fixed at £110, the maximum should also be on a generous scale. That is how I interpret the feelings with which Parliament was imbued when the Act was passed. Instead of doing so, however, the Commissioner—moved, I do not know by whom, or whether he was moved by anybody—says in his report that he has been careful of the finances—careful not to burden the Commonwealth with too expensive a service. I beg to submit that that is a matter with which the Commissioner had nothing whatever to do. It is for Parliament to say whether the Public Service costs too much or too little. He has failed to catch the spirit of the Act. Consequently we find the service seething with dissatisfaction.

Senator MULCAHY.—Will it ever be satisfied?

Senator STEWART.—Will the honorable senator ever be satisfied? Is there contentment for any man under the sun? I even hear members of Parliament grumbling at their salaries, and many of them have not the courage to say what they think publicly. If the honorable senator thinks that he is paid too much, he might give me a portion of his salary. I should be very glad to get it. Instead of the transferred departments of the Public Service being as a whole better off than before Federation, we find that, with the exception of those affected by the minimum wage provision, it is in a worse condition. It was not the intention of Parliament that that should be the case.

Senator MULCAHY.—Does the honorable senator make that as a general statement?

Senator STEWART.—I do, so far as it refers to the lower grades of the service. I do not wish to allude to the increases given to men in the higher ranks. Many of them have received handsome increases, which, if compared with the amounts granted to men in the lower branches of the service, would, I am sure, astonish the Senate. But we are here more to discuss the general terms of the classification, than to examine it in detail. I find that the Commissioner recommends, with regard to the general division in the Post and Telegraph Department, that the highest salary should be £138 per annum. In New South Wales, previous to Federation, the highest salary in the same grade was £150. In Queensland it was £140; in Western Australia, £140; in South Australia £150, and in Victoria £150. So that the Commonwealth maximum is below the maximum of every one of the States previous to Federation. This is a question upon which the Senate should express a decided opinion. If there are no other means of ascertaining the opinion of Parliament, I intend, unless some alteration is made, to move for the removal of the Commissioner from his position. That is probably the only way in which we can extract a clear and definite statement from Parliament as to what it thinks. I do not wish to take that step, but if it is necessary it must undoubtedly be done. Our intention with regard to salaries was that those paid for the Commonwealth Public Service should be on a scale, not necessarily higher than that of the salaries paid by the States, but sufficient to enable efficient, active, trustworthy men to live in comfort. For that reason we have provided that a young single man of twenty-one shall be paid £110 per annum. Most of us, I am sure, contemplated that such a young man would get married, and have a family, and thus increase his responsibilities. We expected that he would perform useful service in two capacities; first as a private citizen, and then as a public official. I think our intention was that such a man should be provided, within reasonable limits, with such a remuneration as would be sufficient to enable him to discharge those duties with credit to himself, and profit to the community. I submit that in the scheme we are now considering, that has not been done. Not only has the maximum been fixed too low, but by the grading system, it is almost impossible for any man, except after a very long period of service, to reach the maximum. The numbers in each of the grades are definitely fixed at one-third in grade 2, and two-thirds in grade 1. No matter how long a man's service may be, or how efficient, he cannot get into grade 2 until there is less than one-third of the entire number of employes in that grade.

Senator PEARCE.—And perhaps not then.

Senator STEWART.—And perhaps not then. This is laying down an arbitrary rule of the most vicious character. Instead of providing an incentive for the men to be attentive and diligent, it will have exactly the opposite effect. If men know that their best years, when they are most active, and probably most useful, are to be wasted in positions at low salaries, it will take from the service all enthusiasm and energy. I am inclined to believe, with Senator Gray, that Australia is on the eve of a period of comparative prosperity, and the result may be that candidates for the Public Service will be much more limited in numbers than hitherto.

Senator MULCAHY.—There will always be enough.

Senator STEWART.—That is no reason why public servants should not be decently treated. There is another grievance in connexion with officers who, under the State laws, were in the clerical division. A number of these men in New South Wales and Queensland passed the ordinary Public Service examination, and, although they are now doing work which, previous to the classification, was regarded as clerical, that work has been classified as belonging to the general division; and while the Commissioner has retained to the men their clerical status, he gives them only general division increases. That is a distinct breach of faith.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It is a breach of the Constitution.

Senator STEWART.—It is contrary to the provisions of the Constitution, and Parliament ought not to permit this to be done. These young men qualified for the examination and passed, and they entered the service with a clear avenue of promotion and increases open to them.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—They are now graded with the stable helps.

Senator MULCAHY.—The stable helps may be just as good as many of those officers.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I dare say, but the stable helps have not passed the examination.

Senator STEWART.—These men entered into a distinct contract, and while they have kept their part, the Commonwealth has failed to keep its part. I do not think the Federal Parliament will give its approval to actions of this kind. The Constitution expressly reserves these men their rights, which, by the classification scheme, have been destroyed, and the men practically relegated to the general division.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Absolutely.

Senator STEWART.—Nominally these men remain members of the clerical division, though actually, so far as promotion and increase of salary are concerned, they are in the general division. A number of them have intimated to me that unless Parliament can give them redress they will be compelled to appeal to the High Court. I agree with Senator Millen that the Parliament of the Commonwealth ought not to compel the public servants to appeal to a Court in order to obtain justice. That is a degradation to the Commonwealth and to Parliament, and I trust that the Government will restore these men to their proper position.

Senator GIVENS.—By whom could that be done?

Senator STEWART.—It ought to be done by the Government, and, failing the Government, Parliament must do it.

Senator GIVENS.—We have taken the control of the Public Service out of the hands of the Government and given it to the Commissioner.

Senator STEWART.—Nothing of the kind. Senator Givens seems to think that because we have passed a Public Service Act, and appointed a Commissioner, we have shed ourselves of all authority in regard to the Public Service. I do not hold any such opinion. I take it that every act of the Public Service Commissioner is open to the criticism of Parliament, and that if Parliament does not approve of that official's acts, it may remove him, or get him removed.

Senator GIVENS.—That is the only remedy.

Senator STEWART.—Unless the anomalies are removed the Public Service Commissioner must be removed—that is the only alternative.

Senator WALKER.—“Off with his head!”

Senator STEWART.—We do not want to remove the Commissioner's physical head, though we may be called upon to deprive him of his official head, if he does not administer the Public Service Act in harmony with the spirit in which it was passed. I admit freely that the Commissioner had a very difficult task before him. But if anything of the kind I have described were done by a private company we should have every labour member in the Chamber condemning it as sweating. We do not use such strong or lurid language as probably we might if the Commissioner were not a public servant; but we have an authority over him which we do not possess over a private employer. With regard to a private firm, we can only bark, whereas in the present case we can bite. If the Public Service Commissioner does not carry out his duty in a proper spirit, we may get another Public Service Commissioner.

Senator DOBSON.—Is the man not trying to carry out his duty in the best possible way?

Senator STEWART.—I believe he is trying to do so.

Senator DOBSON.—Then why talk of nothing else but removing him?

Senator STEWART.—The misfortune is that the Commissioner tried to do a certain thing and failed. I do not see why we should pay a high salary to a man who deliberately ignores the spirit in which the Public Service Act was passed.

Senator DOBSON.—He has not done so.

Senator STEWART.—I submit that the Commissioner has done so. Not only has he reduced the maximum, and deprived a certain number of men of the status to which they are legally entitled, but he is compelling men in various post-offices to work hours that would not be tolerated for a moment in any private employment. Do honorable senators think that the Arbitration Court in any of the States would permit an employer to "string on" his men from five o'clock in the morning until ten o'clock at night in order to work an eight hours' day? Does any honorable senator think that a humane method of dealing with men? Does even Senator Dobson think so?

Senator DOBSON.—I do not suppose anybody does think so. I do not suppose it is a fact.

Senator STEWART.—Senator Dobson is an employer of labour, and I ask him how one of his clerks would like it if he were told to come at five o'clock in the morning and hold himself in readiness to work for the honorable senator at any hour the latter might choose until ten o'clock at night?

Senator DOBSON.—It is quite likely that such a man would have a better billet than a man working seven hours a day continuously.

Senator STEWART.—What kind of a billet has a man who must drag through all those hours? Before I entered Parliament I had some association with the Wharf Labourers' Union, although not a member, in connexion with some disputes with the employers. Those men were required to be in attendance on the wharf for a certain number of hours per day, but were paid only for the hours they actually worked. I maintained then, as I maintain now, as a good unionist, that if an employer insists on his men being in attendance during particular hours of the day, he ought to pay them for those hours just as much as he pays for the hours when they are working.

Senator WALKER.—If the men do not like it, let them go away.

Senator STEWART.—That is not like the honorable senator. The remark is most callous; indeed, I was going to say that it is even brutal.

Senator WALKER.—It is a free country.

Senator STEWART.—How can a man who has been twenty years a letter-carrier—

Senator WALKER.—I was speaking of wharf labourers.

Senator GIVENS.—The same principle applies.

Senator STEWART.—Certainly a man may leave and seek employment elsewhere; but are we to treat men unfairly simply because we have them caged up, so to speak—simply because they cannot better themselves, and are absolutely dependent on their present employment? Is that Senator Walker's code of morality?

Senator WALKER.—A wharf labourer is not paid by the year, but by the hour.

Senator STEWART.—I was citing a case where men were obliged to be in attendance between certain hours, but were paid only for the hours during which they worked.

Senator GRAY.—Was not that most exceptional?

Senator STEWART.—It might have been, but it was a fact in this case. I claimed then, and I claim now, that any employer who says to his man, "You shall be here at 5 o'clock in the morning, and I shall expect you to be in readiness to work till 10 o'clock at night," should be ready to pay that man from 5 o'clock in the morning until 10 o'clock at night. That is only equity. If Senator Dobson were asked to attend in Court for a client, and the case were postponed, would the honorable and learned senator not charge for that attendance? I am sure he would.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable and learned senator would say that that was different.

Senator STEWART.—It would be a distinction without a difference. We want an effective service. It has been truly remarked that the men employed in the Post and Telegraph Department, and indeed in all branches of the Public Service perform very useful and responsible work, and they ought to be well treated. Instead of having, as we have now, a Public Service bubbling over with dissatisfaction, we should try as far as possible to make our public servants happy and comfortable, as in that way only can we get the very best possible service out of them. I trust that the Public Service Commissioner will take to heart some of the criticisms that have been passed on the classification scheme here. We can all give him credit for the very best intentions. He wants to cut down expenditure, but I say that is no business of his. We are the people who control the expenditure. We are the people who say whether too much or too little money is being spent. He has nothing whatever to do with that. I submit that he should base his administration of the Public Service Act, so far as salaries are concerned, on the minimum wage. That is the keynote of the whole thing—a living wage of £110 a year for a single man, 21 years of age. We expect the ordinary man, when he reaches that age, to marry and have a family.

Senator MULCAHY. — Give him a premium to do so.

Senator STEWART. — I think he deserves a premium. I do not know whether Senator Mulcahy is an advocate of immigration, but if we are willing, by paying their passages, to encourage people to come from the other end of the world to Australia, should we not give some encouragement to the people we have here already? We might as well spend the money in one way as in another, and I think it would be very much better to spend it in the way I suggest than in the other way to which I have referred. If Senator Dobson would really take a broad statesmanlike view of this question, he would see how much there is to be gained by treating our public servants generously. I think that at least they ought to be treated humanely. I trust that the Public Service Commissioner will make the £110 minimum wage the keynote of his administration of the Act. There are a great many other matters to which I should like to have referred, but I shall not further occupy the limited time now at our disposal. When the Estimates come on, I hope to go very much more minutely into these matters than I have been able to do to-day.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I am not going to enter into a discussion of the report of the Public Service Commissioner, for fear that if I did so I might have points of order raised against me in the course of a few days, when I shall ask the Senate, on motion, to affirm certain principles connected with the classification of the Public Service. I am referring now to an evident and glaring omission in our Standing Orders. We have a standing order that apparently limits the anticipation of motions on the notice-paper. Apparently it does and apparently it does not, if we are to accept a ruling of the President, which I do not for an instant contest. The President indicated this morning that there was the strict letter of a standing order and its spirit, and he gave a ruling in accordance with the latter. I am not questioning or reflecting in any way on that ruling, as the President quite understands. In view of his attitude, I did not join in the discussion on the point of order this morning. But I say that while we have apparently a standing order with reference to the anticipation of motions, we have not what is customary in some Parliaments, and what I have been accustomed to for about twenty-five years—a standing order that limits anticipation of debates. To put it briefly, the Standing Orders to which I have been accustomed would prohibit the discussion on a motion for adjournment of any matter on the business-paper. Of course, we are talking at large to-day, and this is a discussion which is not restricted to the classification scheme. It is unrestricted, and I propose to talk about a lot of things.

This is a field-day, and I am out for a canter. I propose to talk about certain interesting pictures, for instance, and a number of other things. I am now speaking of this question of anticipating discussions, as well as motions. In the House of Commons, one cannot anticipate a discussion any more than he can anticipate a motion. In New South Wales, it is commonly ruled by Speakers that if it is sought to discuss a question—

Senator DOBSON.—Is the honorable senator in order?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am in order in talking about anything on the motion before the Senate.

Senator DOBSON.—That was not the intention when the motion was put from the Chair.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—There is no motion, but the one that the House do now adjourn.

Senator DOBSON.—It was moved for a particular purpose.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It was not submitted from the Chair in that way, in accordance with a suggestion made by me, because I foresaw a difficulty.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not think we should talk about the Standing Orders during this discussion.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If, as I believe he is, Senator Dobson is a member of the Standing Orders Committee, the honorable and learned senator overlooks what he had a hand in framing. In any case, the President is keen enough to pull me up if I am out of order. I say that this is a general discussion. It has been very commonly ruled in the New South Wales Parliament that the adjournment of the House cannot be moved to discuss a motion which can be equally or, possibly with greater convenience, discussed on, say, the Estimates, that are then on the table of the House. I mention that as an illustration of the practice to which I have been accustomed. I think that the Standing Orders Committee might very properly consider the question of the anticipation of a debate, as provision has apparently been made in respect of the anticipation of motions. Here again arises a difficulty. A Bill introduced yesterday, is set down for its second reading on a certain date. That Bill in one of its parts, I find, deals with the self-same matter in respect of which I have had a motion on the paper for some weeks. It will be an interesting and possibly an intricate matter of discussion as to whether I can go on with my motion now that a Bill has been introduced which deals with the same question. I hope that the Standing Orders Committee will take some of these matters into consideration. What I have been saying about the Standing Orders of the New South Wales Parliament applies with equal force and as appropriately to the Standing Orders and practice of the House of Commons. We have, of course, eliminated all mention of the House of Commons from our Standing Orders, but though we cannot adopt their methods as a guide directly, we may perhaps learn a little wisdom from them. It is on account of this uncertainty as to the anticipation of discussion, or as to speaking twice on the same subject that I feel I am unable to go into the question of the Public Service classification to-day.

Senator GIVENS.—Then let other honorable senators do so. Why should the honorable senator block them?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am not blocking them. I am merely indicating the reason why I am not speaking on the subject to-day. But I give the Senate an absolute pledge that either on my motion already on the business-paper, or by some other direct motion, I shall raise certain questions for the consideration of the Senate. I will indicate now what one of those questions will be. I shall seek to ascertain the opinion of the Senate with reference to the removal, without fault, failure, or defect, on the part of the officers concerned, of certain officers from one class to another by which removal they have suffered disabilities and disadvantages which they did not experience in the position they occupied in the service when the Departments were taken over. On that point I shall ask the Senate to express an opinion as to the maintenance of the rights under the Constitution of certain officers from whom it is proposed by the classification scheme, to take rights which the Constitution guarantees. I make this announcement in advance so that honorable senators may know that when I do not go into these matters to-day, it is for a specific reason. I quite agree with honorable senators who say that we may discuss any rational matter relating to the Public Service of the Commonwealth. I take it that when we appointed the Public Service Commissioner, we passed over to him all dealing with individual cases, and unless there were a case of so extremely gross a character that there was no other means of healing the wound than by bringing the matter before this Chamber, I imagine that there is not one honorable senator who would desire for a moment to bring forward individual cases. There is, however, a great deal of difference between making this Chamber a place for grievance mongering, and making it a place for the discussion of large questions of constitutional right and equity in dealing with the employés of the Commonwealth. Though I do not go into details to-day, I wish it to be clearly understood that I reserve my freedom of action on a definite motion, and not on an indefinite motion—or rather on no motion at all, because I regard this discussion as being on no motion, and as merely a beating of the air. As I shall, therefore, on some future occasion, ask the Senate to affirm some definite propositions with reference to the classification scheme, I shall not discuss it to-day, because if I did so I might be pulled up by-and-by under a standing order that seems to be capable of bearing two meanings. The Minister gave us some interesting information about paying £92 for four pictures that are openly offered in the Chamber for £3 3s. a piece. That is an evidence of extravagance, not on the part of the present Government, because I do not suppose they did it, but on the part of the many evanescent Administrations which the Commonwealth has been blessed with during the last few months. Which of them it was that did this thing I do not know; but I do not think it ought to have been done. The picture is not worth the money. The subscribers do not think it is worth the money, because after they have paid their money, they offer the picture back at a reduction. Senator Matheson offers openly for £3 3s. something which cost him very much more.

Senator MATHESON.—One was sold for £3 3s. in Perth.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I know the case of an honorable senator who, having to write a cheque for £20 in fulfilment of an agreement, forwarded the cheque with an offer that the syndicate should take the copy off his hands at £15, but there were no takers.

Senator GIVENS.—Does the honorable senator think that a copy is worth 15s.?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I would not pay for a frame for a copy, because it does not represent what took place. It is not historical. It is a fancy sketch of some gentlemen, who, observed from a little distance, look like a number of persons trooping out of a smuggler's cave. When I saw the thing in the Queen's Hall I never dreamt that it was anything more than a fancy sketch of a newly discovered mystery in the way of lime-stone caverns. When I got a little closer, I was quite surprised to find that it was supposed to represent something at which I was present, and which was very different. I am not questioning the art of the picture.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable senator is not allowing room for the artistic imagination.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I admit that the whole thing is artful. I beg to intimate to the Ministry that, if no one else does, I shall want to know who is to pay the cost of the advertisement for the syndicate, involved in the shipping of the picture from England to Australia, and taking it round the States. That is what it comes to, to speak plainly. A picture of that kind, the property of so august an owner as the high personage who accepted it, and has now lent it, cannot be travelled round in a packing case by itself. Two or three persons will be in charge of the picture, and it cannot be exhibited without a good deal of expense. We are told that it has been brought out here as an exhibit. For what purpose? Not to exhibit what took place, but to exhibit what a syndicate has for sale.

Senator WALKER.—The likenesses are good.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If it comes to a question of likenesses, one can get a fine view of a portion of the top of the heads of some persons, and, right in the foreground, an excellent view of some other persons who were not present. All that is given in. Nature is not represented, but I believe high art is. I wish to know who is going to pay the freight, insurance, and salaries of the persons in charge, and take all the responsibility of this work of art. Is it to be done at the expense of the Commonwealth? I understand that it is. It is rather too bad, if the Commonwealth is to be converted into a respectable advertising medium for a syndicate. I shall certainly take some step, unless Senator Matheson intends to follow up the matter. I do not wish to discuss the picture so much as the extravagance of buying such an exceedingly useless production and hanging it in rooms where it is calculated to give persons the nightmare. I object to the extravagance of paying £20 each for pictures which, as Senator Matheson says, are in the market for £3 3s. I also object to the evident intention of expending public money in a huge travelling advertisement for a syndicate's prints. I have taken up these three rational points, and spoken rather broadly, because I do not wish to go into too many details. I do not know that there is anything else I need talk about to-day. I have never spoken here before on a motion of this character, and if I have introduced one or two topics I was quite free to do so, and perhaps it may save time on another occasion. I hope that a very early opportunity will be afforded to the Senate to express an opinion pro or con, with reference to certain principles involved in the classification of the Public Service. I have not the slightest intention of submitting the case of an individual officer. I know of no such case. An individual case can better be fought out through the methods provided by the regulations, but the larger questions of constitutional right, of equitable right, and of general policy, are matters which no one for an instant can say ought not to be debated in a House of Parliament. Surely it cannot be maintained for one instant that when we placed in the hands of a very capable, courteous, and well-meaning gentleman—the Commissioner—very high and responsible duties, we parted with our duty as well as our right of maintaining as far as possible the principles of constitutionality and equity in dealing with the great body of the Public Service. I venture to submit that highly placed as members of any Ministry or Executive Council may be, they are not superior to Parliament. Ministers are made or unmade because of its action; Ministers and Executive Councillors are its agents. It is not possible for us to personally supervise the details of Ministerial office. It is absolutely necessary that there should be Ministers to administer, and these gentlemen, however highly placed, and entitled though they are to our utmost regard, are still the agents of Parliament just as we are the agents of the electors. It is a question of the delegation of authority throughout. The whole of the people cannot sit in Parliament. In the old days the whole of the people used to sit in the Witenagamote, and as the rule became inconvenient Parliament was instituted. In like manner, as the power and size of Parliament increased, Ministers came into vogue to carry out the details, to be its agents, and not its superiors. I am sure that no one here will think that I seek to belittle the position of Ministers. On the contrary, it is a very high honour for any man to be the agent of a great body of the people. It is a very high honour for a Minister to be the agent of Parliament, but he is not its superior. I do not accept the proposition that because the Executive Council did not do a thing we ought to do nothing. That might be a very strong reason why we should act. If the Executive Council neglect their duty that is no excuse for us to neglect our duty. Where large questions of public policy and equity, and above all where the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, are concerned, the Senate, as well as the other House, has an inalienable right to step in and act.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—I am very pleased that at last the Senate has been afforded an opportunity to criticise the classification scheme. At one stage of the proceedings I thought it was going to be denied to us. Parliament is an institution which must of necessity keep its ears open for complaints, and ventilate them when it is necessary. It is quite a mistake to think that the whole control of the Public Service has been handed over to the Commissioner. He has to be invested with certain powers to administer the Public Service, but the final court of appeal must always be the Parliament. It would be a very great mistake on our part to refuse to ventilate what we think are grievances after every other means had been taken to get them redressed. Boards of appeal were instituted to hear the complaints of public officers. The right of appeal has been exercised, and if any grievances remain unredressed it is a right and proper thing for either House of the Parliament to express an opinion thereon. Surely no one can cavil at an action of that kind. I cannot understand the attitude that has been taken up by certain honorable senators in reference to grievances which we know to exist in the Public Service. I do not think any one desires to go out of the way to say a harsh word about the Commissioner. It is generally recognised that he has done his best to put the Public Service on a satisfactory footing. But I do not think that any man possesses all the knowledge and ability requisite to do a work of that kind properly. I believe that the Commissioner is the last man who would claim that he alone knew everything. I believe that he courts criticism on his scheme, and is anxious to learn the opinion of honorable senators, so that he may alter that which needs amending, and in that spirit, I wish to offer a few remarks. I cannot understand how Senator Dobson can assume such a strong attitude as he has taken up with reference to this matter. When the Public Service Bill was being discussed, there was no senator who was so hostile to the appointment of a Commissioner as he was. He moved an amendment to strike out the provision for the appointment. He roundly condemned any such appointment, and used language that was harsher than that of any one else who spoke on the subject. I also was opposed to the appointment of a Commissioner, and nothing that has since happened has altered my opinion. But evidently Senator Dobson has changed his view. Let me recall to the memory of the Senate what Senator Dobson said with regard to the control of the Public Service by a Commissioner in 1901. He said—

Senator Neild drew the attention of the Senate to what happened some years ago in the State which he represents, where the Public Service Act to which he referred was passed. The report of the Committee of which Senator Neild was chairman, shows that the Public Service Board of New South Wales committed some gross cases of hardship, cruelty, and injustice. I find that every word Senator Neild had told the Senate the other evening is more than justified by the unanimous findings of the Committee. . . . In accordance with the hint that something like £200,000 or £300,000 had to be saved with regard to the civil service the board went to work, and as the report of the Committee shows, committed some gross injustices. They got rid of men who had been 20, 30, and 40 years in the service just before they were entitled to pensions. Some cases of this kind were so manifestly unfair that Parliament afterwards undid the work which the Commissioners had done.

Things have been done under the classification scheme that cannot be permitted to go on without protest, and if we can show good reasons for undoing them, why should we not do so? But according to Senator Dobson, it appears to be impossible for the Commonwealth Commissioner to make any blunders such as have been committed by other Commissioners. Here is another case which the honorable and learned senator pointed out during the same debate—

I commenced to look into this matter carefully two or three weeks ago, and since then two or three times a week I have seen paragraphs in the journals which lead me to suppose that there is more dissatisfaction existing now in the Civil Service of Victoria than exists in any other State of Australia, where I believe we have not the same amount of wire pulling. What do I find? I find that the teachers of Victoria in the State schools are all dissatisfied with their classification.

If the State school teachers of Victoria were dissatisfied with the work of the gentlemen who had the preparation of the classification scheme in this State, and that scheme could be criticised in the State Parliament, surely we have a far better right to criticise a scheme in which Federal officers are interested. Further on, in the same speech, talking about the dissatisfaction that prevailed, Senator Dobson said—

I made some inquiries in connexion with the Railway Department, and I am told that scandals have arisen there.

The honorable senator said that these things had occurred in consequence of the appointment of Commissioners to manage the service, and he condemned them on account of the gross abuses that had been committed in connexion with classification schemes drawn up by other Commissioners. But to-day Senator Dobson looks upon it as a horrible idea that Senator Stewart should suggest that the office of Public Service Commissioner ought to be abolished. Why this sudden change—this Jump-Jim-Crowism—to which, however, we know that he is so subject? Let the honorable senator look over the speech from which I have quoted. Then he will understand what I have said about him.

Senator DOBSON.—Suppose I do not want to understand?

Senator DE LARGIE.—That would be in accordance with the honorable senator's general attitude. His inconsistencies are so many that when they are suddenly brought under his notice he feels ashamed of himself.

Senator DOBSON.—I wish to be loyal to the decision of Parliament, and not to bring in political influence.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I wish to see justice done. So far as concerns political influence, I venture to say on very good authority that no member of the Senate has used political influence more than the honorable senator has done.

Senator DOBSON.—That is absolutely incorrect in every way.

Senator DE LARGIE.—There is a rumour going around to that effect, and he should be the last to complain. I have never waited on the Commissioner to use political influence of any kind. Can Senator Dobson say the same?

Senator DOBSON.—I absolutely deny the assertion. There is not a shred of truth in it.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The treatment that has been meted out to the letter-carriers by the Commissioner has been mentioned by several honorable senators. I would point out that in the opinion of the State Parliament, as expressed by the Premier of Victoria, those officers have been unfairly dealt with under the present scheme. We must remember that the people of Victoria, not of the Commonwealth generally, have to pay the salaries of these officers under the book-keeping arrangements. When the officers were transferred to the Commonwealth, they were assured that nothing would be done to decrease the salary of any one of them. Indeed, it is asserted that it is a breach of the Constitution to attempt to do so. If the Constitution is to be altered, let it be done by Act of Parliament in the proper manner; but so long as the section preserving to transferred officers all their rights stands, no matter what our opinions may be as to its desirableness, we should honestly abide by it. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the opinions expressed by some of our leading men while the Public Service Bill was under consideration. It will be seen that they never dreamt for a moment that anything was likely to be done whereby the public servants of Victoria would be robbed of the rights which they brought over under the Federal Constitution. I know there is an opinion that letter-carriers should not receive such a salary as £150 a year. Some think that that is an exorbitant wage to pay for such work. But if we consider the responsible position which letter-carriers occupy, no reasonable person will think that £150 as a maximum is one penny too much. First of all, I will read the opinion expressed by Sir William Lyne when the Public Service Bill was before the House of Representatives. He said—

I wish to emphasize the point that in clauses 51 and 52 of this Bill, and in section 84 of the Commonwealth Constitution Act, there is a provision to make it quite certain that no trouble shall arise with regard to transferred officers, and that all the rights that accrue to these officers who are taken over from the States will be respected. It will show to the public servants that we are not unmindful of their rights, and of the way we are directed by the Commonwealth Act to deal with them.

Apparently we have been unmindful of their rights, or we should not have allowed the present scheme to come into operation without making a protest. But Sir William Lyne is not the only member of the then Government who is now in office who spoke in the same manner. In order to strengthen the argument that it is unconstitutional in a classification scheme of this kind, to reduce salaries, I shall read what the present Prime Minister said when he was Attorney-General, and the Public Service Bill was under consideration in the House of Representatives:—

It will alter the grading to some extent. Supposing there be a man in the fourth class, and the Commissioner were to say he is only doing fifth class work, that officer is entitled to his salary, increment and accruing rights, while the Commissioner might say that his office is fifth class and not fourth class.

Later on in the same debate the present Prime Minister said—

Oh, they bring their salaries with them. Their salaries cannot be reduced, but they may be increased—a very fortunate thing for them. If their duties are graded higher they will be paid better; if graded lower they will not be reduced.

That I should say is explicit enough, and those words pretty well indicate the general opinion of members of the Federal Parliament at that time, namely, that the transferred officers brought their rights with them. The Constitution is so clear on the point that I do not see room for two opinions; yet we find that the salaries of letter-carriers in Victoria have been reduced from £150 to the present maximum of £138. That is a clear breach of the Constitution, which the Senate cannot allow to pass without protest. It may be urged that the object of the grading is to make for uniformity in the salaries of letter-carriers throughout the Commonwealth; and I can quite see the difficulty that might be raised by acting on my suggestion. At the same time, it would be far better to risk a difficulty of the kind than to commit a breach of the Constitution, and do an injury to the Public Service. The Government ought to give this matter mature consideration, and endeavour to remove the anomaly. I quite recognise that if these larger salaries are paid, dissatisfaction may be created; but whether that be so or not, it is our duty to see justice done. I have very little to add to what has already been said with regard to district allowances. In Western Australia the cost of living is much higher as compared with the cost in the eastern States, and, unless something is done in the way of allowances, in order to make up the difference, the classification will not result in real uniformity. It is generally recognised that the cost of living is at least 25 per cent. higher in Western Australia than in the eastern States; and, in my opinion, that is rather under-estimating the difference. I know of many instances where the cost of living in Western Australia is 50 per cent. higher than in any other parts of the Commonwealth.

Senator WALKER.—In the gold-fields, but not in Perth.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Even in Perth, the cost of living is at least 25 per cent. higher than in Melbourne or Sydney. I can assure Senator Walker, who, I know, is anxious to see justice done, that if he compares prices in Perth or Fremantle with prices in Sydney and Melbourne, he will see that what I say is perfectly correct. I hope, therefore, that district allowances will not be confined to the gold-fields, but will be granted in some degree, to the letter-carriers and other members of the service throughout Western Australia. As Senator Pearce has pointed out, there ought to be a scheme prepared for allowances throughout the Commonwealth, and not merely for one State. I should like to draw attention to a matter connected with the Customs Department. I have been informed that, owing to a regulation, it is impossible for a Customs officer employed on outside duties, to obtain promotion to any of the inside positions. If there is such a regulation, it is the duty of the Government to see that it does not operate in such a way as to deprive officers of promotion. I have already mentioned this matter to the Minister representing the Minister of Trade and Customs, and I shall be pleased if the closest attention is given to it, with a view to obviating any unfairness. I know that other honorable senators desire to speak this afternoon, and I have abbreviated my remarks in the hope that the Government will redress the grievances mentioned, in such a way as to remove any ground of complaint.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania). — Most honorable senators who have spoken do not seem to clearly understand the rights of the Senate in this matter, though they contend that it is I who misunderstand the position. I never denied for one moment that Parliament has a right to discuss the matter. All I contended, when I raised the point of order two or three days ago, was that the question is not yet ripe for consideration by us. But what are we doing to-day? We are relieving the Governor-General in Council, which means the Executive, from a very responsible duty which the Public Service Act imposes on them, and which they ought to perform. Nothing can be clearer than that the Governor-General, or the Executive, may make objections to the grading and classification of the Commissioner, and that the objections thus raised have to be laid before Parliament, in order that they may be dealt with. It is very easy to see why two Governments have received classification schemes, and, saying nothing about the matter, have merely allowed them to come before Parliament.

Senator KEATING.—The two Governments did say something; both promised to allow the whole scheme to be discussed.

Senator DOBSON.—That merely accentuates my point. The two Governments did not comply with the obligation imposed by the Act, but in a very sympathetic and nice manner, said they would appoint a day on which the scheme might be discussed by Parliament. It is no wonder that the Executive shirk their duty, seeing that the requests of the letter-carriers, if granted, would mean an additional expenditure of £30,000 per annum. The Commissioner points out, as I gather from the speech of the Minister of Home Affairs, that if the salaries of these men are increased in the aggregate by £30,000 per annum, it will mean an expenditure of about £100,000 to similarly regrade the service throughout the Commonwealth. In their anxiety to discuss this matter, honorable senators are relieving the Executive of their responsibility to deal with the scheme and place before us the modifications and exceptions which they consider ought to be made. It would then be the duty of Parliament to deal with the scheme, in the usual manner, by an address to the Governor-General. I take it that the proper course is to send an address to His Excellency, pointing out that the Parliament approves of the scheme with certain exceptions, which they desire shall be brought under the notice of the Commissioner. That is the course pointed out by the Act, and it is that course which honorable senators are helping the Executive to shirk. Senators de Largie and McGregor are so exceedingly anxious to exaggerate any point against me that they unintentionally misrepresent me again and again; and I should thank those gentlemen if they would cease to do so. I desire to be friends with the honorable senators if I can.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Is it not a good deal Senator Dobson's own fault?

Senator DOBSON.—I am not dealing with Senator O'Keefe, but particularly with Senator de Largie, who, in his speech just delivered, so exaggerated everything I have said on this matter that, unintentionally, I believe, he grossly misrepresented me.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I quoted the honorable senator's very words.

Senator DOBSON.—I recollect that I objected to the appointment of a Commissioner, because, in my opinion, it is the duty of the Government to control and manage their own servants, a duty which could be properly carried out if the Executive got rid of political influence. It is rather degrading to Parliament to say that we cannot get a single Government free from political influence, and capable of managing the Public Service. Those are the opinions I expressed when the Bill was before us, but Parliament was against me, and the Act was passed. Can I not loyally accept an Act which has been passed by Parliament without being told that I am changing my mind? Cannot Senator de Largie distinguish between loyalty to an Act of Parliament and opposition to that Act before it became law? All the remarks which Senator de Largie made on that point are beside the question, and, so far as they deal with my conduct, they are gross misrepresentations. I desire to be loyal, as I must be, to the policy which Parliament, by a large majority, has accepted. I do not think there can be two opinions about our discussing this matter before it is ripe. We are unwise to think we are well treated when the Government name a day for the discussion of the classification scheme, seeing that it is the duty of the Executive to discuss it in Cabinet, and give us the result of their deliberations. Had the Executive desired to be loyal to the Public Service Act they would have gone through the classification scheme most carefully, or would have appointed the Secretary to the Minister of Home Affairs, or some one else whom they could trust, to do so. They might then have taken into consideration the whole of the appeals, considered the grounds on which they were made, how many were discarded, how many were allowed, and the reason for the action taken, and they could then have reported to both Houses of Parliament as to what objections, if any, could be taken to the scheme. I suggest, not that Parliament cannot discuss the scheme—that, of course, would be absurd, as we all know that we can discuss it—but that it is not now ripe for discussion. I am glad to think that honorable senators have done somewhat better than honorable members in another place in dealing with the question. They have considered that they should not deal with individual cases, but should discuss principles. I quite agree that in dealing with the classification scheme for a service of about 12,000 persons, principles only should be discussed by Parliament. But I find that whilst the first three speakers on the question in another place repudiated any intention to refer to individual cases, each of them wound up by bringing forward an individual case. One honorable gentleman brought forward two or three such cases, and said he had a dozen more with which he would not trouble the House. That, to my mind, is but a repetition of the evil which the Public Service Act was passed to remedy. I state unhesitatingly that the first great principle of that Act is to get rid of political influence, as far as possible, by the appointment of a Public Service Commissioner, and I have reiterated again and again that no matter what we do in that direction, Parliament does not, and ought not, to give up control. But we should use that control in the way pointed out by the Act, and we are not using it in that way. I direct the attention of honorable senators to what the Commissioner has to say, at page 44 of his report, on the subject of political influence—

As mentioned previously in this report, the appointment, promotion, and dismissal of members of the Public Service rests, in the absence of restrictive legislation to the contrary, in the hands of Ministers of the Crown. The past history of the States is not lacking in evidence of the unsatisfactory manner in which this power was at times applied. To possess the requisite political influence was in no small number of cases sufficient, not only to gain an appointment, but also to insure rapid advancement in the Public Service. Under such a system influence was the primary factor; merit merely a subsidiary adjunct.

It is only with the growth of popular control over State affairs that such a system becomes effectually checked; and the majority of the States Public Service legislation of recent years has been directed to that end, by prescribing a definite system of admission to the services, and of advancement therein. In no other piece of legislation has that principle been placed in the foreground more prominently than in the Commonwealth Public Service Act—the expressed intention of Parliament being that ability and merit should be the indispensable and only conditions of appointment and promotion, and that, as a corollary, political or other influence should be relegated to the limbo of the past.

As Commissioner, I cannot but regard the effectuation of the will of Parliament in this respect as the most solemn obligation of my office. As stated subsequently in connexion with my remarks on the "Recognition of Public Service Associations and Societies," I shall always be prepared to receive suggestions from any source in regard to matters affecting the service as a whole, and such suggestions will at all times receive careful consideration; but as the office of Commissioner is for the most part a judicial one—

There is much virtue in the word "judicial"— the impropriety of any attempted interference in the interest of any individual officer admits of no question.

Lest my remarks in this connexion may be misinterpreted it behoves me to state that, as regards myself, no attempt has been made by those in political positions to interfere with the free and unfettered exercise of the powers invested in me by the Legislature. At the same time, evidence is not wanting that some officers have, in contravention of the regulations forbidding such a course, appealed to outside persons for aid in advancing their individual interests. Regulation 43, interdicting such a course, and affording every officer a constitutional and proper means of bringing under my personal attention any ground of complaint, is as follows:—

"Officers are prohibited from seeking the influence or interest of any person in order to obtain promotion, removal, or other advantage. Any officer who considers that his claims for promotion or consideration have been overlooked may write a statement of his claims to the Chief Officer, who shall forward, without delay, such statement, with any remarks he has to make thereon, to the permanent head, who shall transmit it to the Commissioner for consideration."

I believe that regulation 43 is being very grossly violated. I believe that some members of Parliament are acquiescing in that violation by listening to the complaints of individual officers instead of referring them to the Act which Parliament has passed, and telling them to bring their cases before the proper authority, when they will come before Parliament in due time. There is no such thing as an officer having a claim being aggrieved or being unjustly treated without the knowledge of Parliament, because, if we permit the proper administration of the Act, as a last resort, every such case will come before Parliament.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Oh!

Senator DOBSON.—Have I not been saying so all along?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable and learned senator has all day been denying the right of Parliament to do any more than acquiesce in the scheme. I have so understood him, at all events.

Senator DOBSON.—Have I not said that when the Executive made their report on the classification scheme, the proper way would be to move an address to the Governor-General, saying that we acquiesce in the scheme with certain exceptions and modifications, and in such an address we could deal with hundreds of grievances.

Senator KEATING.—The Governor-General does not need our acquiescence.

Senator DOBSON.—He does, if Parliament is to have the last say in the matter.

Senator KEATING.—But it is not.

Senator DOBSON.—I say that it is, to some extent. It may not be our acquiescence, but we have a perfect right to say that we object, and we can ask the Governor-General in our address to bring our objections under the notice of the Public Service Commissioner.

Senator KEATING.—It is better that they should be brought forward now, so that the Commissioner may have an opportunity of hearing both sides.

Senator DOBSON.—Of course, my honorable and learned friend, in his desire that the Government should back out of all responsibility, will say that it is better.

Senator KEATING.—The Government, that was supported by the honorable and learned senator, promised this, and we are fulfilling the promise.

Senator DOBSON.—The Government I supported has disappeared, and another Government is now in office, the members of which desire to avoid every duty that might invest them with any responsibility, or might put some backbone into them.

Senator KEATING.—The honorable and learned senator does not understand the Act, or he would not talk so wildly.

Senator DOBSON.—I think I do understand the Act. I shall refer honorable senators to the Public Service Commissioner's comments on a section of the Act on which, I think, we agreed unanimously.

Apart from the extreme impropriety of attempting to secure outside influence, officers cannot be too early warned of the great danger attending such a course of action. Not only does such conduct at once discount the bond fides of the claims of an officer resorting to such a practice, but by so acting such officer renders himself liable to the punishment prescribed by section 46 of the Act, not the least serious of which is dismissal. All the rights of officers are amply safeguarded by the Act which, by establishing Boards of Appeal, provides abundant means for the impartial investigation and redress of legitimate grievances.

If honorable senators will read section 46 they will find that the punishment which can be meted out to officers seeking political influence in support of their cases is exceptionally severe. I am not at all certain that members of Parliament do right to receive the documents which have been sent to them on behalf of the letter-carriers. I got one this morning, marked "urgent." I opened it very quickly, thinking it might have something to do with the business of the Senate, and so it had. But these gentlemen are violating the provisions of the Act, and every one of them is in my opinion liable to punishment.

Senator CROFT.—If they sent a circular to the honorable senator it must have been by way of a joke.

Senator DOBSON.—When forcible arguments are being used, it is the practice of some of my honorable friends to simply turn them into a joke. Do my honorable friends believe that it is a huge joke to make a regulation having the force of law, and then to permit hundreds of men to break the law?

Senator CROFT.—The honorable senator misunderstands me. I say that it was a joke to send him a circular.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not misunderstand the honorable senator, who is trying to make a joke at my expense out of a very serious matter. I regard the well-being and just treatment of the civil servants as one of the most important things which could engage our attention, but so long as political influence is exerted on their behalf it will not make for justice. I hear honorable senators talk about treating the public servants generously. I do not understand the expression. We should rather treat them fairly, as compared with each other, with men occupying similar positions outside, in accordance with the state of our finances, and in accordance with the Constitution, which has embedded in it certain rights possessed by the civil servants.

Senator PEARCE.—Does the honorable and learned senator consider it a breach of the regulations that a number of civil servants should appoint an elected representative to approach members of Parliament to lay before them, not individual grievances, but matters of general principle?

Senator DOBSON.—I think it is. Nothing could be plainer than the regulations which forbid any public servant to seek outside interference.

Senator PEARCE.—For himself.

Senator DOBSON.—My honorable friend wishes me to admit that the Act permits a civil servant to represent the grievances of a number of his fellow-officers through a member of Parliament. By-and-by the honorable senator will probably assert that the public officers are charged with the duty of seeing honorable senators to put their cases before them. I see of nothing of the kind in the Act. What is suggested is merely again opening the door to political influence, and that is a very great mistake. I have noticed that honorable members in another place, in bringing forward grievances, have objected to the form of appeal board provided, on the ground that it is not fair. I think that it is a very fair board. We passed the Public Service Act, and twelve months afterwards, because certain men say they are dissatisfied, honorable members in another place contend that the Act is all wrong.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not think that the honorable and learned senator is justified in saying such things.

Senator DOBSON.—The appeal board consists of three officers, one of whom is the inspector, who may have had a good deal to do in advising the Commissioner as to the grading of the men. He could not be eliminated from the board, because every detail in the comparison between officers of the same branch of the service is most important. As a set-off against the inspector, there is a public servant elected by his fellow-officers to represent their collective and individual interests. Then we have the chief officer of the Department, in which the public servant who claims that he is aggrieved is employed. We know that a Customs officer will speak up for men in his Department as against men in the Post and Telegraph Department, and vice versa; and it appears to me that any unconscious bias supposed to be in this appeal board is rather in favour of the officer making an appeal than against him.

Senator MCGREGOR. — Did the written document which the honorable senator received this morning contain a reference to any individual claim?

Senator DOBSON. — No.

Senator MCGREGOR. — Then what is the honorable senator talking about?

Senator DOBSON. — It did not contain a reference to an individual claim, but to a claim which affects some 1,500 men, more or less, and although it commences "Sir," it is not signed. The very form of communication adopted shows, on the face of it, that these men are aware that they are contravening the regulations.

Senator KEATING. — I do not think any one but the honorable and learned senator would hold that such a circular is a contravention of the regulations.

Senator DOBSON. — I absolutely differ from Senator Keating. I do not know how any one who reads the regulation could say anything else. I do not know whether the change in my honorable and learned friend's position has slightly turned his large head.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD. — Or some one else's little one.

Senator DOBSON. — It seems to me that he has taken an extraordinary point. I quite admit that there are some very intricate constitutional points affecting the meting out of justice to our public servants. Senator Millen very clearly established the contention that injustice appears to have been done in one instance, but how we are to get over the difficulty, I do not know.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD. — Will Senator Dobson say that it was an impropriety to bring forward an injustice of that character, seeing that the honorable and learned senator admits that it is an injustice?

Senator DOBSON. — As I have already pointed out, there is a proper way in which to bring forward these matters. If civil servants think that it is a short cut to go to members of Parliament with their grievances, all I can say is that the law forbids them to do so, and it is of no use for us to make laws and regulations which are to have the force of laws if they are to be broken. I say we should carry out the law. The injustice suggested in connexion with the grading of letter-carriers appears to have some foundation, but the Public Service Commissioner has given two or three answers in which I think that to some extent he meets the objections raised. There are arguments on both sides. I desire to point out that the celebrated section 19 of an Act passed in the State of Victoria, three or four days before Federation was achieved, is a very mischievous section, and may cause the very greatest embarrassment. We can only mete out exact justice to every one of our 12,000 public servants by altering the Constitution and some State Acts. I hope, however, that we shall give the fullest measure of justice we possibly can. In another place I heard honorable members speak of some wrong having been done, but the action taken was in accord with the spirit of the Act. Suppose that a telegraph operator has been working at the instrument for ten or fifteen years, and is getting old and stale, possibly through the wear and tear of the work, and that younger men have come in with better hearing and smarter fingers, who can send as many messages in three hours as the older man could send in four or five hours. It may be that they are placed above the older man simply because they are better officers. What is to be done in these circumstances? I understand that men who are getting stale at operating can be advanced, though not at once, to other situations. But if you intend to carry out the bed-rock principle of the Public Service Act, if you intend to recognise ability and efficiency rather than seniority, there must be hardships. It is always a hardship to an old servant to have a younger man placed over his head, but that is what we shall all have to put up with at some time or other. The Commissioner has a most difficult duty to discharge. Senator Stewart says that he may move that the Commissioner be removed from office, simply because, in his opinion, a few mistakes have been made. But I think that every one of us ought to back up that officer. We ought to help him to do away with any discovered anomalies when the proper time comes, and to do fuller justice than he has done. We ought to do ample justice and fairness to all civil servants in every possible way; but we cannot afford to be generous. This question of the Public Service may become a gigantic one. I have here an article from The Times, which will show the importance of this question when a large number of men have to be dealt with. When you have to grade 1,500 letter-carriers in one branch alone, you cannot grade men who are doing exactly the same sort of work in the same way as you can grade clerks into junior clerks, junior and senior letter-writers, junior accountants, and junior and senior copyists. In the clerical division there are scores of grades, which cannot possibly exist in the general division. Therefore, you cannot have the same number of grades in each division. Commenting on the debates on the Estimates for the Post Office at home, The Times refers to Lord Stanley's statement in these words—

He observed that if all the claims now put forth by these gentlemen were conceded the additional cost to the taxpayer would be no less than £2,500,000 per annum. Nor would this concession put an end to the agitation, for the advanced section of the Post Office employes have frankly declared it to be their opinion that the whole of the profits made by the Post Office should be paid over to them.

The profits amount to about £4,000,000, and the employes have already suggested a scheme whereby £2,500,000 would be handed over at once, and if their other scheme were acceded to the whole of the profits would be handed over. The article goes on to say—

Lord Stanley now announces concessions which will cost the taxpayers at once £224,000, and ultimately £372,000.

So that they are giving away £372,000, as against the £2,500,000 demanded by the employes. The Times goes on to say—

There is, however, a much larger and more formidable question involved than that of mere increase of wages.

Senator Stewart said the Commissioner had nothing to do with the amount to be spent, as that was a question of policy. In grading the officers and allotting the salaries he has a very great deal to do with finance, and we should think him a very incompetent officer if he did not keep finance before him at every stroke of the pen and thought of the brain. The Times proceeds to say—

It is a question which, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, goes to the very root of our political system, and threatens the independence of Parliament itself. That question arises out of the methods employed by the organized Post-Office servants. There are 183,000 of them, and there are 670 members of the House of Commons, which gives an average of 270 Post-Office servants to each seat.

There you see again the absolute necessity of getting rid of political influence, and adhering to the law as strictly as possible. Ministers are neglecting their duty in encouraging members of Parliament to abrogate that principle.

Senator Dobson.

Senator STYLES.—Does the honorable senator intend to convey that the members of the Senate are wrongly influenced by public servants?

Senator DOBSON.—No. I was contending that we should not be interviewed or written to by public servants. But as my honorable friend has asked me a question, let me give an answer. If a public servant meets an honorable senator in the street or in his office, very naturally he puts every point in his own favour, and omits to state any point against himself. He does not bother about the position of any other person in the Public Service. After listening to the man for five or fifteen minutes, the senator would come away—I know I should—unconsciously biased in favour of the friend who had been button-holing him. It is that kind of button-holing and influence which the Act and the regulations forbid. Is it not apparent that when a public officer comes forward with his individual case, he wishes to talk about himself and get promotion? Whatever his record may be, he will only tell you what is good of himself. It was very amusing to me to hear some honorable members in another place ask for a free and fair discussion so that the facts could be fully stated. The idea of a free and fair discussion in a House of Parliament bringing out the facts in regard to 12,000 public servants!

Senator PEARCE.—Why lecture us about what happened in the other House?

Senator DOBSON.—I am not lecturing my honorable friend, but pointing out how easy it is for members of Parliament, when appealed to by their constituents, or by other men who want a favour at their hands, to imagine that they are small Gods Almighty—that they possess all kinds of power. Honorable senators have no right to talk to the public servants if they wish to uphold the law.

Senator STYLES.—A man who could be influenced by a statement like that is not fit to occupy a seat in the Senate.

Senator DOBSON.—My honorable friend has forgotten that all this has been gone into before, and that both Houses of the Parliament almost unanimously said, "We are not to be trusted with the management of the Public Service." If the honorable senator objects to that let him object, not to what I say, but to the action of the two Houses. He took part in the debates, and if I were to turn up the records probably I should find that he approved of the appointment of the Commissioner.

Senator STYLES.—I do not know that I did.

Senator DOBSON.—I can quite understand members of Parliament nowadays trying to get all the power and perquisites they can.

Senator STYLES.—Is it in order, sir, for the honorable and learned senator to say that members of Parliament try to get all the perquisites they can?

Senator DOBSON.—I withdraw the expression, sir. I was only alluding to the fact that in to-day's newspaper there is the report of a speech in which a man is said to want more salary, and that a notice of motion has been given in another place that he should get more salary. Members of Parliament who desire to increase their importance, and to obtain more power than they have, forget that the Public Service Act, for the good of the country, took away some of their powers. When they try to regain those powers, they stultify themselves and Parliament. Is it not patent that they are disloyal to their own Act? Senator Styles is thinking of the good old days when members of Parliament were run after by public servants, and when that was allowed.

Senator STYLES.—I am thinking of the good old days when a man said what were the facts when he addressed the House.

Senator DOBSON.—If my honorable friend will show me where I have not stated facts, I shall be very happy to correct them. I was struck by the statement that the maximum grade for the country carriers was larger in all the States than it appears to be by the classification. The difference is not very large—£138 against £140 and £150. It is perhaps open to question whether the maximum allowed by the Commissioner is not a little too low. I do not say that it is or that it is not. But that is one of those things which we, by an address to the Governor-General, could ask the Commissioner to reconsider. I do not think that honorable senators quite understood, or even understand now, what is the right meaning of the provisions relating to the boards of appeal. After we had devoted weeks to the consideration of the Bill, boards of appeal were provided for.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The provision was discussed on the second reading of the Bill.

Senator DOBSON.—It was sought to almost take away the control of Parliament, but I have said over and over again that we refused to give up absolute control, and provided for boards of appeal. If it is thought that they are not fair boards, they could be constituted differently by substituting for the inspector a trained magistrate. On the other hand, the whole of this classification scheme is a most delicate piece of business. I am inclined to think that on each appeal board, we need a man who has helped to build up the scheme and knows perfectly well that if one brick is altered, the whole structure may tumble down, or injustice may be rendered. The farce of talking about individual cases, or listening to them, or even of talking about cases represented by scores or hundreds, is that when you deal with those cases, you do not know what other alterations you may have to make. No one who has not studied this business for months and years, as the Commissioner and his inspectors have done, could possibly say what the effect of certain alterations would be. All that I ask honorable senators to do is to carry out the Act, to have as little political influence as we can, and not to think we are doing any good by allowing public servants to appeal from the boards, who are well advised, to members of Parliament, who are ignorant of the circumstances.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—I am very pleased to learn that even Senator Dobson finds some justification for objecting to this amended classification. The very fact that it was amended shows that notice must have been taken of comments made somewhere, and the necessity for amending the scheme been made clear.

Senator DOBSON.—It was amended in accordance with the appeals.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I should be very sorry for the honorable and learned senator to imagine for one minute that I would endeavour to misrepresent him. I was only judging his attitude towards the public servants, and towards everybody else who has to earn his living, with the exception of himself, by his past expressions and actions when dealing with that section of the community. He has said a good deal about the influence which is brought to bear upon members of Parliament. Has any individual member of the Public Service attempted to influence Senator Dobson? Will the honorable senator answer that question? Has any member of the service interviewed him with respect to a particular case? If not, why should he assume that officers have interviewed other members of Parliament? No public servant has come to me with any particular grievance. But if officers have tried every legitimate means of redress, I do not see that there is any other course open to them but to come to a member of Parliament. Those who object to the citation of any particular instance would be the very first when a general complaint was made, to say, "Can you give us one instance where an injustice has been done?" Unless one knows of an instance, it is impossible to give one. It is the duty of any honorable senator who takes an interest in the affairs of the country to find out all he can; and if crotchety representatives, like Senator Dobson, demand individual instances, we ought to be prepared to give them. But I did not rise to object to Senator Dobson's opinions. All of us have a right to our own views, and it is only by an interchange of opinion that we can arrive at a sound conclusion, and give an indication either to a public officer or to the Government as to what we think ought to be the proper method of administration. Although to a certain extent I agree with Senator Pearce that we are somewhat hobbled in connexion with this question, yet I think that the debate will have a beneficial effect ultimately. I should be the last to make a threat. I do not believe in threatening. But there are means at the disposal of Parliament for redressing grievances, not only in connexion with the Public Service, but with the public generally. I wish to point out one or two instances, apart from anything that has been put before me by any section of the Public Service, but resulting from inquiries made by myself and others as to the effect of the classification. The first point is that boys enter the service as telegraph messengers. According to the Public Service Act, at the age of eighteen, if no suitable employment can be found for them in any other positions, they have to leave the service. That is all right so far as the Act is concerned. But when a boy enters the service as a messenger, and is diligent enough to prepare himself to pass any Public Service examination to fit him for another position, it seems to me that he has some right to a little preference. But, according to the treatment meted out by the Commissioner and his officers, when such a boy reaches the age of eighteen he is told, "If you want to join the Public Service, you must be treated as one of the general public, make application, and pass the same examination." I do not think that is fair. The Department, having had several years of that lad's services, and he having had several years' experience, it would only be fair, and in the interest of the service, that the boy should have some consideration as distinct from persons outside the service altogether. There is another grievance against the administration of the Act. When it was under consideration in both Houses of this Parliament, it was made clearly evident that when a woman in the Public Service was doing exactly the same work as a man, Parliament desired that she should receive the same remuneration. I declare emphatically that the Public Service Commissioner, his inspectors, and all those in authority, are prejudiced against the opinion of Parliament, and are not carrying out that intention. If Senator Dobson, or any one else, wishes to have instances, let him come to me, and I will point them out. I do not desire to occupy time in selecting individual cases which show the necessity for criticism, but I ask honorable senators to think over the matter, and if they are impressed with the point, I will give them instances if they cannot find them for themselves. Of course it may be said that if this policy is carried out, it will result ultimately in women not being employed at all. But those women who are already in the service should, according to the intention of Parliament, whether more are employed or not, receive equal treatment. If we employ men under the conditions that this Parliament set forth in the Public Service Act, the men, instead of working side by side with women in the departments, will probably be in a position to get married, and work side by side with the women in another sphere. I should like the members of the Government to take notice of this point in regard to the female portion of the service, apart from anything that may be done in connexion with the introduction of more women into the departments. It has been stated by the Public Service Commissioner that officers doing the same work, or occupying the same positions in different States, are to receive the same remuneration and be treated in the same manner. This is not being done. I wish to know why the inspectors under the Act are all treated alike in respect of salaries, whilst other officers are not? I do not say that the salaries of the inspectors are too high. I believe in paying those who are servants of the State ample salaries in accordance with the duties they perform. I do not think that the inspectors are paid too much. It is quite right that they should be treated alike. But is the same thing done in connexion with other departments? I think not. In the Customs Department in Sydney there is one examiner for the State who is getting about £360 a year. There are two examiners in Melbourne getting £485 a year, and there is one in Adelaide getting £335 a year. Is that treating people who are doing the same work in the same manner? It may be said that the duties performed in Adelaide are not the same as those performed in Sydney, which is a larger city. But look at the disparity between the salaries paid in Melbourne and in Sydney, where the duties are similar, and consider that there is only one officer in Sydney, whilst there are two doing the same work in Melbourne. I want to know the reason why, and hope that the Minister in charge will be able to give some information. I hope that the Commissioner will look into the point, and see whether matters cannot be adjusted on a more equitable basis. Although the whole scheme may bristle with points calling for criticism, I am only attempting to deal with those that appeal to me most urgently. I have every sympathy for the Commissioner. I believe that he is honestly doing his very best to make the service a credit to the Commonwealth. It is the duty of Parliament to assist him, and the only way in which we can do so is by pointing out anomalies and endeavouring to show where, in our opinion, changes for the better can be made. That is all that I intend, and I am sure that it is all that a number of other honorable senators intend. My next point is in connexion with the general division. A number of honorable senators have referred to this matter, and all I desire to do is to ask why any man—or woman—should be debarred from rising from the general division to any position in the service. I have not the least doubt that the Commissioner and his inspectors, and, probably, any member of the Executive Council in this Senate, would say that officers of the general division may rise to the highest positions if they qualify themselves. It must be remembered, however, that this promotion can only be obtained by entering into competition with candidates from outside; and I do not consider that is fair. Officers in the service should receive some consideration, if they exhibit ability and knowledge which suit them for any position to which they aspire. An instance, showing the unjust working of this regulation, has been brought under my notice in Victoria. In the past in that State it was the custom in the Postal Department to promote members of the general division to the position of supervisor or assistant supervisor in that division; but under the classification scheme, those positions have been placed in the clerical division, and thus men in the general division are shut out entirely. If a man from the general division were appointed it would mean promotion to a salary of £240 or £250 a year; but under the classification scheme, instead of appointing a man of experience, and accustomed to the work, a member of the clerical division may be appointed at a salary of £300 or £350 per year. I ask the Minister to take this matter into consideration, and see whether the injustice cannot be removed. I think I have stated some facts and arguments which are worth some little consideration, and I hope the advice of the Executive to the Public Service Commissioner will result in benefit to the Public Service, and to the people generally. There is nothing that would give greater satisfaction in Australia than a contented Public Service, working harmoniously in the interests of the whole community.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I listened with great pleasure to what Senator McGregor had to say, but there was one point in regard to which he is under a misapprehension. There is a means by which members of the general division of the Public Service can be transferred to the clerical division. Section 41 of the Public Service Act provides—

The Governor-General may, on the recommendation of the Commissioner, after obtaining a report from the Permanent Head—

- (d) with the consent of any officer, transfer or promote him from any one division to any other division, and, in the case of transfer or promotion from the general to the clerical division after such examination as may be prescribed.

I am glad that there is this provision in the Act, because, if we are to have a Public Service in which there is a proper esprit de corps, every officer should have the opportunity to rise to the highest position for which his abilities fit him. I am with those who think that £3 per week is not too much to pay letter-carriers of long experience, and, therefore, the maximum of £138 does not appeal to me as sufficient. As to promotion, it is always desirable to have an understudy capable of taking the place of the superior officer in case of necessity. I am glad that the Public Service Commissioner recognises that point. In his report he says:—

Considerable friction has been caused in the past in temporarily filling vacancies by the practice of allowing a junior officer to take up the work pending the making of a permanent appointment. As some time may elapse before it is possible to make a permanent appointment, the temporary occupant of the position is afforded an opportunity of learning the work, and thus making himself more efficient than his seniors, who have not been allowed an equal opportunity. In temporarily filling a vacant position, the practice should be followed, as far as possible, of selecting the officer who is senior amongst those who may have claims for the position, and this practice should not be departed from, except for very good reasons.

It is quite evident that the Commissioner is very anxious to have the Public Service as attractive as it can be made, consistent with efficiency. I do not think that the Commissioner will act with any hide-bound strictness, but, as circumstances arise, he will devise means of promoting deserving men from one division to another. There is another paragraph in the Commissioner's report, which appears to be most reasonable—

The point to be kept in view is that because an officer, through force of circumstances, has been appointed to a particular position, his future outlook is not to be permanently blocked. To a certain stage it is intended that the prospects of officers shall, as far as possible, be made equal—consistent with good conduct and ability. It is probable that in the early periods of the Commonwealth service, and until sufficient time has elapsed for the new conditions to have due effect, departures from the principles contained herein may be found advisable. Cases of such a nature will probably arise, and will necessitate special action, but, as far as possible, any action taken will be on the lines indicated, and with a view to rendering circumstances favorable for their general adoption.

Senator Stewart made allusion to wharf labourers being expected to attend on the wharfs from early in the morning until late at night, and expressed the opinion that they ought to be paid for that time. But wharf labourers, unlike public servants, are paid by the hour, and they can please themselves whether or not they remain in attendance. I take it that the shipping authorities simply mean that certain wharf labourers are expected to be there in case their labour is required; though Senator Stewart seemed to think that I was hard or harsh in suggesting that it was unreasonable for these men to expect to be paid for the time they wait. However, that is a matter that does not affect the Public Service. Many a man who passes an examination in the first instance, when he enters the service, might not be able, years afterwards, to meet the same educational test; and where an officer has been transferred from a State to the Commonwealth, and has already passed an examination, I think he ought to be permitted to rise without being called upon again to undergo the ordeal. With regard to district allowances, Senator de Largie spoke as if the cost of living in Western Australia is at least 25 per cent. higher than in other parts of the Commonwealth. The honorable senator may be correct; but, in an institution over which I have a certain control, we find that the clerks who receive an allowance of 12½ per cent. while in Western Australia, rather grudge returning to duty in the east. These men, at all events, seem to think that 12½ per cent. just about represents the difference in the cost of living as between Sydney and Melbourne, and Perth and Fremantle. I admit that in some places in Western Australia, an allowance of 20 per cent. would not be too much. Senator McGregor asked Senator Dobson if he had been approached by any persons and asked to use his influence in regard to the public servants. If Senator Dobson has not been approached, I certainly have been—not by a civil servant himself, but by his father. I shall read an extract from the reply which I sent, in order to show the ground which I took, and which I believe every other honorable senator would take under similar circumstances. I wrote—

In reply, I have to say that it is a distinct understanding that members of the Commonwealth Parliament are to refrain from using any so-called "back-door" influence to get promotion or appointments for their friends in connexion with the Commonwealth Civil Service. All appointments rest with the Public Service Commissioner. Under these circumstances, your son should write an official letter to the head of his Department, asking that he may be put in a position to become an applicant for the position he seeks. I believe that will mean some examination. You can easily understand that my life would be simply made miserable if it were understood that I was to constitute myself a means of trying to get promotion or appointments for persons in the Civil Service.

An allusion was made to the Postal Department in the United Kingdom, and to the enormous number of officials there employed. It was pointed out how many of officials there were in the English Post Office to each member of the Imperial Parliament; and I have calculated that the 1,500 Post Office employés in the Commonwealth Department represent thirteen to each of the 111 members of the Federal Parliament. I do not believe that the general body of the Post Office employés have any wish to break the regulations, but, as has been observed by Senator NEILD, where there is some general principle on which they desire to raise an objection, surely they might be allowed to address the head of the Department in order to have the anomaly removed.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—They have done so, and they have even submitted counsel's opinion without effect.

Senator WALKER.—Our desire is to do what is just to all our public servants, and I hope that there will be a thorough understanding that each officer will have an opportunity of rising on his individual merit.

Senator HENDERSON (Western Australia).—I do not wish to detain the House, but this is a matter on which honorable senators ought to express an opinion. At the outset, I recognise, with other honorable senators, that an extremely difficult task was presented to the Commissioner; but, having said so much, we also recognise that injustices have resulted from this great scheme. Whether those injustices could have been avoided is altogether another question. For myself, I am rather inclined to think that many were unavoidable, though, on the other hand, there are cases in which I think that, with greater care and attention, anomalies might have been obviated. I wish particularly to enter my protest on behalf of the officers employed in the lower grade of the postal service, and I base that protest on the remarks made by Senator Dobson. That honorable senator gave us clearly to understand that officers in both grades of the services must not only be citizens of the highest quality, but must be owned body and soul by the Public Service—that they must have no individual rights. It would appear that there is nothing for a public servant but to remain a public servant for twenty-four hours of every day. Such conditions appear to me to be rather cast-iron in their character. But in such conditions, the first consideration ought to be to give these men at least recompense for the work we call upon them to perform. The reduction from the salary of £150, in the case of the letter-carriers, to the £138 maximum, is one that can scarcely be justified. We have not heard an argument by which such an extraordinary proposal can be defended. Then, again, not only has the maximum been reduced by so large a sum, but prior to the compilation of this classification scheme there were opportunities of promotion open to the letter-carriers, by which, in isolated instances, certain members of that branch of the service could rise to a grade in which they might at least receive a respectable salary for their services. But under the grading system adopted in the classification scheme, it appears quite clear that these opportunities are now closed to the letter-carriers. I apprehend that, being debarred to the lower grade of letter-carriers, these positions are to be offered to officers in other branches of the service who are much better paid to start with, and who have altogether superior opportunities of advancing in the service from time to time. The particular instances to which so much reference has been made need not be quoted, but I may signify the positions to which I refer. For instance, the members of the general division of the service have hitherto had an opportunity of rising from letter-carrier, mail-officer, and so forth, to the positions of assistant supervisor and supervisor. But by the classification scheme these two offices have been entirely cut off from the general division. Consequently, men now in the general division of the service, and those who may yet enter it, may remain at the maximum of that division, whatever it may be, without any opportunity whatever of getting one step higher in the service. I am with honorable senators who have already stated that they believe in equal opportunities and equal facilities to advance being given to all members of the service. Under whatever scheme it may be brought about, it is a disgrace that certain favored positions in the service should be reserved for a special few. We ought to encourage efficiency, good conduct, and everything that is highest and noblest in those engaged in our service. There is certainly no better way of doing that than by offering to those who display zeal, ability, and honesty of purpose the reward of the highest positions in the service. Why should we build up a sort of Civil Service caste, create a ring of officers, and say that they and theirs shall retain the right to certain positions until the end of the day of grace, whilst others, who are equally plodding, must go along from day to day without any possible hope of getting higher in the service? I wish to say, in connexion with the appeal boards, that a certain course of action in respect of men who have committed offences has been very wisely provided for. In making provision for a board by which persons offending may be examined, and their conduct inquired into, the Act is to be lauded. But when we come to deal with the composition of the board of appeal, I am not so sanguine about the utility of the provision made. However advisable it may be to have an inspector on an appeal board—and I believe it is advisable—we have to recognise the fact that when an inspector appears on the board with the representative of the man appealing the chief officer of the branch being chairman of the board, will be much more closely connected with the work of the inspector than with the work of the individual appealing. Consequently, I believe that a number of appeals that might be made would receive very scant consideration at the hands of an appeal board, from the very fact that the men who have to sit and adjudicate upon them are the men whose action is really the cause of those appeals being made. How can we expect public servants who feel themselves aggrieved to be satisfied with the decisions of a court of this character? My own opinion is, that whatever may be the form of appeal board decided on it should represent both sides equally, and, instead of having a high officer of the service as chairman, it would be infinitely more judicious to have some man who would be able to give a decision unbiased by any previous connexion with the question on which the appeal is made, and I should personally prefer that the chairman of each appeal board should be a Supreme Court Judge. I hope that the discussion which has taken place will at least convince the Government that, in the opinion of certain honorable senators, the classification scheme is by no means as satisfactory as we hope it will be made in the future. I trust that such amendments will be introduced as will redress first of all those wrongs which appear so evident in the treatment of the letter-carriers, and that, above all things, there will be removed from the scheme any such thing as the grading of officers whose salaries are less than £150 a year.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania). — A great deal has been said about the position of the letter-carriers under the classification scheme. In going through the scheme, I made a number of notes of matters which I thought ought to be brought under the notice of honorable senators, but many of the principal points with which I proposed to deal have already been referred to by previous speakers. I shall consequently have very little to say. Briefly, I thoroughly indorse all that was said by Senator Pearce in reference to the letter-carriers. I do not ask for generosity in the treatment of the letter-carriers or any other class of employes in the service. One honorable senator has said that the Federal Government should treat the Public Service generously, but I incline to the belief that we shall be on the safe side if we treat them fairly and justly, and do not trouble our heads about generosity. If we extend to them the fair play and justice which are extended by private employers to their employes, we shall do all that can be expected of us, and all that we are expected to do by the majority of the employes in the service of the Federal Government. One or two points connected with the case of the letter-carriers have not yet been touched on. These are points which have been discussed by letter-carriers' associations throughout Australia, and which affect these public officers as a body. They feel somewhat sore about their treatment, and I think we are well within our rights in submitting our views on their case to the Public Service Commissioner. I may say something as to the immense amount of work which has been done by the Commissioner. I feel satisfied that he has done his very best according to the evidence before him to be fair and impartial. At the same time, we should be giving up our rights altogether were we to admit that we cannot discuss this classification scheme. As regards the poor chance of promotion for letter-carriers, a striking instance is afforded by the fact that during the last thirteen years there have been only fifty-three promotions in Victoria, fourteen promotions in New South Wales, and not one promotion in the other four States. The letter-carriers of the Commonwealth number 1,500, comprising practically a fourth of the men in the general division. The promotions for the whole of Australia during the last thirteen years have averaged six per year. That fact shows that out of a large body of 1,500 men only six will have a chance of promotion under the present system. Of course, as Senator Pearce pointed out, if some men lived to about 200 years of age, they might have a chance of being promoted, but unless they did, very few would get a promotion under this scheme. The remedy for this state of things is, I think, to abolish the grading system and to substitute a system of small annual increments for this branch, starting at, say, £100 and finishing at £156. After a letter-carrier or sorter had drawn a salary of £100 for one year, thenceforward he should receive automatically an annual increment of, say, £3, until he reached the maximum salary of £156. Surely it will not be denied that any officer who is considered worthy to hold the responsible position of letter-carrier is entitled to that salary. Although it may seem to some persons an easy kind of employment, still the position demands honesty and integrity in its holder. We know very well that although letter-carriers are not graded very highly, still they have vast interests in their hands. We ought to do everything we can in reason to insure honesty and integrity in the performance of this work. If we hold that opinion, then I maintain it is not too much for a man to expect that, starting at £100 at twenty-one years of age, he shall, in seventeen years more, reach £156. That is not a very munificent salary for a man who has served the Commonwealth for from twenty to twenty-five years.

Senator GIVENS.—Why not start the man at the minimum salary of £110?

Senator O'KEEFE.—He need not necessarily start at the minimum wage of £110. A public officer is required to be twenty-one years of age, and to have served for three years before he is entitled to get the minimum wage. It may be that a public officer, after serving for three or five years, is still only twenty years of age; and in that case he would not draw the minimum wage. But where a man has served for many years, it is right that he should commence with £110, and proceed by annual increment of £3 until he reached £156. When we look at what was done in the States prior to the compilation of this immense scheme, we find that in no State except New South Wales did the grading system exist. In Western Australia, Queensland, and Victoria letter-carriers could reach a maximum by a system of annual increment. The maximum was £150 in South Australia, £140 in Western Australia and Queensland, and I think £132 or £138 in Victoria, subsequently raised to £150. Some incentive should be offered to a letter-carrier to be efficient and honest and to build up a good record. Of course, it goes without saying that if my plan were adopted, the annual increment would only be granted when the official had obtained a good report from his superior officer. In Tasmania a number of public officers consider that they have not been fairly dealt with, owing to the fact that they have been removed from the clerical to the general division. For some years prior to Federation they worked in the clerical division and drew certain salaries, but under this classification scheme they are placed in the general division, and thereby debarred from the increments which are available to the officers in the clerical division. They will not now have the same chance of promotion as they would otherwise have had. I bring this matter under the notice of the Minister at the table, so that he may be able to ascertain what reason the Commissioner had for taking this step. I know that a number of the officers consider themselves very badly used by the transfer, and the consequent denial of the chance of promotion which their merits had earned for them. I desire to ask the Minister if it is correct that the majority of the telegraphists on the principal circuits in Melbourne have by the classification been raised in salary, and that the contrary is the case in Tasmania, with most of the telegraphists of long service who are engaged on the principal circuits.

Senator KEATING.—It was not on account of their being on particular circuits, but on account of their relative efficiency.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That raises another question, and that is the method of testing their relative efficiency. Is it a fact that not a member of the appeal board for telegraphists in Tasmania had ever touched a key? If that is the case, as I am told it is, I should consider that the board was not fairly constituted. As a layman, I should think that in order to be a good judge of a telegraphist's capacity a man ought to possess technical knowledge of the work. The opinion of the board would have been considerably more valuable if it had comprised a person with the necessary technical knowledge.

Senator KEATING.—It included the Deputy Postmaster-General, the Inspector for the State, and the representative of the clerical division, whoever he was.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am credibly informed that not one of those three persons had any knowledge of telegraphy, or had ever touched a key.

Senator CLEMONS.—The officers had an opportunity to vote for a competent man.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It is true that they, in conjunction with other officers, had to vote for a member of the board; but of course they were outvoted. They maintain that the board which tested their capacity knew absolutely nothing about it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I suppose that the board would decide upon evidence. An ordinary court might know nothing about telegraphy, but might have to decide upon it according to evidence.

Senator O'KEEFE.—An examination was held in June, at the instance of the Commissioner, in Hobart. Those telegraphists who were receiving £120 a year and under could submit themselves for examination for the purpose of showing that they were eligible to receive more than that salary. I state that there is no provision in the Public Service Act which permits such an examination to be held. I want to know under what authority the Commissioner and his inspectors ordered it. At all examinations candidates are more or less nervous, I am informed; but usually nervousness does not obscure a man's knowledge or hinder him from answering questions. But it is different altogether with a man's capacity as a telegraphist. It is asserted that the result of the examination depends entirely upon the candidate's nerves. The highest medical authorities agree that good telegraph operating depends largely upon the nerves, and that a nervous man cannot do himself justice. I may mention a case in point. A telegraph officer was transferred from the Railway Department to the Public Service in Tasmania some time ago. He worked the lines in the chief office satisfactorily, and had a clear record. He failed in the examination, simply through nervousness. Experienced men agree that an examination is no test of a telegraphist's ability. An inferior operator who was cool-headed might do better than a more skilful operator who was nervous. In the case of clerks and others, who form a large proportion of the service, the Commissioner is satisfied with the yearly efficiency reports from the departmental heads. Telegraphists allege that this form of testing eligibility for promotion is unfair in their case.

Senator KEATING.—The Commissioner must award the increases upon efficiency, and he has power to obtain such information as he may deem necessary to determine the relative efficiency of officers.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It is questionable whether he has not stretched his power in this case. It is worth while to call attention to an instance given in a letter in a paper published by the postal service in Australia, called The Transmitter. It says—

Re tests held in June to enable telegraphists in the fourth sub-division of the fifth class to rise to the higher divisions of that class, I would point out the injustice which will be done to some of the fourth sub-division officers if the manner of testing is not altered. No doubt some of those who failed, did so, like myself, through nervousness. To test a nervous telegraphist as he was tested in June is really unfair. In some cases men failed "purely" through nervousness, and the test was not altogether a test of ability. For instance, at the time of receiving I was so nervous that for nearly three minutes I could not write one word, though I could take it quite easily. To show that it was pure nervousness, I may say that two days previously I took over 1,600 letters in ten minutes without missing a single letter. The same thing occurred during the sending test, though not to such an extent; I was quite shaky. Could not the Commissioner see his way clear to do something at once for those who failed through being nervous, say, by referring it to the postmaster who was in charge by asking relieving postmasters and inspectors what abilities we possess.

Senator MILLEN.—Does not the honorable senator know that there is no man who has not some excuse for his failure?

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is not a fair way to put it. In the case of other officers, the test is a report from the head of the Department as to an officer's general efficiency and good conduct. In this case the test is largely a matter of the nerves of the candidate at the examination. It is asserted that in a number of cases great injustice has been done through this method being insisted on. Of course the officers put their contruction on the Act. No doubt they strain it as far as they can in their own interests. But it is right that the attention of the Commissioner should be drawn to their objection.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is so very easy for a man who has failed to make that excuse.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am willing to take a liberal discount off these statements, but it is only reasonable that when we are discussing the classification scheme such matters should be mentioned.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is a pity we have not the opportunity to go further, and pass a motion. What is the use of beating the air?

Senator GUTHRIE.—Why bark when we cannot bite?

Senator O'KEEFE.—Sometimes a bark is very effective, and the remarks of honorable senators may assist the Government in inducing the Commissioner to remedy anomalies.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That could only be done by the Governor-General returning the report to the Commissioner.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am strongly of opinion that the Senate has the right to discuss the classification scheme, and, in doing so, is acting in accordance with the spirit of the Public Service Act. I refuse to agree to the dictum of Senator Dobson, that members should be absolutely debarred from bringing grievances before this Chamber if they are satisfied that the grievances are real. If Senator Dobson were present, I should call his attention to the words of the Minister of Home Affairs, in whose Department this matter lies, only a few days ago, in another place. That Minister invited the criticism, not only of members of another place, but also of honorable senators; and for what reason? Presumably that the Ministry may be given some idea how it is desired this classification scheme should be dealt with. The Minister of Home Affairs, in the course of his remarks, said that he only mentioned the various matters to show that it was impossible in another place to discuss the question on the facts of the case without hearing both sides. The honorable gentleman went on to say that the Government had had submitted to them the scheme from the point of view of one side, and that it was intended to call on the Commissioner for a report on the other side; and that, when the Government were in possession of the facts, they would endeavour to do justice, not only to the taxpayers, but to the Public Service of the Commonwealth. It seems to me that those concluding words constitute the best of all reasons for bringing this classification scheme before the Senate. I re-echo the regrets uttered by a large number of honorable senators that we are not able to back up our opinions in a somewhat more emphatic manner than is possible with our present method of dealing with the question.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I believe we are debating a motion that the Senate do now adjourn, and I shall confine my remarks to it. Inasmuch as I recognise that the discussion on the classification scheme is wholly futile, I intend to say nothing on the question. I am not now speaking in any depreciatory way of the very excellent speeches we have listened to, but only indicating what I believe to be the resultless character of the debate. I desire to know to what date it is proposed to adjourn. If the Minister in charge can assure me that there is business for next week I shall be very glad to attend, and, if necessary, sit four days. We are being called together, and are likely to be called together, week after week, in order to do work which could be accomplished in a day and a half or two days; and this causes great inconvenience to all honorable senators who live outside Melbourne. If there is not work for next week, I urge the Minister to agree to adjourn to the week following, rather than that we should present the spectacle of a number of honorable senators attempting not to do work, but to fill up time by talking. I hope the Minister will pay some attention to the desire, not only of myself, but of other honorable senators, to get on with the work which the Senate has been called together to perform.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—I hope that the leader of the House will not consent to an adjournment for a week.

Senator CLEMONS.—I do not want an adjournment if there is work to do.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH. — I am pleased that in this matter Senator Clemons is of the same opinion as myself. Up to the present the record of the Senate for work is exceedingly poor. There have been comparatively few Bills initiated in this Chamber, though there is absolutely no reason why there should not be as many introduced here as in another place, excepting, of course, Money Bills. We have hitherto met for a day or a day and a half and then adjourned for a week, and that has gone on week after week. In my opinion, there is ample work for next week. There is that most important measure, the Copyright Bill, and, moreover, a number of honorable senators desire to express their opinion on the classification scheme. I do not agree with Senator Clemons that the discussion on that scheme is futile. When the Public Service Bill was before us I contended that, while we did away with political influence, we did not interfere in the slightest degree with parliamentary control. We have a perfect right to criticise this scheme, and carry any resolution we like, and the Commissioner will be bound to take notice of that resolution on general principles.

Senator CLEMONS.—We cannot carry a resolution under this motion.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—No, we cannot.

Senator CLEMONS.—Then, as I say, this debate is resultless.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH. — I hope the Senate will meet next week and do some work. Up to the present we have done very little.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—And next week we shall do less.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—We have ample business, including a continuation of this debate

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—How can we next week continue a discussion on a motion that the Senate do now adjourn?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The discussion may be re-introduced in a similar way, or in some other form. The classification scheme deals with the control of from 10,000 to 13,000 individuals, and the more discussion we have on a subject so important, the better.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—It has been suggested by Senator Clemons that the Senate should adjourn over next week.

Senator CLEMONS.—If we have no work to do.

Senator GIVENS.—I totally disagree with the suggestion. Honorable senators will remember that last session every time an unusual adjournment was proposed, I protested. I went so far as to call for a division on such occasions, and I intend to do the same this session as a protest against the way in which the Government supply the Senate with business.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable senator had no reason to protest against the last Government on that account.

Senator GIVENS.—If the honorable and learned senator will refer to Hansard he will find that I had, on many occasions.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They adjourned the Senate several times.

Senator MILLEN.—Might I ask Senator Givens if he advocates bringing honorable senators here when there is no work for them to do?

Senator GIVENS.—I do not advocate anything of the kind, but I say that so long as there is work on the business-paper for the Senate to do we should not adjourn until it is completed. If we agree to these lengthy adjournments the result will be that business will subsequently be hurried through in a slipshod fashion. We have very important business at present on the paper to deal with. There is, for instance, the Copyright Bill.

Senator CLEMONS.—Does the honorable senator think that will last over next week?

Senator GIVENS.—It is a very important Bill, and it should occupy our attention for a sitting or two if it is not to be passed in a slipshod fashion. I think the Government are to blame that there is not more business on the paper than there is. There is a plethora of work in another place where honorable members have more work before them than they can grapple with. Why was not the Commerce Bill introduced in the Senate?

Senator PEARCE.—Or the Secret Commissions Bill?

Senator GIVENS. — Those are contentious measures, and a full discussion of them in the Senate might possibly have minimized discussion upon them in another place.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—We could fill up time with a vote of censure, or something light and airy of that sort.

Senator GIVENS.—Senator Neild is no doubt an adept at that sort of thing. If he had his way the honorable senator would prefer to run the whole Senate himself. I am certain it will be a considerable time before he will be allowed to do so, but with his bumptious style, the honorable senator would overshadow the Senate if he were permitted. I shall take the strongest measures to prevent the adjournment of the Senate over next week. A motion to adjourn the Senate to an unusual date cannot be moved until the motion at present before the Senate is withdrawn.

Senator MILLEN.—Does not the honorable senator recognise that if he and his friends say that the Senate shall not adjourn, the Government will not propose to adjourn?

Senator GIVENS.—I have not recognised anything of the kind. I am putting forward merely my individual views.

Senator CLEMONS.—Will not the honorable senator even allow the Government to say whether they have business for the Senate?

Senator GIVENS.—I do not need them to tell me that when I look at the business-paper. Why should I ask any one to tell me something which I can see as plainly as the nose on the honorable and learned senator's face. I protest against any unusual adjournment, and I shall use the forms of the Senate to prevent it. If any unusual adjournment is moved I shall call for a division on it.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—In speaking to honorable senators earlier in the day, I found that a number desired that we should not meet next week, whilst a number also desired that we should. Those who desired that we should not meet pointed to the fact that there is very little business on the notice-paper.

Senator GIVENS.—That is not our fault.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am merely stating the fact. I admitted that there is not very much business on the notice-paper, and that we might possibly adjourn for a week. It is impossible for me to give the assurance that Senator Clemons desires, and say that we have enough business on the paper to keep us fully employed, because that entirely depends on the inclination which honorable senators display to speak. We have a little business on the paper, and though I was doubtful whether there was sufficient to occupy us next week, I said I would be willing to take the sense of the Senate on the matter.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable senator means to say that if we talk enough there will be sufficient business?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I cannot say how many honorable senators will desire to speak, or how long they will speak, and I am therefore unable to say whether the business on the notice-paper is sufficient to occupy the whole of the time next week. I do not infer that honorable senators will speak merely for the sake of speaking, or will not speak intelligently and to the point, but it is impossible for me or for any other living being to say whether the business now on the notice-paper is sufficient to keep us employed all next week. There is another Supply Bill in connexion with public works to come up, and there might be some other Bills received by the Senate. I said I was willing to adjourn over next week.

Senator CLEMONS.—Was it not because the honorable senator felt certain that we should lose nothing by adjourning?

Senator PLAYFORD.—That is quite right.

Senator CLEMONS.—Then I think we should adjourn.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am willing to adjourn, but as I believe a majority of honorable senators object to an adjournment over next week it would be futile to propose to do so.

Senator GIVENS.—The honorable senator could not move the motion.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I think I should find a way to manage it. If the motion now before the Senate were negatived it could be done, but, in the circumstances, as there is a majority of honorable senators opposed to an adjournment over next week, I shall not propose such an adjournment.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I shall not occupy the Senate for very long at this hour. If there is an insufficiency of business on the notice-paper, and the Minister has admitted that there is, who is responsible for that? I think the Government are responsible.

Senator CLEMONS.—And who are going to be punished?

Senator HIGGS.—The Government have a right, if they find they are interfered with by any persons, to adopt the means at their disposal to overcome those obstacles. They can take up one of the planks of the leader of a very prominent party, which was to amend the Standing Orders, so as to prevent too much talk. If the Standing Orders were amended in that direction we should have more work to do in the Senate than we have. The Senate has not been treated by the Government fairly, commencing from the time when they took the Vice-President of the Executive Council from this Chamber. They would appear to think that the Senate is a kind of poor relation, and I object to that attitude on their part. I shall not continue the debate further, except to say that I very much regret that the matter of the classification of the Public Service has been dealt with under cover of a motion which will not permit the Senate to place its opinion on record or to state any amendments it desires. I fear that all the discussion which has taken place to-day is likely to be repeated at an early date, under cover of some distinctive motion.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—I wish to offer a protest against Senator Playford's statement that there is not enough business to be done next week.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I said I could not say whether there was or not.

Senator MATHESON.—He has called attention to the public works Supply Bill, which must come up shortly. On the notice-paper I see an order of the day for the second reading of the Copyright Bill, and also an order of the day relating to tobacco monopoly, which ought to be dealt with with the greatest possible despatch. There is every probability of the classification scheme coming up for consideration on a substantive motion. Under these circumstances it is absurd to say that there is not ample business to occupy the Senate next week.

Question.—That the Senate do now adjourn—put. The Senate divided.

RE-ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS.

Motion (by Senator PEARCE) agreed to—

That Order of the Day No. 2 "Tobacco Monopoly" be an order of the day for Thursday next.

Senator CLEMONS.—Under what standing order, sir, is this made an order of the day for Thursday next?

The PRESIDENT. — The honorable senator in charge of a notice of motion or order of the day has always the right to ask the Senate to re-arrange the business.

Senator CLEMONS.—At this stage?

The PRESIDENT. — Yes, when it is called on.

Senator CLEMONS.—Have we not proceeded with any business for the day yet?

Senator KEATING. — None but formal business.

Senator MILLEN.—May I point out to you, sir, that when the adjournment of the Senate was moved by Senator Keating we were proceeding to business of which notice had been given, and you said you were straining the standing order to enable this to be done, because the Government had given notice on Wednesday that they would take the discussion on the Public Service classification to-day.

The PRESIDENT. — I do not understand what that has to do with this matter. The order of the day in charge of Senator Pearce was called on; he moved in the ordinary course of practice that it be put down for Thursday, and that was carried.

Senator MILLEN.—The point is that we have already proceeded to the business of the day.

PAPER.

The CLERK laid upon the table the following paper:—

Return to an Order of the Senate of 17th August, 1905.—Australian Pearling Fleets: Number of Indentured Coloured Labourers returned to their homes in 1904.

Ordered to be printed.

Senate adjourned at 4.16 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Friday, 25 August, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

PETITION.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition from over 60,000 residents of New South Wales, praying the House to enact stringent legislation to prohibit the importation and sale of opium for smoking purposes into the Commonwealth.

Petition received and read.

Mr. PAGE.—What becomes of all these petitions? It took two men to carry into the Chamber the pile of documents which constitutes the petition which has just been received, but we hear no more of these petitions after presentation.

Mr. SPEAKER.—All papers laid on the table of the House are preserved among its records.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I wish to read from this morning's Argus what appears to be a report copied from the Sydney Stock and Station Journal. This report, upon which I shall base a question to the Prime Minister, is as follows:—

Last week our contributor "Merrigang" was at a horse sale at Inglis's Bazaar, and fell into conversation with the groom who had brought out some horses for Mr. Livingstone-Learmonth. "Merrigang" asked the groom if he meant to stay out here after he had delivered the horses, and received a bit of a shock when informed that "they won't let me stay here." We are all quite willing to admit that we need population, and our Agent-General is trying to induce people to come here, and says he is succeeding. But this groom, a fine specimen of a Suffolk Englishman, said we wouldn't allow him to stay here, and he'll go home and spread that news among the Suffolk farmers; and ill news travels fast.

We sent for the man, and asked him why he would not be allowed to stay here, and he showed the following documents:—

London, E.C., 9th June, 1905.

Mr. W. Gooderham, junior,
S.S. "Miltiades."

Dear Sir,—As you are proceeding to Australia under an agreement as to wages with Mr. Livingstone-Learmonth, you would not be allowed to land there under the Commonwealth Immigration Restriction Act 1901. We have, however, obtained a special certificate of exemption from the Agent-General for New South Wales, which we enclose herewith. It is available for six months, from the 9th of June, which will enable you to deliver the horses to the station. It is to be understood that this certificate is only issued subject to the undertaking that you are returning to this country on the completion of your mission.

Yours faithfully,

For DALGETY & COMPANY LIMITED,
(Sgd.) F. B. SMYTH.

Form No. 2.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA.
IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT, 1901.

No. 1—State of New South Wales.

This is to certify that William Gooderham, junior, of Woodbridge, Suffolk, England, aged 36 years, a *groom, is exempted for a period of not exceeding six months from the date hereof from the provisions of the Immigration Restriction Act, 1901.

Dated at 9 Victoria-street, London, this 9th day of June, 1905.

*Insert trade, calling, or other description.

T. A. COGHLAN,

Acting Agent-General for New South Wales.

This certificate must be retained by the person to whom it is issued.

Regulation No. 9, gazetted 3rd January, 1902, states:—"9. Any person who, with intent to contravene or evade the Act, or these regulations, or without just cause or excuse transfers or delivers up to any other person any certificate or credentials referred to in the Act or in these regulations, shall be guilty of an offence against these regulations."

NOTE.—A person guilty of any offence against these regulations is, under section 18 of the Act, liable upon summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £50, and in default of payment to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any period not exceeding three months.

Then follow some further comments. I wish to know if the attention of the Prime Minister has been directed to this report. If so, has he taken steps to ascertain whether the report is a correct one? By what arrangement or authority was this ticket of leave obtained from the Agent-General for New South Wales?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The report is likely to be correct, because one of the first communications which I received upon entering upon the administration of the Department of External Affairs last month was a letter from the acting Agent-General for New South Wales, asking for authority to issue that permit. He was at once informed by my direction that no certificate of the kind was necessary. Evidently the man referred to in the newspaper report had left England before that time. I am making inquiries to discover under what circumstances the exemption was issued. The initiative in the matter was apparently taken by the steam-ship owners, who seem to think that restrictions which are applied to aliens might be applied also to people of the mother country, although in this case quite inapplicable.

Mr. CONROY.—Will the Prime Minister take steps to make as public as possible his announcement that tickets of exemption are absolutely unnecessary under these circumstances?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I directed inquiries to be made into this matter this morning before coming here.

AFFRONT TO A MINISTER.

Mr. WILKS.—I wish to read from the Argus a paragraph in which it is stated that a grave insult has been offered to the Minister of Trade and Customs during his tour in New South Wales. Other newspapers refer to the matter more strongly. The paragraph is as follows:—

LEGISLATORS NOT WANTED.

WAGGA, Thursday.—At a smoke social held to-night in connexion with the show the toast of "Parliament" was submitted, but the president announced that no response to the toast would be asked for. Sir William Lyne left the room, saying that this was the greatest insult he had ever received. It was pointed out that last year Sir William Lyne and Mr. Groom, M.H.R.'s, took about two hours to respond to the toast. The committee had therefore decided that no speeches in reply should be made on the present occasion.

Will the Prime Minister have this wandering Minister immediately recalled, so that the Government and the Commonwealth may not be further humiliated at public functions?

Mr. CONROY.—I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he will allow the Minister of Trade and Customs to further increase the duty levied upon imported harvesters, in order to punish the farmers of Wagga for refusing to listen to him?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not think that honorable members wish me to take serious notice of their questions.

DEFENCE ESTIMATES.

Mr. McCAY.—I wish to know from the Vice-President of the Executive Council when we may expect to receive the memorandum which is usually circulated with the Defence Estimates?

Mr. EWING.—I shall cause inquiry to be made, and inform the honorable and learned member later on.

Mr. McCAY.—This memorandum should have been circulated already. Do the Government propose to extend to honorable members the courtesy and justice of circulating it on this occasion? The House has a right to the information for which I ask.

Mr. EWING.—I feel the importance of the question, and shall make inquiries into the matter.

Mr. McCAY.—The memorandum should be circulated before the Budget debate is resumed.

Mr. EWING.—The honorable and learned member is entitled to the information for which he asks.

At a later stage,

Mr. EWING.—I am now in a position to inform the honorable and learned member for Corinella that the papers to which he referred will be available on Tuesday.

NEW GUINEA REFERENDUM.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Will the Prime Minister lay upon the table a return showing the number of papers issued in connexion with the referendum taken in New Guinea two years ago, the number of papers returned, and the result of the voting?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I assume that the information is filed, and will have it looked up at once.

ROYAL COMMISSIONS AND SELECT COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILKS.—Will the Prime Minister cause to be prepared and laid upon the table a tabulated statement showing the number of Royal Commissions and Select Committees appointed since the inauguration of Federation, and their cost?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Such a return should be moved for. If the motion is made, it will be unopposed.

TASMANIAN MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Will the Postmaster-General lay on the table any agreement which may have been entered into between his Department and the Union and Huddart Parker Steam-ship Companies for an alteration of the mail service between Tasmania and Victoria?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There is no objection to laying a copy of the agreement on the table of the Library.

PAPER.

Mr. GROOM laid upon the table the following paper:—

Pursuant to the Property for Public Purposes Acquisition Act.—Notification of the acquisition of a site for a post-office at Murrin Murrin, Western Australia.

ORIENT MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I desire to ask the Postmaster-General whether the papers containing the agreement and correspondence between the late Postmaster-General and the Orient Company have been laid upon the table?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The papers were laid on the table some evenings ago, and are being printed.

INSPECTION OF PAPERS.

Mr. KNOX.—I desire to ask the Prime Minister a question with regard to the papers which are laid upon the table of the House, or upon the Library table, for the information of members. I wish to know whether some definite place could not be chosen in this House, and also in the Library, where papers would always be available to honorable members who desire to avail themselves of the information contained in them?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There should also be some definite method of circulating them.

Mr. DEAKIN.—All the papers laid upon the table of this House are, except in cases where they are ordered to be printed, handed over to the care of the Clerk, who can at once produce them to honorable members who desire to see them. The Printing Committee sits regularly, and lays before the House periodically a list of the papers which have been printed. These papers are circulated amongst honorable members. The papers laid upon the Library table are in charge of the Librarian, and are obtainable from him by honorable members who desire to see them.

HOUR OF ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DEAKIN.—As there appears to have been some misapprehension in the minds of honorable members as to the usual hour for adjournment, I desire to intimate that from this time forth the usual hour will be half-past eleven p.m. It is proposed that we shall sit until that hour as a rule. We can then devote eight hours per day to the work before us, and dispose as early as possible of the vast mass of business on the paper.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is a later hour than usual. Eleven o'clock is the proper time for adjournment.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Honorable members will be unable to catch their last trains.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am afraid that in view of the state of the business-paper, the last trains will often be the only ones we shall be able to catch for some time to come. I would say further that the custom that has been followed of rising early on Friday afternoon cannot be understood to apply after this week, if the progress of business requires that we shall sit on.

CENTRAL TELEPHONE EXCHANGES.

Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

What is the minimum number of subscribers each officer has to attend to from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. in each of the Central Exchanges of each State, trunk lines excluded?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—In reply to the honorable member—

Sydney.—97.

Melbourne.—37 operators, 100 each; 6 operators, 75 each; 3 operators, 50 each.

Adelaide.—100.

Brisbane.—16 operators, 100 each; 1 operator, 50.

Perth.—8 operators, 100 each; 2 operators, 60 each; and 4 operators, 50 each.

Hobart.—100.

MANUFACTURES
ENCOURAGEMENT BILL (No. 2).

SECOND READING.

Debate resumed from 24th August (vide page 1491), on motion by Sir WILLIAM LYNE—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I do not desire to occupy the time of the House at very great length, but as I had the honour of being one of the members of the Commission that inquired into the question of establishing the manufacture of iron in the Commonwealth, I feel it to be my duty to say a few words. As may be easily surmised, I do not, on this question, join forces with honorable members sitting in the direct opposition, but part company with them for a time, at any rate, in connexion with this measure.

Mr. PAGE.—So soon?

Mr. THOMAS.—Is this a bridge?

Mr. McCAY.—No, it is not a bridge. I should like the honorable member for Maranoa to remember that the late Government itself accepted the statement that the fiscal issue was alive again as the determination that it could not continue in office as one disregarding the fiscal issue. The protectionist members of that Government were quite willing to adopt the course that was followed for the purpose of preserving their right to vote in accordance with their convictions on fiscal matters. I think it must be admitted that if the iron industry can be established in Australia—I have no particular desire that attention should be paid to my remarks, but I do wish to be able to speak without raising my voice to shouting pitch.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! There is sometimes excuse for a little excitement in the heat of debate, but when honorable members begin at this early stage of a sitting to carry on so much discussion and conversation among themselves that it is almost impossible for the honorable member addressing the House to proceed, they are not acting in accordance with the duty which they owe to any honorable member who may be in possession of the Chair. I trust, therefore, that they will listen with more attention to the honorable member for Corinella.

Mr. McCAY.—So long as I have an opportunity of letting Hansard hear what I am saying, I have no desire to force honorable members to listen to me. I do not, however, wish their remarks to be interspersed throughout my speech with the risk that they may be mistaken for my own. We are all agreed that if the iron industry can be established in Australia it will be a valuable thing for the Commonwealth. Any differences of opinion that may arise do not relate to the object to be achieved, but to the method by which it is to be attained. When we look at other countries, and realize that only in those in which the iron industry has been satisfactorily established and continued has the development of manufactures been considerable, we must all agree that, in this continent of ours, where we have such ample resources in the way of ore, coal, and flux, we should do our utmost to secure the establishment and development of that great industry. Consequently, I have no hesitation in saying that if we can bring about that result at a cost of £300,000, the money will have been very well spent. There are various ways in which it could be done. One method was suggested some years ago, namely, that some State—or the Commonwealth itself, if it had the power—should undertake the responsibility. That was a method with which I did not agree then, and I do not agree with it now. The industry might also possibly be established by the imposition of a protective duty, to which, however, at the present time there are obvious objections, even from the protectionist point of view—and that is the only point of view from which I regard this matter. Consequently we have left open to us only a third method, namely, that of offering a bonus, in the safest way in which it can be offered, viz., payment by results. The question as to the exact rate of bonus to be paid is one that may be discussed in Committee. If I recollect aright, the scale of payment now proposed is different from that suggested in the first Bill. I am endeavouring to work out figures which will enable me to arrive at a conclusion as to what the rate of bonus should be; but I have not yet had time to complete my calculations. I do not wish to deal with that aspect of the matter at present. Of course there is always the risk in this, as in every other matter, that the experiment may not be a success. We cannot expect to have a guarantee of success in connexion with an enterprise of this kind, but in view of the immense advantage that would be conferred upon the Commonwealth by the successful establishment of the industry, we are not only justified in making the experiment, but we are bound by our duty to Australia to do so. Therefore I have no hesitation in supporting the principle contained in the measure. Some honorable members have objected to the Bill on the ground that, according to the evidence given before the Bonus Commission, it would appear that no bonus is necessary, that the industry could be established without the assistance of a bonus, and that if the figures given by various witnesses are correct, the manufacturers ought to be able to make a large profit without any assistance from the State. That is a theory based upon a series of inferences drawn from alleged statements, viewed from what I am afraid is not a totally unbiased stand-point. The point, after all, is that the industry has not been established without a bonus, and that so far as one can judge, there is little likelihood of its being entered upon here without State aid.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The promoters of the scheme say that they will not establish the industry without a duty.

Mr. McCAY.—They do not go as far as that.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The honorable and learned member should look at question 2320.

Mr. McCAY.—A single answer to a single question is not conclusive upon a question of this kind. It is a common practice everywhere to select a series of questions and answers to establish one's own contention, and to disregard entirely all the rest of the evidence. Fortunately, however, the judicial bodies which usually have the determination of matters, insist that the whole of the questions and answers shall be regarded. I heard a great deal of the evidence, and read the rest of it while my memory was fresh, and I say, unhesitatingly, that the weight of the evidence goes to show that, rightly or wrongly, there is no reasonable likelihood of the industry being established without assistance of some kind.

Mr. CONROY.—Would the honorable member call it an industry if it did not pay?

Mr. McCAY.—Unfortunately, industries do not always pay, and those who enter upon them are not always sufficiently remunerated. The industry of the honorable and learned member, for instance, is, in his opinion, not sufficiently remunerated. But it is industry all the same. I have commenced three times to say that it appears to me that, rightly or wrongly, there is no reasonable likelihood of the industry being established unless some assistance be given. The reason is obvious. It requires the outlay of a large amount of capital, and those concerned in the matter expect a reasonable assurance that they will get some return for their capital. Let us remember the facts of the case with regard to the production and consumption of iron. In England and in the United States the iron industry has been established and developed to a very large degree. We know that so great are the resources of the manufacturers in the United States that it is quite possible for the output to be increased at any particular time to such an extent as to enable the manufacturers to more than swamp such a market as ours. Consequently, if an attempt were made to establish the industry here without assistance from the State, the result would inevitably be—and it would be a perfectly legitimate market operation—that whatever the price the Australian manufacturer asked for his material, allowing for the cost of production, and leaving a margin for profit, he would inevitably be undersold by his giant competitors. That is a fact which must always influence those who regard the question from the protectionist point of view. There is another important fact in connexion with the industry, namely, that various works turn out special brands of iron, and find it to their interest to keep up a certain quality. There will consequently not be what is called “the usual prejudice” against Australian goods, but there will be very great difficulty, at the initiation of this enterprise, in getting the consumers to purchase the Australian article, because they know that if they buy the imported article of a given brand they will be getting a given quality. There is more difficulty in securing a market for Australian iron than there is in the case of any other local manufacture. This is due not so much to prejudice as to a just apprehension that in purchasing the local article the consumers may not be getting exactly the quality that they want. Therefore, it seems to me that in the case of a great industry of this character—great in its potentialities, and in its benefits to the community—special difficulties exist both in regard to the possibility of the products of any such enterprise independently started being undersold and in getting the consumers to use those products, and for these reasons we are justified in proceeding in the way that is proposed. I quite agree with the statement, which I signed in the majority report, which sets out—

Your Commissioners, however, do not recommend the immediate imposition of a Customs duty, as, pending a local supply sufficient for Australian requirements, the result might be to temporarily raise the price to the consumer, which should be avoided.

Of course, there is always that difficulty in connexion with protection. One man's raw material may be another man's finished product. It is that fact which requires a very careful adjustment of the relative rates of duty. In this case, undoubtedly, if the industry were established in such a way as to seriously interfere with the users of its products, it might possibly do more temporary harm than immediate good. But by following the bounty method, and ascertaining whether the industry can be thoroughly established, and a satisfactory article produced, we shall afford those who wish to engage in the enterprise an opportunity of so doing, without in any way interfering with the well-being of the consumers. It is alleged by those who are opposed to the Bill that the evidence taken before the Royal Commission shows that the industry can be established without any state aid whatever. I have ventured to give one or two general reasons which are, to my mind, a sufficient answer to that contention. Then it is suggested that those who may embark upon this enterprise may possibly make a large profit out of it. I do not suppose—to use an American phrase—that they will enter the business “for the benefit of their health.” They expect to make a profit, and we should not begrudge them that profit so long as it is a reasonable one.

Mr. CONROY.—We do not begrudge it to them, so long as they do not take it out of the public purse.

Mr. McCAY.—That is a phase of the question with which I have already dealt. I say, deliberately, that if we can establish the iron industry for an expenditure of £300,000, the project is cheap at the price.

Mr. KELLY.—Would the honorable and learned member like to see the industry nationalized afterwards?

Mr. McCAY.—No.

Mr. KELLY.—That is what will happen under this Bill.

Mr. McCAY.—I hold that if we succeed in establishing the industry it will be cheap at the price. Any persons who wish to embark upon this undertaking must, in view of the large sum of money which requires to be invested, receive some assurance that they are not going to lose it all. That is our justification for giving the encouragement that is proposed. I assume that those who do engage in the industry see their way to make a profit. I am not a friend of those who wish to make profits by market operations—by the flotation of companies. But we cannot help recognising the fact that a large expenditure needs to be incurred in this enterprise before any return can possibly be received. If, for each £1 that we pay away, a ton of marketable material is produced, that is, after all, the matter with which we are concerned. The way in which the profit is divided among those who find the capital is a matter of small concern to us.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The promoters will only take 500,000 shares out of 1,000,000.

Mr. McCAY.—That is the suggestion of the honorable member.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—It is a fact.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member ought to know that in all probability they will not get 500,000 shares for themselves. The original vendors do not usually secure the whole of the purchase money. If it can be shown that too much is being offered to them, that is another matter. All I say is that something should be offered to them. In the Bill as it was introduced in the first Commonwealth Parliament, I think that the rate prescribed was lower than is the case in this measure. What the rate shall be, however, is a matter for discussion when we reach the schedule. I merely wish to affirm my support of the principle that some assistance should be given of a sufficiently substantial character to induce people to engage in this enterprise in the hope of securing a profit for themselves. We should encourage them to embark upon it in such a way as to make it reasonably sure that if their efforts are successful they will mean the establishment of a substantial iron industry in Australia. I shall be no party to allowing the promoters an opportunity to operate in such a way that they will be able to draw the bonus, thus recouping themselves for their outlay, and then to discontinue operations, with a substantial profit at the close of the bonus period. We must guard against that contingency. We must make sure that when they have drawn the whole of the bonus they cannot close down their works and walk away with a profit in their pockets.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is the one risk which we incur.

Mr. McCAY.—Exactly. That is a factor which should impel the Government to carefully consider the exact rate which should be given. I do not suppose that the Ministry are absolutely bound to the rate prescribed in this Bill. If it can be shown that it is too high or too low, I presume that it can be altered. It will be observed that the majority report of the Royal Commission makes no reference whatever to the rate. It simply affirms that a bonus should be granted. We had not before us sufficient material to justify us in declaring what the rate should be. I wish to remind the House that had it not been for a great majority of members of the Labour Party, this Bill would have been law long ago. The reason we have not a Manufactures Encouragement Act in operation, instead of a Manufactures Encouragement Bill under consideration—the reason we do not know whether the undertaking can be successfully initiated, and whether hundreds or thousands of men can, or cannot, be employed in the industry, is that a majority of the members of the Labour Party were fonder of their socialist doctrines than they were of their protectionist principles. It is due to that fact alone that this Continent does not at present possess an iron industry. I admit that there were one or two honorable members of that party who realized that the prosperity of Australia was more important than the abstract theories of ownership of which they are so fond. But the great bulk of members of the Labour Party, including its leader, the honorable member for Bland, are alone responsible for the fact that there is no Manufactures Encouragement Act in operation to-day. It speaks volumes for the charity of my honorable friends above the gangway upon the Ministerial side of the Chamber that they can so readily forget all the past in connexion with this matter. I say that the greatest enemy which the iron industry in Australia has had up to the present time has been the Federal Labour Party. It may be a fact of which they are proud, but it is nevertheless the truth. When we endeavoured to pass this measure in 1902, it was the bulk of the members of the Labour Party, headed by the honorable member for Bland, who insisted upon declaring that the industry should be nationalized, or that there should be no industry at all.

Mr. RONALD.—They were assisted by some of the free-traders.

Mr. McCAY.—That is so. But I would point out that the free-traders were justified in opposing the Bill in any shape or form. It is the action of those who call themselves protectionists that I am challenging in this connexion. I think that the honorable member for Southern Melbourne was one of those who was true to his protectionist principles, and who endeavoured to get the Bill passed. But the honorable member for Bland, a protectionist member of the Labour Party, and other members of that party, acted as they have always done when protection has come into conflict with their Labour platform. They flung their protectionist doctrines upon one side, and stuck to their pet theories, which they now tell us are theories applicable to the distant future. Consequently, it is they alone whom Australia has to thank for the fact that we are still discussing this Bill, instead of watching with anxious interest the development of the iron industry in Australia.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Then they have justified their existence by that action.

Mr. McCAY.—If the honorable member thinks that, he had better join them.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Does not the honorable and learned member forget the great American steel trust?

Mr. McCAY.—I am more concerned with seeing the Australian iron industry established, and Australian workmen receiving Australian wages for doing Australian work—I am more interested in seeing Australian manufacturers using Australian iron, than I am in the operations of the American steel trust. Whether it be State-owned or privately-owned, I am satisfied that unless the Commonwealth comes to its assistance, there will be no iron industry in Australia. The American steel trust is strong enough to stop that. I thank the honorable member for Fremantle for mentioning the name of that particular corporation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Most trusts are “steal” trusts.

Mr. McCAY.—Possibly. I do not know whether or not the Prime Minister is referring in that connexion to public ownership. I have only one other observation to make. A good deal of stress has been laid upon the answer which was given by Mr. Sandford to a question put to him before the Commission in regard to the cost of the production of iron at Lithgow, which he set down at 35s. per ton. I thought then, as I do now, that his estimate—despite the fact that he is a gentleman who should know what he is talking about—was extremely low. At any rate, it was unsupported by the testimony of any other witnesses. All the rest of the evidence given before the Commission goes to show that the cost of production is very much higher than he stated it to be. Even at Pittsburg it is 32s. 5½d. per ton; at Middlesborough it is 52s. 2d.; and Mr. Jaquet estimated that the cost at Lithgow was 47s. 7d. per ton.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The f.o.b. price at Glasgow is 50s. per ton.

Mr. McCAY.—Mr. Jaquet's estimate will be seen by reference to question 350 of the official report of the evidence. The price at Glasgow f.o.b. is 50s. per ton, for some iron. But there are a good many qualities.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—That is the price of the iron which is imported into Australia.

Mr. McCAY.—It is the price of some of it. The honorable member must know that the prices vary. Is he not aware what a delightful vehicle for stock exchange gambling are the Middlesborough iron warrants? One of the happy hunting grounds of speculators is to be found in the varying prices of iron. I repeat that the qualities of the iron vary enormously. To say that any particular article is sold at 50s. per ton f.o.b. at Glasgow, and to assume that that is the average price of the average quality produced, is, I venture to think, entirely a mistake.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—That is the evidence of the man who proposes to float this syndicate.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member will have an opportunity of stating his views later on. A good deal of stress has been laid upon Mr. Sandford's statement. I have a distinct recollection of the occasion upon which he gave that answer. The Commission were sitting in the room which is now occupied by the Labour Party, and I remember that Mr. Sandford was asked what was his cost of production. At first he seemed disinclined to answer. He became very excited, and the honorable member for Parramatta suggested that he should retire for a few minutes, and consider the matter. Mr. Sandford appeared to be a gentleman of an excitable disposition, and undoubtedly no member of the Commission treated him with greater courtesy and consideration than did the honorable member for Parramatta, although he is strongly opposed to him on this particular question. Mr. Sandford went out of the room, but returning far sooner than we had anticipated, he rushed to his chair, and commenced to speak. I do not believe that from that time until the close of his examination he mastered and marshalled his facts as an ordinarily careful witness would have done. It was because I observed that he was highly excited that I asked him again and again whether the quotation he had given included all costs of production. Although apparently he adhered to the statement that it did, the fact remains that there are a number of charges which bring up the total cost to far more than 35s.—to 50s. or 55s. per ton.

Mr. WATKINS.—Nearly 60s. per ton.

Mr. McCAY.—One or two of the suggested charges could not be fairly included in the cost of production; but, at all events, whether the cost to Mr. Sandford is 35s. or 65s. per ton, I assert most emphatically that he would have to maintain a most strenuous fight for a long time against the steel trusts and other great corporations concerned in this industry. Whilst on the one hand we should not make the bounty so high and give it under such conditions as would render it possible for those engaged in the industry to simply earn it, and then go out of the business, making a profit, it is equally important on the other hand, that it should not be so low as to render it impossible for them to withstand the market competition, which will be fiercely forced upon them for some years by the American steel trust and other corporations. We are on the horns of a dilemma. We may make the bounty so high that the industry will not be established, or on the other hand we may make it so low that it will be impossible to develop it. It is necessary for us to arrive at a happy via media, which will enable us to guard against injustice to the Commonwealth and at the same time to secure the development of the industry. I hope there will be no unreasonable delay in passing this measure. It will evidently require to be discussed from the protectionist stand-point, as well as from the free-trade point of view, but for the most part that discussion may well take place in Committee. I have merely risen to express my continued adhesion to the principle of the Bill, although, as I have already said, I am not prepared under any circumstances to nationalize the industry. As a protectionist, I trust that we shall have an opportunity, by means of this Bill, to establish what is perhaps the basic industry of all our great enterprises, and one which certainly cannot be described, even by the most pronounced free-trader, as other than a primary industry. It is as much a primary industry as is the growing of grain, or the raising of wool.

Mr. KELLY.—Can any industry that cannot stand alone be a primary one?

Mr. McCAY.—Certainly. As a matter of fact, no industry stands alone. The existence of financial institutions, which collect money from those who have saved it, and lend it to those who wish to employ it, shows that no industry can stand solely on the capital of those who are actually engaged in it—the entrepreneurs. They cannot find all the necessary capital. The only question in this case is whether the necessary assistance is to come, as some of my honorable friends desire, only from private individuals. There are few individuals, however, who could find the hundreds of thousands of pounds required to establish the iron industry. It is, after all, only a question of the source of the assistance to be given. I admit that we are bound, when we propose to devote public funds to a given object, to point out in what direction the public will be benefited. I think we can prove that the expenditure of public funds in this case will be justifiable. No industry can stand alone in the sense that those who are engaged in it can work it entirely on their own capital.

Mr. PAGE.—What protection does the pastoral industry receive?

Mr. McCAY.—I did not say that it received any protection. As a matter of fact, however, the pastoral and agricultural industries of every State receive Government assistance in the shape of reduced railway freights.

Mr. PAGE.—I should like to know of one instance in which that assistance has been given.

Mr. McCAY.—Wherever the State-owned railways of Australia are not paying, the cause may be found in the fact that freights on the country lines are unremunerative. The suburban lines always pay. Those engaged in the pastoral and agricultural industries receive assistance in various forms from the States. Some of my honorable friends speak of this as Socialism, but it is no more Socialism than it is individualism.

Mr. PAGE.—In what case have those engaged in the pastoral industry received any assistance?

Mr. McCAY.—I am not so familiar with the railway freights of the different States as to be able to readily quote a case in point; but in this case we are considering a national asset. We have a right to step in and assist in the utilization of that asset. Here is an undeveloped national asset at present lying useless in the earth. And it is because it is a national asset, because the nation will benefit by its development, because its development will increase the resources of the nation, its wealth and its population, and make us independent of outside sources for the carrying on, in time of peace as well as in time of war, of the ordinary operations of our national life, that we should support this proposal.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—After the most closely reasoned and able speech by the honorable and learned member for Corinella to which we have just listened, I must at the outset express my regret that, in spite of the number of questions upon which honorable members of the Opposition think in common, I find that on this question I cannot be in agreement with my honorable and learned friend. My honorable and learned friend put his chief reasons for supporting this Bill in a few catch phrases—such as “Australian wages for Australian workers,” and “An Australian bounty for an Australian industry.” These phrases are uplifting, if unconvincing. Why not, might I ask him, also “Australian terriers for Australian watchdogs”? These catch phrases remind me of those which were very prevalent in New South Wales when the Federal Constitution Bill came to be discussed. One distinguished gentleman, who is now in England, told us of all that Federation was to do for Australia. We were told that it was to give us one people, one language, and one destiny; and now we find that it is also to give us one High Commissioner, who, that most distinguished gentleman wishes us to believe, could most conveniently be that most distinguished gentleman himself. The honorable and learned member who preceded me made as telling an indictment against the Bill as it stands—not against the principle of protection—as any honorable member of the Free-trade Party could possibly make. He stated most distinctly that, whereas he was in favour of supporting the iron industry of Australia for private enterprise, he was strictly opposed to a proposition to nationalize it. Now, sir, I hold that every one who analyzes this Bill must recognise that its result will be, not to give an impetus to private enterprise in the production of iron, but to bring about the nationalization of the industry. I have no sort of satisfaction in being able to say to the present Government, “I told you so,” but in dealing with their policy speech I took the line that the Manufactures Encouragement Bill would be made a bridge over which the supporters of the giving of a bounty to private enterprise could walk into the camp of our socialistic friends, who will have nothing to do with any enterprise of a private character. I think that forecast has been abundantly justified by the Bill now under discussion.

Mr. WATKINS.—Will the honorable member tell us of the bridge that was constructed to enable one party in the House to join another in putting out the Labour Government?

Mr. KELLY.—It is out of consideration entirely for my honorable friend's and the Government's feelings that I do not refer to that ancient treachery of theirs. I only wish to say at this stage that every estimate formed on this side of the House as to what would be the action of the Government in regard to its legislation has proved correct. We know—and I am glad to see that the country is awakening more and more every day to a knowledge of this fact—that, under the guise of introducing a very innocent type of measure, the Government, in the first Bill submitted to us, have brought forward a proposal that is acceptable only to one-third of the House and to a tenth of the people of Australia.

Mr. PAGE.—To what Bill does the honorable member refer?

Mr. KELLY.—The Trade Marks Bill. In the Bill now under discussion we find that they are not proposing to honestly grant some encouragement to private enterprises, but that they are hedging the proposition round with all sorts of—

Mr. WATKINS.—Safeguards.

Mr. KELLY.—I shall not say “safeguards,” because the provisions in question are not put forward straightforwardly. Safeguards are usually found inserted in Bills in a straight-out, honest way, but we have to analyze the clauses of this Bill very closely before we find what is their real intention.

Mr. PAGE.—Would the honorable member take up shares in a company promoted under this Bill?

Mr. KELLY.—No; and I do not think the honorable member would.

Mr. PAGE.—That is so.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member gives me the proof for which I have been asking. He and his party realize that a company could not be formed under this Bill to work the iron industry.

Mr. PAGE.—That is my personal view.

Mr. KELLY.—And I think it will be the view of any honorable member who impartially considers this measure. We are here, not to consider the exigencies of a Government who are kept in office by the goodwill of a party who wish to nationalize all industries, but to see whether this Bill is really an honest expression of a sincere conviction. We know that one-third—or possibly more—of the people of Australia have protectionist leanings, and that they may possibly desire an honest effort made to give expression to their views on this important question. We know also that another party, whose only ambition is the co-operative commonwealth, will have none of the undiluted idea of protection, and is now forcing the Government it supports to its own ends. We know, therefore, that this is not an honest effort to give expression to the protectionist principle, but is designed really to lead to the realization in particular of the socialistic aspirations common to one-third of the members of this House. The Government came into office with a false pretence of virtue misunderstood. The fact that it was not misunderstood becomes more and more apparent to Australia every day. It is, perhaps, only natural that as the Government was born so it should live—by false pretences and deceit.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must not charge honorable members in that way.

Mr. KELLY.—I am making a charge, not against honorable members individually, but against the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must not make such a charge against the members of the Government.

Mr. KELLY.—Shall I be in order, sir, in saying that this Bill is a false pretence to carry out the protectionist policy in Australia?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member may allege political false pretences.

Mr. KELLY.—I am speaking of the Government purely in a political sense.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Then it is purely a matter of taste as to whether the honorable member should so describe it.

Mr. KELLY.—Exactly, and as I am the judge of the propriety of my own actions in these matters, I shall so describe it. The Bill is entitled, “The Manufactures Encouragement Bill;” but I hold that it should be called, “The Nationalization of Manufactures Encouragement Bill.”

Mr. PAGE.—Then why does not the honorable member amend the title?

Mr. KELLY.—I shall move such an amendment in Committee, and shall expect the support of my honorable friends on the corner benches. The Commonwealth, however, cannot nationalize an industry until there has been an alteration of the Constitution, and to attempt to alter the Constitution would be to direct the attention of the people to the fact that it is proposed to start a great socialistic concern. If the citizens of Australia were asked if they wish to see started here a great socialistic concern, they would say most emphatically that they do not. Therefore it is not openly proposed to start such an institution, but clauses have been placed in the Bill which will make it impossible for the production of iron to be undertaken within the Commonwealth by private industry, or will, if started, make it so unprofitable that eventually the State in which the works are situated will have to take them over to save those connected with them from starvation. To begin with, the men employed in the works must be drawn from other avenues of employment within the Commonwealth, because under Federal legislation which my honorable friends in the corner initiated it is impossible for any man to come to Australia under contract.

Mr. BAMFORD.—That is not correct.

Mr. KELLY.—A man may come here under contract only for the performance of a class of work for which competent men are not obtainable in Australia. It will thus be impossible to obtain iron workers unless we take them from other occupations. Then, we find that, under clause 9, these men are invited, when they become accustomed to their new avocation, to make such claims as regards wages as will, if the measure is administered as my friends in the corner would like to see it administered, prevent the carrying on of the industry with profit by private enterprise. When that happens, the works will have to be resumed by the State, because the only choice of the State will be either to have a number of unemployed on its hands, or to make the best of a bad bargain, and to run the industry itself. In this way, I say that clauses 8, 9, and 10 practically make provision for compelling the State to nationalize the industry. If that is not the intention, what is the need for these clauses? Every State of the Union has power of its own sovereign will to nationalize any industry within its own borders, and it is an insult for this Parliament to state what a State can or cannot do. Furthermore, the effect of the granting of the bounty will be, by restricting the area of competition, to create a monopoly, and is it not declared by my friends in the corner that all monopolies should be nationalized? They are now proposing the creation of a monopoly, in order that, later on, it shall be nationalized. But do honorable members imagine that any company will undertake this enterprise under the threat that if it makes a success of its undertaking, all chances of profiting by its enterprise will be taken from it?

Mr. PAGE.—Is there anything in the Bill which would prevent half-a-dozen companies from embarking in the industry?

Mr. KELLY.—Yes. The production of one blast furnace is very large. The Duquesne Works, at Pittsburg, which employ only 492 men, turn out 600,000 tons of raw iron per annum. Now, inasmuch as the private requirements of the Commonwealth amount to only 150,000 tons per annum, and the various Governments take at the most 300,000 tons per annum, the aggregate weight of iron required by Australia annually will be, at the very most, 450,000 tons per annum.

Mr. CONROY.—I think that in one year 470,000 tons were used.

Mr. KELLY.—It may be so. I am speaking entirely from memory; but I think that 450,000 tons is a fair statement of our annual requirements. On the Pittsburg figures less than 400 men would be needed to produce that iron.

Mr. PAGE.—There are more than 400 men engaged in one foundry in Melbourne. They would be affected indirectly.

Mr. KELLY.—I am speaking now only of the production of raw iron for the encouragement of which £250,000, or five-sixths of the whole bounty, is proposed. One company would certainly manufacture all the iron needed in Australia.

Mr. PAGE.—Could not iron be produced here for export?

Mr. KELLY. — My honorable friend, as a labour free-trader, knows that if it is impossible to produce iron locally without a bounty, it cannot be produced with one for export. The object of the measure is to so restrict the area of competition as to create a monopoly. My honorable friends in the corner will then insist on the nationalization of that monopoly, and the Government who are their humble servants in all matters political, will, when the time comes, be prepared to act accordingly. As the honorable and learned member for Corinella has declared himself to be opposed to the nationalization of this industry, I hope that he will vote for the omission of the clauses to which I have referred, and if other protectionists who object to State Socialism do the same, we shall get a true declaration of the policy of the Labour Party in regard to this matter from my honorable friends in the corner. This Bill differs considerably from other Manufactures Encouragement Bills which have been before the Chamber. There is very little difference between the first Bill introduced by the right honorable member for Adelaide and the second Bill introduced by the honorable member for Hume, the chief difference being that, while the first Bill provided for the granting of bonuses, the second provided for the granting of bounties. This third Bill, however, departs altogether from the plan of the other two, and contains a number of alien principles, with one or two of which I should like to deal. One of the most peculiar provisions in the Bill is that which says that the Minister may at any time, but not oftener than once in six months, refer to the President of the Commonwealth Court of Arbitration and Conciliation the question of fair wages to be paid. That gentleman is to decide all questions of rates of pay and wages in the Australian iron industry. He will have the power to definitely fix the wages to be paid, or to decide that the wages shall be upon the same scale as the highest obtaining in any State; but at the same time, under the Bill he will have no authority to regulate the conditions of labour. We know that high wages with bad conditions are almost as undesirable as low wages with good conditions. Let us suppose, for instance, that the conditions of employment in the iron industry became so obnoxious as to cause the men to appeal to the State Arbitration Court. If that Court decreed that the conditions must be ameliorated, we may fairly assume that the cost of production would be increased, and that the syndicate would find that it could not afford to pay the highest wages current in any State and also to make the conditions of labour such as the State authority insisted upon. They would then be compelled either to reduce the wages of their employés or to forfeit their security bond.

Mr. BAMFORD.—It does not necessarily follow that the cost of production would be increased.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member must admit that that probably would be the result. The manufacturers would then either have to sacrifice their security bond, or defy the State authorities, and run the risk of having their works closed down. The State authorities would then be called upon to nationalize the industry, or take the responsibility of opening up relief works to absorb the men who had been dragged from their natural avenues of employment into the iron industry. We know that the rate of wages varies very considerably throughout Australia, and we also know that under section 51 of the Constitution it is provided that the Parliament shall have power to make laws with respect to bounties on the production or export of goods, but so that such bounties shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth. It is obvious that if the wages fixed by any tribunal of the Commonwealth were calculated on a different basis in different States, the bonus would operate unequally. Therefore this Parliament would be put in the position of paying a bounty contrary to the terms of the Constitution. It is very clear that one of two States will probably be selected for the establishment of this industry in the first instance. The choice will probably lie between New South Wales and Tasmania. Let us suppose that the industry is started in the latter State. The President of the Commonwealth Arbitration Court would probably decide that the wages to be paid in the industry should be the highest wages paid for kindred work in Tasmania. Suppose, then, that a new company afterwards started operations in New South Wales. The President of the Commonwealth Arbitration Court would then decide either that the wages paid should be the highest wages paid in New South Wales or the highest paid in Tasmania. If the Commonwealth authority decided upon the latter course, and the Tasmanian rates were lower than those prevailing in New South Wales, the New South Wales Arbitration Court could step in and insist upon the wages being brought up to the State standard. If, on the other hand, the Tasmanian wages were higher than those prevailing in New South Wales, and the Commonwealth Court decided that those rates should prevail in the iron industry in New South Wales, the enterprise subsidized by the Commonwealth would, owing to the increased rates of pay provided for, unduly draw men from other industries in the State. If, on the other hand, the wages paid in the subsidized iron industry in New South Wales were lower than those prevailing in kindred industries there, the name of the Commonwealth enterprise would become a by-word for all that was undesirable in connexion with the conditions of employment. These are the difficulties with which we are beset in connexion with the regulation of the industry. It is clear that if the Justice intrusted with this most important duty is, by fixing wages on the scale obtaining in each State, to carry it out in such a way that the bounty-fed iron industry will not become a subject for either contempt or envy among neighbouring industries, he will have to so regulate matters that the bounty will become unconstitutional, and, therefore, subject to immediate revocation. I desire now to refer to the power with which it is proposed to invest the President of the Commonwealth Arbitration Court to assess the compensation to be paid by a State, in the event of its resumption of the works. I take it that this is a deliberate interference with the self-governing rights of sovereign States. The provision relating to the fixing of wages is a deliberate interference with the right of the States to manage their own industrial affairs, and the provisions, to which I am now referring, are a further trespass upon the sovereign right of a State to decide what compensation it shall pay in respect to any property it may acquire. Suppose, for instance, the industry were started in Western Australia, and the State Government were to decide that it would be profitable to take over the works, should it be bound by the Commonwealth Arbitration Court as to the amount to be paid to the company? Surely Ministers are sufficiently cognizant of the powers of the Commonwealth under the Constitution to know that it could not act in the manner provided for in the Bill. Are these clauses inserted in order to guard those who invest their capital against being robbed by the States, or are they intended merely as a sop to the feelings of the protectionists? It is a pity that so few honorable members should be present when matters of this kind are being discussed. Honorable members have not given this matter the close attention they should have done, but they have left it to members of the Opposition to think for them, and to point out the unworkable character of many of the provisions of the Bill. The duty will afterwards devolve upon those honorable members to explain to their constituents why they advocated a Bill in the nature of a bridge over which the avowed champions of protection might march into the camp of Socialism.

Mr. WILKS.—Would not the honorable member like a quorum to be present? [Quorum formed.]

Mr. KELLY.—When I was interrupted I was endeavouring to show that the provisions in this Bill regarding the compensation to be paid by a State in the event of the resumption of the industry must have been inserted for the express purpose of hoodwinking the people of Australia. I now propose to discuss the basis upon which these bonuses are to be computed. I find that upon a certain class of article a definite price is to be paid. A bonus of 12s. per ton is to be paid upon the production of pig iron, puddled bar iron, and of steel made from Australian pig iron. A clause in the Bill provides—

No bounty shall be authorized to be paid unless the manufacturer of the goods furnishes proof to the satisfaction of the Minister that the goods are of a good and merchantable quality, and that the requirements of this Act and the regulations have been complied with.

It is clear, therefore, that after the iron has been produced the Minister is to be vested with the power of determining whether it is up to standard. That consideration recalls, to my mind, the excessive powers with which it is proposed to invest the Minister under the provisions of measures which have recently been placed before this Chamber. In the two previous Bills dealing with this bounty which have been discussed by the House, provision was made that "satisfactory proof" of the quality of the iron produced should be forthcoming. That meant, I presume, proof which would be satisfactory to an expert. Now, however, "the Minister" is to be satisfied as to the quality of the product. How can the Minister possibly know what is the quality of the iron produced? His statistics have been proved to be so absolutely fallacious that I do not think we are justified in intrusting to him the power of declaring what is the value of the article in question. We know how easily he allowed his imagination to run away with his discretion upon the question of the f.o.b. value of harvesters imported into Australia. If his imagination can be stretched so far upon such a simple matter of fact, it might be strained very much further in determining the quality of any article produced by the iron industry. In the case of galvanized iron, wire netting, iron and steel tubes or pipes—except riveted or cast—being not more than six inches internal diameter—it is proposed that a bounty of 10 per cent. on their value shall be allowed. How is the Minister to assess the value of those articles? If it be difficult for him to appraise the value of the crude product, how much more difficult will it be to assess the value of the finished article? Under the provisions of the Bill the Minister is to decide as to the quality of all these articles. No bounty is to be payable upon them unless he is satisfied as to their quality. Why should this House frame any Bill in such a way as to allow of political pressure, if not political maladministration, being applied to defeat the ends of legislation. Let us assume that the iron industry was started under the spur of this bounty. The men who would be engaged in the enterprise would be justifiably anxious to better their condition. Their employers, however, would not be able to make up for an improvement in the labour conditions by raising the price of the article to the consumer. They are forbidden to increase its cost—

Mr. BAMFORD.—The price is not mentioned in the Bill.

Mr. KELLY.—The measure contains a provision relating to the question of price. I refer to clause 4, which, I may observe in passing, has been drafted in a very slovenly way. That, however, is a matter which can better be considered in Committee.

Mr. PAGE.—Why not let the Bill get into Committee?

Mr. KELLY.—If the honorable member will permit me a free opportunity of expressing my opinions I shall not occupy half the time that I otherwise should do. The position is that the employers in this industry will not be able to increase the price of their goods in order to compensate them for the cost of any improved conditions which may be granted to their employes. Consequently, the industry will be compelled to depreciate the quality of the article supplied. The Minister will then be placed in this position: If he draws attention to the fact that the quality of the articles supplied is not up to standard he will probably cause a number of men who are engaged in the industry to be thrown out of employment by reason of the cessation of operations. I can well understand the political pressure which, under such circumstances, will be applied to him. We all know the influence which members of Parliament, and the press, can exert. All these influences will be brought to bear with a view to inducing the Minister to declare that the quality of the product has not depreciated. I come now to the consideration of another point. Can one establishment for the production of iron supply the needs of Australia in competition with the outside producers? Let us suppose, for example, that the industry was started in Tasmania. We know that the question of freights must be considered in a matter of this kind. How are those freights governed? They are governed more by volume of trade than by distance. We know perfectly well that the freight from Tasmania to Western Australia is considerably higher than that from England to Western Australia. Therefore, even if this bounty were effective in allowing the Tasmanian manufacturer to supply the needs of that State, it is apparent that he could not supply the wants of Western Australia and possibly some other States in competition with the English article. That is absolutely clear. It is extremely improbable that more than one iron works will be started in Australia as the result of the payment of this bounty. Consequently, it is obvious that the bounty will be of advantage only to the State in which the industry happens to be started. Let us assume that one State alone is to have control of this industry. Why should another State be taxed for its advantage? If, as the result of this Bill, the industry is started in New South Wales, why should Victoria be taxed for the advantage of that State? Or, if the industry is to be established in Tasmania, why should New South Wales be taxed in respect of it?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There are large deposits in every State.

Mr. KELLY.—I have already shown that 492 men in Pittsburg can turn out more crude iron than the whole of Australia could consume. What is the use of talking about vast deposits of iron existing in all the States in view of our limited consumption? We might turn out immense quantities of iron; but if that which we could not consume had to be thrown into the sea, what useful purpose would be served? No one is more anxious than I am to see our iron deposits worked if that can be done profitably.

Mr. GROOM.—How does the honorable member propose to develop them?

Mr. KELLY.—Have all the industries of Australia been started under protection? Have the pastoral and agricultural industries of New South Wales been protected?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Yes.

Mr. KELLY.—Are not honorable members aware that in New South Wales we built up a boot industry under free-trade, which was healthier even than the boot industry of Victoria? It does not require a bounty to build up an industry. If assistance be given to an enterprise, that enterprise claims a vested right to the continuance of the assistance. I do not wish to be led into reading the evidence taken by the Commission, but we know from the report that the consensus of opinion on the evidence submitted in favour of the Bill is that the iron bonus will not be effective unless it be followed by a duty. What is the use of talking about the iron bounty as one that is going to establish the industry? For nearly forty years industries have been fostered in Victoria under the belief that they can be placed on their feet in this way. They have been a very long time, however, in getting on their feet—almost as long, so to speak, as some of my honorable friends opposite have been in rising to defend this measure.

Mr. TUDOR.—We have not had an opportunity.

Mr. KELLY.—Are my honorable friends in the Ministerial corner anxious to discuss the Bill?

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable member will know when he resumes his seat.

Mr. KELLY.—We have to consider the question of where the capital to be invested in this industry will come from. If the necessary capital is to be raised in Australia, what advantage will the Commonwealth derive? How are the people to be benefited by shifting money from one field of enterprise in Australia to other avenues of investment? It does not matter to Australia as a whole where she invests her money, provided that the investment is equally productive. Surely those of the people of Australia with money to invest are the best judges of what field offers the most productive opportunity for investment. If, on the other hand, the capital to be put into this industry is to be introduced from abroad, it is obvious that interest will have to be sent out of Australia in return. The return from the money introduced to start the industry will have to leave the Commonwealth. We all know that money makes money. Bringing money into a country makes money in that country; but that is not the only point in this case. We are told by those who are asking for this assistance that capital will not be invested in the industry unless we grant £300,000 to make up the interest on that capital investment. That £300,000 will be the first of the money that must leave Australia as the result of granting these bounties. This £300,000 is to be the first return on which the investor can reckon, and that return will go where the capital came from. Consequently, as the result of the passing of this Bill the people of Australia will be £300,000 poorer than they otherwise would have been. Having received the assurance of my honorable friends in the Ministerial corner that they are anxious to explain what these proposals really mean, I do not intend to take up very much more of the time of the House in dealing with them. As a free-trader, I naturally object to the Government seeking to make the Treasury a source of profit to any syndicate. I naturally object to tax the whole people to benefit a chosen few. I object also to wasting the national energies on industries that cannot stand alone, and cannot therefore at the present time, at any rate, be natural. As a free-trader, I notice with considerable alarm that the bulk of the evidence shows that the bounty cannot continue without a duty to back it up, and that duty must inevitably increase the difficulties in the way of our natural productions. I know further that the iron bounty will entice men from natural industries where they are earning a livelihood beneficial to the country—either on the wharfs—

Mr. EWING.—Or shifting sand.

Mr. KELLY.—That is what they will be called upon to do if this industry be established on the terms that my anti-socialistic friend is so anxious to provide in this Bill, if only to retain his present Ministerial position.

Mr. EWING.—I was only reminding the honorable member that some men have been employed in shifting sand.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable gentleman seems to think that is a reason why we should induce other men to follow that unremunerative occupation. In addition to my natural objections to this measure from the point of view of a free-trader, I say that if I were a protectionist I would also have nothing to do with it. Upon an analysis of the Bill it must be seen that it is not designed in the interests of the Protectionist Party of Australia. It will frighten away capital. It will advertise Australia as a country which cannot herself start this venture, but is prepared, under this very measure, to rob of the results of their enterprise and pluck those who may be so foolish as to enter upon the industry, if that enterprise and pluck in seeking to establish the industry are crowned with success. If the venture is a failure—unless good money is to be thrown after bad to keep it on its feet—the Bill means that £300,000 is to be thrown up the spout. Even if the venture is successful this Bill will be only a means of finding administrative billets for my socialistic friends in the Ministerial corner, and for all these reasons I shall resist it to the utmost of my power.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—I propose to vote against this measure, first of all because I am a free-trader, and secondly because I believe that it is simply designed to promote speculation. I should like to say at the outset that a free-trader is not opposed to the establishment of such an industry as that which this Bill is designed to assist. On the contrary, he would hail its establishment with great satisfaction, and many persons would not oppose the payment of the bounty, holding that it constitutes the least objectionable form of assisting the industry. But what I fear is that even after its establishment the industry will be granted protection that it really does not require. I have consulted the Minister of Home Affairs, and learn that it is the intention of the Government to move in both Houses that the industry shall be brought under the operation of the Customs Act when payment of the bounty ceases. I wish to say definitely that I would be in favour of the establishment of the iron industry by means of a bounty if it could not be established in any other way, as in my opinion that is the least objectionable form of assistance that could be given, and one would know what it would cost. But by passing this Bill we shall at once give our assent to the imposition of a protective duty of 10 per cent. on iron production scheduled herein. On the face of it the Bill suggests that the least objectionable form of protection is to be extended to the enterprise, because it does not show that after the bounty ceases direct protection will be granted to it. In my opinion, however, the iron bounty will simply offer a premium to the speculator who at present has this matter in hand. We know very well that it is suggested that something like £1,000,000 will be expended in the establishment of the industry if this Bill be passed. The iron-masters of England assert, however, that a plant costing less than £500,000 would be almost sufficient to turn out enough iron to meet the consumption of steel rails, not of Australia alone, but of England itself. The special pleading in support of the measure on the part of those personally interested in the project is really beside the mark. We have had a statement by the promoter that the establishment of the industry would find employment for 3,000 men, while the very next interested party that we meet tells us that it would give employment to 13,000 men. This seems to show that the persons most concerned with the venture are anxious to throw dust in the eyes of the people. I have had a very great deal to do with a project of this kind in the past, and I was in the very thick of the movement in connexion with which a proposal was made to the Government of New South Wales, to establish the iron industry there on a free-trade basis. Mr. Joseph Mitchell then had the matter in hand.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—What did the honorable member advocate then?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I advocated the establishment of the industry on a free-trade basis. I was of opinion that there should be open competition, but that the steel rails made in Australia should be purchased at the lowest English price, plus freight and charges—the natural protection.

Mr. WILKS.—The industry under that scheme would have been established upon business lines.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Upon free-trade business lines.

Mr. EWING.—What are free-trade business lines?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Business lines by which trade is untrammelled. English capitalists were prepared on the occasion to which I refer to invest £500,000 in plant and works, and in the buying of properties in Australia for the successful carrying on of the industry.

Mr. EWING.—What was Mr. Mitchell to get?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I do not wish to go into particulars which may not interest honorable members or the public; but I may say that Mr. Mitchell would have made a very large fortune if the venture had succeeded; and that is what the promoters of the scheme connected with the introduction of this Bill hope to do. He would have floated the company in England, and the necessary properties and coal mines would have been transferred to those who invested money in them. I personally own those properties to-day. I am the owner to-day of all the properties that were necessary for the conduct of that enterprise. The necessary funds could be obtained, and the industry started now but for the fact that the Government are dangleling before English capitalists this offer of £250,000. I went pretty exhaustively into the whole question some years ago, when the first Bill was introduced, and proved my bona fides by documentary evidence. When a similar Bill was being discussed some years back, I was in communication with London capitalists, whom I represented in Australia, and they told me that money would be forthcoming for the establishment of this industry, but they said, "You must not expect the capitalists of England to refuse £250,000 if they see any chance of getting it." While this offer is before the English public they will not invest in a scheme for the establishment of the industry on a free-trade basis.

Mr. TUDOR.—It is strange that something was not done before this offer was dangled before English capitalists.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The money was not put up for the establishment of the industry on a free-trade basis, because it was stipulated that a sufficiently large sum should be invested in plant whose capacity for output would largely exceed the requirements of New South Wales. Those who were interested in the concern felt that it would be useless to establish works if a market could not be found for their output, and they therefore asked for a guarantee that the other Colonies—this was prior to Federation—as well as New South Wales, would agree to take steel rails from them. If the State of Victoria had agreed to take its supply of steel rails from the New South Wales works, that would have been sufficient.

Mr. WILKS.—Would the honorable member like to have a quorum to hear these statements? [Quorum formed.]

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I am not particularly anxious to have a large House to hear my speech on this occasion, because I was fortunate in having an excellent attendance when I delivered an exhaustive speech on a similar measure some years ago; but I feel that I must not allow the Bill to pass without saying something upon its principles. The giving of a bounty for the establishment of this industry would not be such a very extravagant thing to do if all that has been claimed for the scheme were realized. But we know that that will not happen. The Minister of Trade and Customs told us, when making his second-reading speech, that Australia imports 7,000,000 tons of iron material annually, and that our requirements could be satisfied by a local industry. It does not follow, however, that anything like that output, including various kinds of manufactured ironmongery, would be the result of the establishment of local ironworks, nor is it necessary that they should have such a large output. Thousands of industries must be established in Australia before we can hope for a local output of 7,000,000 tons of iron manufactures. The honorable gentleman also said that the establishment of the industry would give employment to 13,000 men, though at the most only 300 men would be employed, and it is questionable whether Australia could use all the iron which they could produce. I do not think that it is stipulated in the Bill that a larger sum than is necessary shall be invested in plant, but a great deal will be required for the purchase of properties necessary for the proper conduct of this business. While it is contended that all the ore required may be obtained from Tasmania, I am of opinion, from the reports of experts who visited Australia to inquire into this matter some years ago, that several States will be drawn on for different kinds of ore. The establishment of the iron industry here would be an excellent thing for Australia, but it is not necessary to give a bounty of £250,000 to bring it about. £500,000 has been mentioned as the sum necessary to establish the industry, and the Minister said that £1,000,000 would be put into it. I quite believe that £1,000,000, if not more, will be put into it; but for what purpose? To pay out the promoters of the scheme. There is a huge fortune awaiting them. All those who hold properties necessary for the carrying on of this industry will be able to get fabulous sums for them. Parliament, however, should not unnecessarily vote £250,000 for the establishment of an industry which might be established on free-trade lines, if we said that Australia would not grant this bounty. Australia is a young country, and our requirements of iron for the construction of railways and other public works are very great. There is certain to be a large demand for iron here, and all that the promoters of the iron industry should want is a guarantee that the steel rails used by the States Governments will be taken from them. I do not expect the measure to pass; and I hope that when it is set aside, we shall wait a few years to see if capitalists are not prepared to put their money into the industry in connexion with a free-trade venture. As I have shown, they will not do that so long as there is a prospect of getting this £250,000 bounty. The Bill may get into Committee, in which case it will require amendment; but all I am concerned about now is its main principle, which I shall oppose.

Mr. McWILLIAMS (Franklin).—It is not my intention to unnecessarily delay proceedings, but, as this proposal is an entirely new departure for the Commonwealth, one who conscientiously objects to it has a perfect right to express his opinion upon it. I am not prepared to shape my opinion according to the views held by any other honorable member. I contend that it is nothing less than a swindle to hand over £300,000 of the taxpayers' money to a company, the promoters of which are to receive 500,000 shares out of the 1,000,000 shares constituting its capital.

Mr. FRAZER.—No company is mentioned in the Bill.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—No; but a certain company is mentioned in the evidence taken by the Bonus Commission, and it is well known that in the event of a bonus being granted, it is prepared to immediately proceed with the establishment of the industry.

Mr. HUTCHISON. — The company will have to produce iron before they can claim 1s. of the bonus.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Some time before I entered this House the question of the establishment of the iron industry was discussed, and I took a considerable interest in what was going on in regard to it, and also in the proceedings of the Bonus Commission. The general opinion was expressed, that, if the bonus were granted, the company that had practically been formed to establish the industry would obtain the greater quantity of ore required from Tasmania. It was stated last evening by the honorable member for Hindmarsh that the leader of the Labour Party at one time objected to the bonus being given to a private company, because he had hopes that the industry would be nationalized, but that he was not at present opposed to the granting of a bonus.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I did not say that he was not opposed to the granting of a bonus.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I shall quote from the report, which was signed by the honorable member for Bland and also by the honorable and learned member for West Sydney after having heard the evidence adduced before the Bonus Commission. The whole of the witnesses who were called were, with the exception of one or two ironmasters, favorable to the passing of the Bill. The opening paragraph of the minority report, which was signed by the honorable member for Bland, among others, reads—

We, the undersigned members of the Commission, are against the passage through Parliament of the Bill for the payment of bonuses by the Federal Government for the establishment of the iron industry within the Commonwealth.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Some of the members who signed that report desired that the industry should be taken up by one of the States Governments.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—There is no authority for putting such words into the mouth of the honorable member for Bland.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The honorable member is ignoring what the honorable member for Bland has since said in this House.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I have too high an opinion of the honorable member for Bland to suppose that he would put his name to a report which expressed views that were not shared by him.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Surely he can alter his opinion if circumstances change. It is well known now that none of the States will undertake to establish the industry.

Mr. McWILLIAMS. — The honorable member is seeking to twist the words of the honorable member for Bland out of their plain English construction. Why was the honorable member for Bland opposed to the Bill? Because it provided for the payment of £324,000 of the public money to private individuals. We cannot feel assured that the proposed bonus would result in the permanent establishment of the iron industry, although there is very little doubt that it would probably act as an inducement for the formation of a speculative company, and yield a considerable profit to the promoters. The report from which I have already quoted proceeds—

The Bill provides for the payment of £324,000 of the people's money to private individuals engaged in an enterprise for their private gain. There can be no guarantee that the bonuses proposed would permanently establish the industry, though it is probable the inducements offered might be instrumental in forming speculative companies.

One of the witnesses, Mr. Sandford, managing director of the Eskbank Iron Works, New South Wales, stated that he had made an agreement with an English syndicate to spend £250,000 in extending the Lithgow works if the Bill passed. In answer to another question, Mr. Sandford said that to make pig iron he wanted a plant involving an expenditure of from £100,000 to £125,000. This estimate is less than half the sum proposed to be paid in bonuses.

According to the evidence of the promoters of the scheme a company has already been formed with a capital of £1,000,000. At page 35 of the report, questions 706 and 707, the following occurs:—

By Mr. Watson.—I understand that so far you have not formed the proposed company?—The company is in existence at the present time. It contains 1,000,000 shares, 500,000 of which are issued to the owners of the mine, and we have to put up £30,000 as well.

By Mr. McCay.—What is the value of the shares?—They are £1 shares.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Is the honorable member prepared to say that it would be a scandalous proceeding to establish an industry in Tasmania?

Mr. McWILLIAMS. — I say that it would be a scandalous proceeding to establish an industry under conditions which would involve our handing over to a syndicate £304,000 of the public money. According to the evidence of the promoters of the company, they are to have the benefit of one-third of the bonus for themselves.

Mr. HUTCHISON. — They will have to give value for it before they can handle one penny of the bonus. What does it matter to us if we get the iron?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—What a change has come o'er the scene. It is nothing to the honorable member if, by legislation intended to establish the iron industry, a monopoly is created, and £304,000 of the taxpayers' money is handed over to a lot of syndicate-mongers. There is another point to which I wish to direct attention. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports has taken a very great interest in the business of the ironmasters of Victoria and the other States, and he has told us that their industry is in anything but a flourishing condition.

Mr. MAUGER.—Quite so; it is in a very bad way.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—And yet the honorable member proposes to help that industry by creating a monopoly, which will hold all those who use iron in the hollow of its hand.

Mr. McCAY.—How could the granting of a bounty give a monopoly to any one in Australia?

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I propose to show that there is not the slightest hope of a company being formed to establish the iron industry unless an assurance is given that when the bonus period terminates a duty of 12½ per cent. will be imposed on imported iron.

Mr. MAUGER.—If a company is not likely to be formed, why should we not pass the Bill, and have done with it?

Mr. McWILLIAMS. — I presume that we have something better to do than to discuss measures which are not likely to have any practical outcome. I take it that the Bill has been introduced seriously, and with the object of accomplishing some practical results. We have the evidence of Mr. Jamieson that a protective duty, as well as a bonus, will be required to establish the industry upon a firm foundation.

Mr. McCAY.—It is not proposed under the Bill to grant both a bonus and a duty.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—No, but we know very well that if the industry be established owing to the granting of a bonus, we shall probably have an appeal made at a later stage for help by way of a protective duty for an enterprise that is being strangled. I object to the imposition of a duty upon the articles which constitute the raw materials of a vast number of our manufactures.

Mr. MAUGER.—There is no objection to a duty on iron if a sufficient margin is allowed by the imposition of a higher duty of, say, 35 per cent., on the manufactured article.

Mr. McWILLIAMS. — It is well that honorable members should understand that the protectionists aim at imposing a duty of 35 per cent. upon all the tools of trade of the agricultural and other industries of Australia.

Mr. MAUGER.—The more duty that is imposed, the cheaper the articles will become.

Mr. McWILLIAMS. — Then the best thing we could do would be to erect a Chinese wall round the Commonwealth, and shut out everything. I cannot reconcile with my views the idea that the Commonwealth shall, by legislation, deliberately take from the pockets of the people the sum of £304,000 and place it practically to the credit of a syndicate which, upon its own showing, is to receive 500,000 shares of £1 each out of a company with a capital of £1,000,000.

Mr. GROOM.—The bonus may be earned by other companies.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The estimates put forward by Mr. Keats, Mr. Darby, Mr. Sandford, and Mr. Jamieson, are all based upon the assumption that the companies in which they are interested enjoy an absolute monopoly, so far as the production of iron in Australia is concerned. I challenge any honorable member to produce one tittle of evidence to the contrary. As a matter of fact, I find that, in reply to question 2341—which will be found upon page 115 of the official report of the evidence taken before the Commission—Mr. Keats, the gentleman who has had the sole control of the operations of the syndicate in London, and who visited the old country for the express purpose of floating a company upon the terms outlined in this Bill, was asked by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports—

Do you think there is room for more than one iron works in Australia?

His reply was—

Yes, if we had our works established they would be practically steel works, because our iron is suitable for the manufacture of steel; but there could be no other works to produce foundry iron.

I want honorable members to reflect seriously upon these proposals. Only last night a motion was submitted in favour of the appointment of a Select Committee, with the avowed intention of breaking down what its author thought—and what I think—is becoming a very dangerous monopoly in Australia—I refer to the steam-ship owners' "ring." There is nobody in this House who entertains a stronger feeling against monopolies and trusts than I do. In this Bill we are asked to deliberately subsidize a huge monopoly by means of the payment of £304,000 of the taxpayers' money. The whole of the evidence taken before the Commission is to the effect that one company—a company which will employ only a very small amount of labour—can produce the whole of the iron that is used throughout Australia. That is the testimony of the expert who was called, not to give evidence against the Bill then before the House, but upon behalf of those who advocate the payment of the bonus. I repeat that every estimate placed before the Commission was based upon the assumption that a single company enjoyed a complete monopoly of the iron trade of Australia. It was further stated that this was a preliminary company, and that a second company would require to be floated in order to provide the necessary capital. Are the 500,000 shares, to which I have referred, contributing shares, or paid-up shares? But, altogether apart from that consideration, Mr. Keats admits that after the stock of the company has been watered the flotation will be worth £200,000 to the owners of the mine. They are to receive £200,000, in addition to half the bonus. In other words, we are asked to hand over £350,000, including half the proposed bonus, to a syndicate which is to control the whole of the iron industry in Australia. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports put the question to several witnesses, "What will be the effect upon the ironworkers of Australia if a duty be imposed at the termination of the bonus period?" Mr. Jamieson admitted that the probability was that it would increase the cost of the raw material to the ironworkers of the Commonwealth. I wish to say that I have never read any evidence given before any Commission which impressed me as being more truthful upon its face than does that tendered by Mr. Jamieson. I believe that he divulged the whole of his mind to the Royal Commission, and I base my case absolutely upon his testimony. We all recognise that the moment we begin to tinker with the Tariff, we affect industries which are interdependent, and to which its ramifications extend. Mr. Thompson, a member of the firm of Thompson and Co., ironmasters, of Castlemaine, stated—

Every new impost on raw material is an additional cost to the manufacturer of machinery in the iron works of Australia.

He also pointed out that this company only proposed to lay down an exceedingly small plant when contrasted with the establishments to be found in Canada, England,

Scotland, Germany, and the United States. Mr. Thompson continued—

We do not think that the classes of iron which would be outlined here are sufficient for the trade.

It is well known that no industry requires at times a greater "fluxing"—if I may use that term—in its different grades than does the iron industry. One ironmaster has informed me that he is often obliged to import three or four grades of pig-iron in order to carry on operations. It will be impossible, I claim, to smelt the different grades of iron in the furnaces which it is proposed to erect in accordance with the scheme outlined before the Commission. Are we to impose a handicap of  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. upon the users of iron throughout Australia, in order that we may protect another grade of iron, when the works are not able to produce the very grade upon which we levy the duty? In Victoria the iron trade is in the most depressed condition. I make that statement as the result of personal inquiries. Shall we improve the condition of the ironworkers of the Commonwealth by imposing a duty of  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. upon their raw material? The baneful effects of such a proceeding have been evidenced in Tasmania in connexion with the jam trade. The duty which is levied upon sugar under our Tariff is equal to 40 per cent. upon the raw material of the jam-makers, and it is working disaster to the fruit-growers in that State.

Mr. WILKINSON.—But the raw material of one part of the Commonwealth may not be the raw material of another part. Sugar is a natural product in Australia.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Of course it is. Just as it is wrong to impose a duty upon one industry at the expense of another, so it is wrong to levy an impost upon iron which is used in every iron manufactory throughout the length and breadth of Australia. I have no desire to labour this matter. There are one or two points with which I propose to deal when the measure reaches Committee. The report, which was signed by the honorable member for Bland, the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, the honorable and learned member for Illawarra; Mr. Kirwan; Mr. Winter Cooke, and the honorable member for Parramatta, states—

We, the undersigned members of the Commission, are against the passage through Parliament of the Bill for the payment of bonuses by the Federal Government for the establishment of the iron industry within the Commonwealth.

That was the opinion of the honorable member for Bland and of a great majority of the Labour members who sat behind him when this Bill, in its original form, was under discussion. Where are those honorable members now? They have sat like mummies and allowed the whole of the opposition to this measure to fall to others. I can just imagine the fiery orations of the honorable member for Darwin if the late Government had proposed to grant a bonus equal to £300,000 to any company. "Boodler" is the mildest term which he would have employed. Honorable members sitting on the Ministerial benches, as well as those in the Ministerial corner, have so far allowed the whole of the criticism of the Bill to devolve on the Opposition.

Mr. CARPENTER.—We have heard denunciation, but not criticism.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I do not think that is a fair statement, so far as I am concerned. I have endeavoured to deal seriously with the Bill, and have offered no factious opposition to it. I hold, however, that, as a representative of the people, it is my duty to carefully examine it, and that honorable members opposite, even if they are prepared to allow the measure to pass without discussion, have no right to stigmatize fair criticism as mere denunciation. I shall vote against the second reading of the Bill; but if it be taken into Committee, it will be my duty to attempt to remove what I consider are some of its anomalies. I warn the House that if this Bill be passed, it will simply hand over £304,000 to a syndicate, which will receive practically £750,000 as the result of their venture, and that we shall thus create one of the most serious monopolies that has ever existed in Australia. I am not one of those who believe that the State should interfere with private enterprise more than is absolutely necessary; but, rather than that the Bill should pass in its present form—especially if the taxpayers of the Commonwealth are to be swindled, and their money taken from them in this way—I should prefer to vote for the bounty going into the coffers of the State. I should prefer to see the State swindle the public rather than allow a syndicate to do so.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong).—The honorable member who has just resumed his seat has used some very strong expressions, and has spoken of an attempt being made by a syndicate to swindle the public.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I should like to explain that when I used the word "swindle"—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member cannot make an explanation at this stage.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I should not like it to be thought that I used the word "swindle" in relation to any particular individual.

Mr. KNOX.—Every honorable member is justified in forming his own opinion with regard to the proposals contained in the Bill, and if the honorable member for Franklin considers that he was right in using the expression to which I have just referred, I can take no exception to it. But, inasmuch as the name of Mr. William Jamieson, who gave evidence before the Commission, has been frequently mentioned during the debate, I think I am entitled to say that if it was intended to apply the word "swindler" to him, or to those associated with him, no more unjust or uncalled-for observation could have been made. If honorable members will take the trouble to read the evidence which Mr. Jamieson gave before the Commission, they will at once see that it is that of a straightforward man, who desires to conceal nothing.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Hear, hear. I have said exactly what the honorable member now says of Mr. Jamieson.

Mr. KNOX.—I am glad to hear it. I repeat that no one would be justified in applying the word "swindler" to Mr. Jamieson. I trust that it is needless for me to explain that, although I am associated with various mining enterprises, I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the Blythe River syndicate. Whatever may be the designs of others who wish to benefit by this Bill, I am able to say that the promoters of the Blythe River scheme are imbued only by an honest desire to create a legitimate enterprise. The syndicate was formed, not to exploit Governments, or shareholders, or any one else, but simply to provide for the establishment of a strong creditable enterprise in Tasmania. Mr. Jamieson, to whose evidence frequent reference has been made, has been associated with some of the most important mining undertakings in Australia. He was one of the first interested in the Broken Hill Proprietary Company, and is now connected with other extensive mining undertakings. I can honestly say that he stands in the very front rank of capable and upright business men, and that his evidence before the Commission was characterized by the utmost frankness and candour. I knew nothing about the details of the scheme which the Blythe River syndicate have in view until a day or two ago; but when reference was made to it in the House I felt it my duty to see that reflections were not unjustly cast upon the members of that syndicate. I consequently made inquiries, and learned that the gentlemen in question enlisted the services of Mr. Darby—who is considered to be one of the most prominent iron experts in England—to inspect the Blythe River iron deposits, and to advise them as to whether it was possible to establish an enterprise in connexion with them that would be financially successful. Mr. Darby furnished an elaborate report to the syndicate, and I propose now to give a summary of it. I find that in his opinion the first step necessary to place the enterprise in anything like a sound position is to expend £17,108 in opening up the mine. If it were not for the fact that the deposits on both sides of the river are easy of access, £117,000, instead of £17,000, would be necessary for this purpose. In the circumstances, however, all that is needed for the proper working of those magnificent deposits is the erection of machinery at the cost I have mentioned. Then, again, it was estimated by Mr. Darby that a sum of £26,649 would have to be expended in providing sidings, approaches, and ore-loading docks at Burnie. Honorable members are aware that coal and fluxes must be obtained as cheaply as possible, in order to enable the enterprise to be worked successfully, and with that object in view Mr. Darby suggested that the company should purchase steamers of its own to convey flux and coal to the works. This he estimated would involve an outlay of £122,000. A further outlay of £45,137 would, he held, be necessary to provide wharf and unloading arrangements at Sydney. The syndicate had secured the option of acquiring land which is very close to one of the large coal mines at Newcastle. Coal bins, washery, and coke ovens would involve the expenditure of £106,796, and ore and coke bins, blast furnaces, and auxiliary plant, £215,182. A hot metal mixer and open hearth steel plant would cost £133,172; and mills and auxiliary plant, £175,934; while Mr. Darby also estimated that the general expenditure would be £57,706; making a total of £899,684. It was thought that the syndicate would be justified in raising sufficient capital to provide for the payment of four months' wages to the hands employed, not only at Newcastle, but on the steamers of the company, and in other directions, which it was estimated would mean an expenditure of £10,000 per week, or a total of £160,000. Then it would be necessary for the company to connect the mine with the port at Burnie by means of a double railway line, and this work, together with the provision of additional wharf accommodation, would mean an expenditure of £50,000, or a grand total of £1,109,684. These figures were not compiled for the purpose of giving information to the Parliament. They are the figures of an expert who was brought out to Australia to advise a syndicate of considerable financial strength as to what was necessary to place these great works on a sound and proper footing.

Mr. JOHNSON.—All the details are given in the report of the Commission.

Mr. CHANTER.—The figures quoted by the honorable member for Kooyong do not bear out the statement that has been made that the industry would not give employment to labour.

Mr. KNOX.—I have no personal interest in the matter, but am submitting these figures to the House on information that has been supplied to me, and with a knowledge of the bona fides of the gentlemen concerned. If the estimates are inaccurate, the responsibility rests, not with me, but with those who have furnished them to me.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The Commission had all these figures before them when making their report.

Mr. KNOX.—If they did so much the better. But it is important that the House should have the assurance again and again, if necessary, in order that the character and position of an honorable man may not be mis-called, either here or elsewhere. The statement continues—

I am sure that the above amount is necessary to properly equip and start works capable of producing 150,000 tons of steel and iron products, such as steel rails, sheets, plates, girders, &c.

The promoters reckon that, in connexion with their steamers, the obtaining of coal, and other work consequent upon the production of iron and steel, at least 3,000 men would be employed. These are figures which have been given to me by reputable persons, who know what they are speaking about. Honorable members have said that the only men employed will be the thirty or forty men required in connexion with one iron furnace. I admit that the number of men connected with any of these big furnaces is small. If one visits Broken Hill or Mount Lyell to-day, he will see only two or three men at work in attendance on each furnace. But, I ask, how many others are there employed in obtaining materials to feed the furnaces, and in other subsidiary occupations? Although at Broken Hill there are only two or three men in attendance on one of these great furnaces, there are employed, if we take into account those associated with the enterprise at Port Pirie, no fewer than 6,000 men.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—But what is the difference in the percentage of metal between Broken Hill and the Blythe River ores?

Mr. KNOX.—I do not recognise the pertinence of the question. If it is desirable to give assistance, it is more desirable to give it where the percentage of ore is low than where it is high. The figures which I have put forward are not fancy figures, but have been prepared by men whose reputation is known throughout the mining world of Australia, on the advice of a capable and competent expert, who was brought here to make a proper inquiry into the whole subject. Honorable members will, therefore, see that any statement made by Mr. Jamieson is the statement of an honest man, who is not likely to say what will not be borne out by facts. Although it is stated that one furnace would produce all the iron required in Australia, I would point out that in Great Britain, there are various classes and qualities of iron ore from which are produced different kinds of pig iron, and it is necessary to have several furnaces for the production of the various kinds of iron and steel. No doubt one of the large Pittsburg furnaces produces a very great quantity of iron; but if we establish the iron industry in Australia, it will require several furnaces to produce the various grades of iron that we need. Large sums have already been spent in Australia in exploiting iron. Near Launceston £200,000 was spent in such an enterprise; but it was unsuccessful, because those engaged in the undertaking had not proper guidance and advice. Their ore contained a material called chromium, and the iron was proved to be too brittle to be of any use.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—They had one of the best experts obtainable.

Mr. KNOX.—He was a good man, but he made a mistake. I do not hold a brief for the Blythe River Company; but I cannot listen silently to representations affecting the reputation of Mr. Jamieson, who is too honorable a man to make statements which this House may not accept. I was rather staggered to hear it said that there are not sufficient deposits of iron ore in Australia to justify the establishment of the iron industry here. The Blythe River deposits in themselves will be sufficient to supply the requirements of the Commonwealth for many years to come; but every other State as well as Tasmania has large deposits of iron ore. The Broken Hill Company has connected a railway with one of the largest of these deposits—what is known as the Iron Knob deposit—but they are not asking for assistance to work it, because they have other undertakings which are a source of profit to them. If there is any part of the world in which there are excellent deposits of iron ore, it is Australia. In Northern Queensland, and in the northern part of South Australia, the deposits of iron ore are so enormous as to make our potentialities for future work simply unspeakable. Some of this ore is thought to be so good for certain specific purposes that efforts are being made to obtain freights sufficiently low to enable it to be dealt with in some of the great English furnaces. Honorable members are aware that I have consistently expressed my belief in the desirability of establishing ironworks in Australia, though it is impossible, because of the immense capital necessary, to get people to go into the enterprise without assistance. Whether the assistance proposed in the Bill is the right kind of assistance is a subject which I hold myself free to discuss, when we come to consider the details of the measure. We are, however, justified in trying to discover what steps are necessary to enable us to turn our iron ore into a serviceable and useful article. I feel that, in view of the small margin of profit which exists in the production of iron, we shall be justified in seeing how far we can assist this industry, though it will be necessary at the same time to see that we do not thereby seriously interfere with other industries which are already established.

I have repeatedly said that I think a bonus properly applied, and properly safeguarded, would be justified in order to secure the establishment of the iron industry. I entirely disapprove of some of the provisions in the Bill, and will do my utmost to secure their amendment. If I cannot succeed in denuding the Bill of its objectionable features, I shall vote against it on the motion for the third reading. Rather than give any concession to an unsubstantial company, from which no good results could be reasonably expected, it would be better for the Commonwealth, or for one of the States, to embark in the enterprise; but in the first place we should endeavour to secure the establishment of the industry upon sound business lines under private enterprise, and with the assistance of a bonus under conditions which will safeguard the interests of the taxpayers. At the same time, we must take care not to interfere with the great primary industries which it is our desire to encourage in every possible way. It is undoubtedly a reproach to us at present that we have not yet established in our midst an efficient and complete ironworks capable of utilizing the enormous quantities of excellent ore and other necessary materials for ironworks which lie ready to our hands. I urge that the iron industry should be established, not so much on the ground that it would afford employment as for the reason that it is absolutely necessary for our success as a community that we should make good use of our undoubted rich resources, and become self-reliant.

Mr. WILKS.—Does the honorable member think that the granting of the bonus will have the effect of increasing the cost of iron?

Mr. KNOX.—No, I do not think so, because the iron will be produced on such a scale that, with the assistance of the bonus, the company will be able to place it on the market at as cheap a rate as that at which imported iron is now being sold. I say this, with the full knowledge that pig iron can be imported here at very low rates of freight. I feel satisfied that until some State assistance is granted, ironworks cannot be successfully established here, and I regard myself as perfectly justified in voting for the second reading of the Bill in the hope that reasonable representations will induce honorable members sitting on the Ministerial benches to abandon its objectionable features.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—I understand that some implied complaint has been made with regard to the criticism by members of the Opposition of measures brought forward by the Government. I can only say that those measures which are not of a controversial character have received every consideration from members of the Opposition. But if the Government bring forward proposals which run right across the principles of a number of honorable members, and, so far as we can judge, also run counter to their own professed principles, they must expect them to be subjected, not to obstructive, but to clear and full criticism.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—We have no objection to full and clear criticism.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—So far as I know, nothing more has been offered; but I understand that an indication to a different effect was given by the Prime Minister this morning.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The members of the late Ministry, when they were in office, also gave some similar indication.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — If the pages of Hansard are referred to it will be seen that the late Ministry had far greater provocation. I do not propose to occupy time in indicating my previously expressed objections to the principle of bounties. I would only say that, in connexion with this particular industry, it seems absolutely absurd to suppose that a bounty of £250,000 will have any good practical result. If the industry is to be successful, it will develop into one of the largest undertakings in the Commonwealth, and no question of £250,000 will decide matters one way or the other. Any genuine investors will, in the first place, have to satisfy themselves that there is a prospect of carrying on successfully without a bounty, or without even duties, because it is quite uncertain that duties will be retained on iron, seeing that it constitutes the raw material of so many industries. Those who contemplate investing their capital in ironworks will therefore have to satisfy themselves that the industry can stand by itself independently of any such contribution as that now contemplated. They will not be induced by the granting of a bounty to start the industry if they believe that, after the bounty ceases, the industry will not be able to stand against the competition of the world. What has been the experience in other countries? Where the iron industry has been established by means of bounties those interested in it have found themselves compelled to go to Parliament again and again and ask for a renewal of the grants, in order to enable them to continue their works. Unless investors anticipate that there will be a renewal of the bounties now proposed, it is unlikely that they will come forward.

Mr. STORRER.—The woollen industry of Tasmania did not require a renewal of the bonus.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But did not the manufacturers demand the continuance of the duties? If not, their case would be the first of which I have heard in which those interested in an industry established under protective duties have not demanded a continuance of them. I am not alluding to any particular company, but I can quite understand that persons who wished to establish an industry on the market, and did not care whether it was continued in the Commonwealth, might be very gratified to receive a bonus such as is proposed under the Bill. The fact that £250,000 was obtainable from the Commonwealth would be used as a lever in connexion with the floating of shares on the London market, and no doubt it would prove a great inducement to investors who, perhaps, did not know anything about the conditions of the Bill. I look upon this, not as a Bill for the encouragement of industries, but, from the protectionist standpoint, as a Bill for the discouragement of industries. Any legitimate investor in the iron production of Australia who intended to carry on the industry year after year, and to bring it to a successful conclusion, would, if he looked not only to the present, but to the future, for his returns, absolutely refuse to come under any such Bill as this. I say to the protectionists in this House — whose opinions I respect when they are honestly held, as I know they are in many cases, and whose actions I can respect when they are in accordance with their opinions—that, in supporting a measure of this kind, they are absolutely deserting their principles in order to mollify a section of their supporters. What is the first encouragement that is offered to this company? It is that a bond shall be given for the whole of the bounty that may be received, and that that bond shall be forfeited if there be any breach of the stringent conditions of the measure. The slightest breach—a trifling unintentional breach—if the company were in the hands of an adverse Government, would render them liable to forfeit the whole of the money which they had received. Under such circumstances, they would have to return that money to the Government, even if it amounted to the full £250,000. Surely any man who was handling his own cash would hesitate before undertaking a liability of that description. I do not know whether the Minister in the Chamber can tell me how long the bond is to run, or if it terminates when the bounty expires.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—To which bond does the honorable member refer?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am speaking of the bond which has to be given by the owners of the works to the Government for a refund of all the bounty paid if there be any breach of the conditions imposed by the Bill. How long is that bond to run?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I will give that information later on.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Bill does not say how long it is to be operative. It may run for ever, but, on the other hand, it may terminate coincidentally with the period over which the bounty extends.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It is to be hoped that the industry will run for ever.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Whether the industry is started at all depends upon the conditions that are inserted in this Bill. The second encouragement offered is that the investor is to be required to pay the wages which may be fixed. If the State were undertaking to pay a considerable sum to the industry, it might be quite reasonable that it should exercise some control over the wages payable. That is another difficulty—a discouragement rather than an encouragement—and for that reason any investor would be acting infinitely more wisely if he entered upon this undertaking with his hands free, and without the aid of any Government bounty. The next encouragement offered is the fixing of selling prices. That is a most extraordinary provision. It is well known to gentlemen who have had anything to do with manufacturing or mercantile pursuits, that under ordinary circumstances a firm cannot fix its own selling prices. Whatever control it may have over its individual industry, it is occasionally compelled by circumstances altogether outside itself, to accept prices which do not pay, and to take advantage of the market at other times to get larger profits than usual, to make up for the losses which have been incurred during the period that it was selling below cost. How, then, can the President of the Arbitration Court say what are reasonable prices? He cannot follow the various fluctuations of the business. Probably he will not concern himself with the past to the extent of recognising the loss which was made when prices were below cost, and the necessity for fixing a correspondingly high price when that is obtainable. All that he will look at is the relation which the profit bears to the cost of any article. If he thinks that that profit is excessive he will cut it down without any reference to the losses which have been previously made. I am perfectly certain there is not a member of this House who would invest his capital in any industry if he knew that that principle was to be applied to it. Then we have another so-called encouragement, in that the works are to be transferable to a State upon the demand of that State, if they prove successful. If they are unsuccessful, we may be sure that the States will leave the industry in the hands of its owners. If, however, through their enterprise and energy—through the possibility of getting cheap ore and converting it cheaply into metal—a profit can be obtained, then, after all the work has been undertaken by the company carrying on the business a State may step in and say, "We will annex that business, make it our own property, and secure the profits which your skill and enterprise have rendered probable." Now, I ask, is that an encouragement? Yet the Bill is called a "Bill for the Encouragement of Manufactures." It must be remembered, too, that while all the States are to contribute to this bonus, and possibly to a renewal of it, one State can annex the whole industry, should it prove successful. The Commonwealth cannot take it over. It cannot do so under its Constitution. But after all the States may have contributed—over perhaps many years—to the support of the industry, one State can step in and secure all the advantages for itself. The fifth encouragement is that the amount of compensation is to be fixed, as I have already said, by one man—not the most capable individual for that sort of work—and the security that is conferred by the Commonwealth Arbitration Act, which provides that there shall be assessors sitting with the President of the Arbitration Court, is removed. There are to be no assessors. The President is to act upon his own authority, and what is more extraordinary still, there is to be no appeal from his decision. I cannot conceive how honorable members, who profess to believe in the developing power of bounties, can attach such conditions to any Bill. I notice that a gentleman who has been a strong supporter of the party to which the Postmaster-General belongs in New South Wales, declares that the Bill is absolutely useless—that the protectionists who support it have abandoned their principles. He affirms that latterly they have allowed another party to rule them with a rod of iron.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Who says that?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is the statement of Mr. Forsyth, one of the leading protectionists of New South Wales. He declares that the protectionists have sold all their principles, and are offering not bread, but a stone to the people of Australia.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—That is not Forsyth the protectionist, but Forsyth the Conservative.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am speaking of Mr. Forsyth, a leading protectionist of New South Wales, whose support and assistance the Postmaster-General has frequently been glad to receive. That gentleman was president of the Protectionist Association. Another extraordinary encouragement which is offered by the Bill is the fixing every six months—and I believe that the Minister proposes to make the term three months—of wages and prices. In other words, this industry is to be continually before the Court. It is to be before that tribunal at least every six months, and possibly every three months. Not only that, but it will be the only industry in any State of the Union which will be subject to two Arbitration Courts. After the President of the Commonwealth Arbitration Court has settled the wages and the prices which shall be paid, upon his six-monthly reference, the men engaged in the industry, or the masters, whichever it may be—probably it will be the men, owing to the terms of the Bill—may appeal to the State Arbitration Court, and re-open the whole of the wages question. The Commonwealth cannot prevent resort to the local Arbitration Court. The Bill provides that the industry shall be brought before the Commonwealth Arbitration Court once in six months, if not oftener; and I repeat that after a decision has been given by that tribunal in respect of wages, reference can be made to, say, the New South Wales Arbitration Court—as the smelting portion of the industry is likely to be located in that State, on account of the coal deposits there—to upset the decision of the Commonwealth Arbitration Court.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—There will be no necessity to do that if reasonable wages are paid.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If the men do not think that the decision of the Commonwealth Arbitration Court is reasonable, they will have a perfect right to appeal to the Arbitration Court in the State in which the industry is being carried on. That impresses me as constituting an extraordinary encouragement. If the Bill passes in its present form, it seems to me absolutely hopeless to expect that capital will be invested in the industry. Any persons who desired legitimately to carry it on, and to make it a permanently profitable industry, would at once say, "Keep your bonus; the restrictions which you impose, the difficulties by which you surround us, do not make it worth our while to embark upon the enterprise." On the other hand, I can understand that a company which was formed really for mining the market—not for mining the ore—would take advantage of the bonus to quote its shares upon the market, where investors would not be fully acquainted with the disabilities imposed by this measure. If the industry be established at all, these conditions must lead to a flotation, that so far from being of advantage to Australia, will be disadvantageous to it. One of our greatest evils here has been—I am sure honorable members will agree with me—the over-capitalization of investments, and especially mining investments. That has been an influence which has retarded many legitimate enterprises, and if we start the iron industry with that serious drawback, I have little hope of its success at this stage in the history of Australia.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Is there not less chance of over-capitalization if such stringent conditions are imposed?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—As I have already said, these conditions make it impossible for men who wish to work the industry legitimately to carry on operations. To the men who do not care whether the industry is successful or otherwise so long as they get a good price for the shares which they receive for the flotation of the company, these restrictions do not matter at all. So far as I can see, that is the only respect in which the Bill would encourage investment. We have further to consider that we are lightly asked to commit ourselves to an expenditure of £304,000 in the shape of bounties when, as the Treasurer has pointed out, we are about to feel the pressure of the Braddon clause. Our margin of Customs revenue is being rapidly reduced, and we have other liabilities in front of us, because the Departments still remaining to be taken over are for the most part spending rather than income-earning branches of the Public Service. We have the further knowledge that when the value of the transferred properties has been determined, hundreds of thousands of pounds will have to be provided out of our present margin of revenue to pay interest on those properties. Yet, despite all these facts we are proposing lightly to incur an expenditure of £304,000.

Mr. RONALD.—Not "lightly."

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—At all events, the proposition has been submitted without much consideration. The financial aspect of the question has not been dealt with by the Minister in charge of the Bill. The honorable gentleman has not shown the House how the necessary funds for the purposes of the Bill are to be provided, having regard to the increasing liabilities falling upon our restricted share of the Customs revenue. Another provision to which I am strongly opposed is that in which it is actually proposed to make a gift of money to certain individuals. For instance, provision is made in the schedule for bounties amounting to £50,000 for the manufacture of galvanized iron, wire-netting, and iron and steel tubes or pipes. As a matter of fact, these goods are already being produced in large quantities in the Commonwealth. I am informed that the wire-netting industry in New South Wales is so busy that orders cannot be booked, except for at least six months ahead, and that those engaged in it are actually receiving £37 a ton, or nearly twice as much as they at one time accepted for their output. Honorable members from Queensland probably know that the company in question took about £18 a ton for wire-netting from the Queensland Government.

Mr. PAGE.—That is correct.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—But what was the condition of the industry twelve months ago?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member for Maranoa supports my statement. Those engaged in the industry in New South Wales are working night and day, and, as I have said, cannot book orders, except for six months ahead. Yet it is deliberately proposed that those who have actually established this industry without any assistance shall receive a large proportion of the sum of £50,000 to be given away in the shape of bounties. Iron and steel pipes are also being made in considerable quantities in Australia, and yet those engaged in that industry are to have a share of this £50,000.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Is it not rivetted pipes that we are now making in Australia?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Hoskins', of Sydney, are making cast as well as rivetted pipes.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Perhaps they are making pipes other than those for which the bounty is intended.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am not sure, but I think I can assure the honorable member that they are making pipes of various sizes. They are supplying the gas company.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—In view of the words, "except rivetted or cast," it seems that the bounty is to be paid only in respect of drawn pipes.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It may be that the bounty is to be given only in respect of pipes which are not being made here, but if that be so, the class of pipe the manufacture of which we desire to assist should be specified in the Bill. I can positively say, however, that although the wire-netting industry was not very prosperous during the drought it is now working a full board, and at high rates. I fail to see why it should be singled out for special treatment any more than other industries which have been long established in Australia. I have no wish to delay the House. I have confined my remarks to matters with which I have not previously dealt, but should like, in conclusion, to know from the Minister of Trade and Customs, who is now present, what is to be the currency of the bond to be given under the Bill. Is it to be a perpetual bond, or is its currency to terminate with the bounties?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think it is to cease with the bounties.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I informed the Minister a week ago that I should ask this question, as I did not wish to take him by surprise.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is so, but I have overlooked the matter.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If the bond is to be a perpetual one, those who invest in the industry will be called upon to undertake an extraordinary liability. If, on the other hand, it is to terminate with the bounties, the parties concerned will then be perfectly free to do whatever they please.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am afraid that the honorable member will have to give me formal notice of his question.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I gave the Minister notice, and he should be able to supply us with this information.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The suggestion is that the bond is to expire with the bounties.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Bill does not say so. If it is to expire with the bounties those concerned will then be free to do as they please.

Mr. CONROY.—Supposing a man enters upon the industry, and does all that is required of him for two years, is he to lose all that he has earned during that period if he fails to comply with the conditions in the third year?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I have already referred to that point. We ought to know what is to be the currency of the bond.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think it is made clear in clause 9.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Clause 9 reads—

The person claiming any bounty shall, before receiving the same or the first instalment thereof, give his bond to the Commonwealth in the sum of the aggregate amount of bounty which he may thereafter receive—

I suppose that he is to give a bond for £250,000?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That would be the case if he were going to do the whole work.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That must be so, otherwise the Minister could not fix upon the amount in respect of which the bond was to be given. The clause continues—

(hereinafter called the secured amount), conditioned to be void if he fulfils all the following conditions.

Is he to fulfil these conditions for ever, or only during the period over which the bounties are spread? This is a very important question, and it should be answered by the Minister.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think it is answered by the Bill itself.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—What is the answer?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I shall tell the honorable member when I reply.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The matter should have been explained by the Minister in introducing the Bill. Will he not say in a few words now what is to be the currency of the bond?

Mr. McCAY.—He does not know.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I had occasion in connexion with another Bill that was under consideration to point out that we were not in possession of certain information, yet in that case, as in this, the Minister would not supply it. So far as the currency of the bond is concerned, we are in the dark, and I am inclined to think that the Minister is in the same position. It ought to be made clear in the Bill. I hope that the Minister will avail himself of an opportunity to decide what is really meant, and to inform the House accordingly. I cannot conceive that the Bill will encourage legitimate investment in the iron industry. In other words, I do not think it will encourage investment in the enterprise with a desire to carry it through, it may be, years of struggling, to a successful issue. I can only conceive that it will be used, if used at all, as a means of company flotation and over-capitalization on the London market. It will be said, "Here we have £250,000, which will pay 5 per cent. for ten years on £500,000, and investors are therefore safe." All the difficulties and all the restrictions imposed by the Bill will not be placed before likely investors, and they may be induced to start an enterprise which any one desiring to carry it out successfully would absolutely refuse to enter upon.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—I shall be compelled to vote for the second reading of the Bill, for the reason that I told my constituents a considerable time ago that I would support a proposal to develop the iron industry by the granting of a bonus, in preference to the imposition of protective duties on the production of iron. I have to acknowledge a certain amount of reluctance in making this announcement, because I cannot help feeling that the Bill, as put before the House, is designed to do something more than promote the establishment of the iron industry. I believe that if the Bill had never been introduced the industry would have been established before now. It appears to me that I am placed on the horns of a dilemma. If I refuse to vote for the second reading, and the Bill is rejected, the effect will be to hang up the operations of speculators who are now nibbling at the venture, and they will still hold off, in the hope that some future Parliament will pass a Bonus Bill and assist them to embark upon the enterprise. I think, on the whole, that it would be better for us to agree to the second reading, and deal with the details of the Bill in Committee, rather than to throw it out altogether, and so defer the establishment of the iron industry, probably for some years. I agree with a great deal that the Minister said in introducing the Bill as to the importance of the industry. The Minister hardly made out as strong a case as he might have done, for iron, as Mr. Cobden has said, is the "daily bread" of all other industries. One can hardly conceive of an industry to which that remark will not apply.

Mr. CONROY.—Consequently iron ought to be as free as possible.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Yes; but there may be circumstances under which free-traders like myself and the honorable and learned member would vote for the granting of a bonus rather than have heavy protective duties imposed. I gather from the reports of experts which have been placed before us that there are, in various parts of Australia, large deposits of iron ore which would pay commercially for working. When the States had each its own Tariff, it was impossible for any State to develop these natural resources; but the position is altered now that the whole market of Australia is open to the iron produced. I was hopeful that under these circumstances something would be done towards the establishment of a local iron industry, and the only reason I can think of for the delay which has taken place in the exploitation of our iron deposits is that the various syndicates, proprietaries, and persons interested in them are staying their hands in the sure and certain hope that something will be done by the Federal Government to assist them. I have said that I am prepared to encourage the starting of the iron industry by granting a bonus for the production of iron, but I am not prepared to give double assistance by voting also for fiscal protection, because that might have the effect of increasing the price of iron to the consuming industries of Australia to an extent greater than they might be able to bear. Whilst, therefore, I am disposed to support the second reading of the Bill, I intend, in Committee, to co-operate with others in making certain amendments in it, and, without entering into minute details, I will shortly give my reasons for taking that course. But, before doing so, I wish to address myself briefly to the general character of the measure. Although we have had to commend the drafting of most of the measures which have been submitted to us, I do not think that even those who are most favorably disposed to the present Government can commend the draftsmanship of this measure, because it is probably the most slipshod that was ever placed before any Parliament. The honorable member for North Sydney has already referred to two or three matters which have struck me in connexion with the looseness of the provision under which a bond is to be exacted from the claimants of the bounty. As he has pointed out, clause 9 does not say how long that bond shall operate, or when it shall expire; and when the Minister was asked the question he was unable to answer it. Clause 9 also provides that the person claiming any bounty shall pay to his workmen the highest wages paid for similar work, though no similar work is being done in Australia. If it were otherwise, we should not be asked to pass this measure. The clause also provides for the charging of fair prices for the iron that is sold. That is a ridiculous provision if it is not intended to propose high protective duties which would give local manufacturers of iron the opportunity to fix their own prices. If the local manufacturers are subjected to the open competition of the world, that competition will fix fair prices; but if it is the intention of the Government to encourage the iron industry, not only by the granting of a bonus, but also by the imposition of a protective duty, there may be some reason for enacting by legislation the price at which locally-produced iron is to be sold. Such a provision is, however, a most extraordinary one. The Minister of Trade and Customs is apparently so ill-informed as to the intentions of the Bill that he is not able to answer the simple question asked by the honorable member for North Sydney.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I gave a week's notice of it.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Yes, and the honorable gentleman's speech was an important business criticism of the Bill. Yet the Minister is not ready with an answer.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If honorable members will let me reply, I will tell them all that they wish to know.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The Minister should do what he can to assist the passing of the Bill, and I would remind him that I am a supporter of the measure. He could give us this information in two or three words. Either the bond is to last for an indefinite period, or—and this is the more natural conclusion—it is to terminate when the bounty ceases. But, apart from that, the draftsmanship of the Bill is shaky and prolix.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member should tell that to the Attorney-General. I never attempt to draft measures.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I tell the honorable gentleman, as he is in charge of the Bill. Clause 6 says that no bounty shall be paid on certain kinds of iron after certain dates, and the schedule contains a similar provision, set forth in different language. When the Caliph Omar was asked what was to be done with the library at Alexandria, he said that if it contained anything which was not in the Koran it was dangerous, and should be destroyed, and that if it contained anything which was in the Koran it was useless, and should be destroyed. So I say, with regard to clause 6, that if it contains provisions differing in their language from those in the schedule they should be struck out, because otherwise difficulties of interpretation will arise. For instance, clause 6 says that—

No bounty shall be authorized to be paid on—

(a) Pig iron, puddled bar iron, or steel made after the first day of January, One thousand nine hundred and eleven.

While the schedule says—

Pig iron made from Australian ore . . . .
1st January, 1911.

Under clause 6 the bounty may be paid on pig iron made from imported or from scrap iron. There are other small differences between clause 6 and the schedule, which may give rise to difficulties of interpretation. If in clause 6 the draftsman had adopted language similar to that of clause 5 these difficulties would have been avoided. Clause 5 provides that—

The total amount of the bounties authorized to be paid in respect of any particular class of goods shall not exceed the amount set out in the third column of the schedule opposite the description of that class of goods.

Those words are very precise, definite, and businesslike, and their meaning cannot be misunderstood. Clause 6 would have been much clearer, and more succinct, if it had provided that—

No bounties shall be authorized to be paid in respect to any particular class of goods made after the date set out in the fourth column of the schedule opposite the description of that class of goods.

Such a provision would have given those who may wish to claim bounties, those who will be called upon to administer the measure, and those who may be called upon to interpret it, a clear, definite, and precise instruction as to the intention of the Legislature. According to the schedule, the total amount of bounty which may be authorized for goods of class 2 is £50,000, and that class is made up of galvanized iron, wire netting, and iron and steel tubes or pipes not more than six inches in internal diameter. The rate of bounty on such goods is 10 per cent. on their value. It might happen, however, that A. might claim the £50,000 on galvanized iron, B. on wire netting, and C. on iron and steel tubes. There is nothing in the Bill to say how in such a case the bounties should be apportioned. Of course, it is apparent that the difficulty can be got over by the introduction of a clause providing that if the claims to the bounty are greater than the total amount provided for the class of goods for which a certain sum is voted, the distribution shall be pro rata. Then, again, it is provided that £8 each shall be given for the first 500 reapers and binders manufactured. Free-trader as I am, I look upon the giving of this bounty as, at any rate, a less evil way of stimulating manufacture than is the imposition of protective duties. I should be prepared to support that, and also, as a common-sense business man, to give some little further extension of the period. This Bill cannot become law until about the end of the current year, and those who desired to secure the bonus would have only six months within which to do so. Unless those who support the Bill have some firm "up their sleeves" open-mouthed and ready to secure the bonus, it must be admitted that this is a ridiculous provision. Six months would be too short a period within which to expect persons with the necessary capital, brains and knowledge to start the manufacture of reapers and binders, and earn the £4,000 which is offered by way of bonus. To this extent, I think the Bill is badly drawn, and that some provision better calculated to stimulate the industry should be inserted in the Bill. So far as galvanized iron is concerned, the manufacturers already enjoy the benefit of fair protection, and the galvanized wire-netting business has been established under conditions of perfect freedom, so far as the Tariff is concerned, and is now being carried on with the greatest success. The company which is operating in Sydney is so inundated with orders that one cannot very well conceive of a more successful enterprise. Therefore, it appears to me to be absurd to propose to make them an absolute gift of a large sum of money. Therefore, when the schedule is under consideration, I shall be glad to co-operate with those who desire to excise that provision. I do not think the honorable member for North Sydney was entirely correct when he spoke upon the subject of the iron pipes provided for in class 2 of the schedule. Although we are making cast and riveted pipes on a very large scale, and the industry is carried on under conditions which are highly creditable to the manufacturers, I take it that the Bill is intended to encourage the production of a class of pipes which is not at present manufactured here. I refer to the smaller kinds of pipes for water, steam, and gas purposes, under six inches in diameter, or what are known as drawn pipes. The Bill is badly drafted, because the definitions are not sufficiently clear; and I think that the intention should be clearly expressed. Turning again to the production of crude iron—puddle and bar iron—I should like to again point to the report of the Bonus Commission, which contains some very valuable information. I think honorable members should carefully study that report before they proceed to vote the large amounts proposed in aid of the iron industry. Mr. Sandford, who has probably the widest experience of any man in our community upon this subject, stated

most distinctly, not once but twice, and in reply to very definite and specific questions that he could produce pig iron at Lithgow for 35s. per ton. His statement was most definite, because the honorable and learned member for Corinella questioned him as follows:—

I am not quite sure that I understand what you mean when you say that pig iron could be produced at Lithgow at 35s. per ton—is that taking everything into account?

Mr. Sandford's reply was—

I give that as an estimate of the net cost at Lithgow.

That is very definite, and it seems to me that here we have an absolute stumbling-block in the way of any proposal to grant a bonus for the production of iron. If we can produce pig iron in Australia at 35s. per ton, what reason can be advanced for granting a bonus such as that now proposed? I am prepared to admit that I think Mr. Sandford made a mistake. He has corrected that mistake in a certain way, and has communicated his ideas to a reporter of the Sydney Daily Telegraph, whose report is published in the Age of Monday last. Mr. Sandford said—

A good deal had been made of his statement before the Bonus Commission that pig iron could be made here at 35s. a ton. In giving that figure he had only the net cost in view. He did not reckon interest on capital, about 5s. a ton; depreciation and redemption, equal to about another 5s. a ton; freight to Sydney, which was our local market and the market for the shipping trade, 8s. 6d. a ton, besides other incidentals, which would bring the cost to 61s. a ton.

At the time Mr. Sandford gave evidence before the Commission, he was also communicating his ideas to persons outside, and it seemed to be his idea, in furthering the objects of those interested in the iron trade, to prove that iron could be produced in Australia at a very low cost indeed. Apparently, he afterwards came to the conclusion that he had overleaped himself, and fallen on the other side, and that it was required of him that he should show that others matters had to be taken into consideration before the real cost of iron production could be arrived at. Under Mr. Sandford's new estimate he claims 5s. per ton for interest. I think it is a well-known axiom in political economy that interest in such a case as this would mean profit, because either one of two things must happen. Either the company must go into the business with subscribed capital of the amount necessary upon which no interest would have to be paid, or it must borrow money.

upon which it would have to pay interest. The allowance made for interest must therefore be regarded as profit, or partly profit. Coming back to the report of the Commission, Mr. Sandford stated that he could erect a blast-furnace in New South Wales for £100,000, and that he could produce up to 1,200 tons per week of crude iron. Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that he could produce 1,000 tons per week. An allowance of 5s. per ton for interest would yield £13,000 per annum, and that amount would represent a return of 13 per cent. upon the capital outlay of £100,000. That would be independent of any bonus. I can only say that if those who are engaged in many other industries in Australia could feel assured that they would obtain such a return as 13 per cent., they would be induced to launch out much more extensively than they do at present. Mr. Sandford then makes a most extraordinary claim. He wants to make an allowance of another 5s. per ton for depreciation or redemption. Speaking as one who has had a good deal to do with laying out plants and building factories, I must say that I never heard the word "redemption" used before in this connexion. One can easily see that something more than depreciation is provided for when it is remembered that £13,000 per annum is to be devoted to redemption and depreciation. If Mr. Sandford could legitimately claim these two allowances, each amounting to £13,000 per annum, the company engaged in the work would not only be able to make a very satisfactory profit, but would within a very short space of time entirely redeem the whole of its capital. This would be entirely exclusive of any bonus. Mr. Sandford says that it costs 8s. 6d. per ton to convey pig iron from Lithgow to Sydney, and I will assume that the average cost of conveying the iron from Lithgow to the various central ports of Australia would average, say, 15s. per ton. It must be admitted that, in dealing with large quantities of material, such as would be handled in this case, low rates of freight could be secured. Adding 15s. per ton to the 10s. per ton which Mr. Sandford claims for interest, depreciation, and redemption, we arrive at a total of 25s., in addition to the 35s. per ton which represents the cost of production at Lithgow, or an aggregate of £3 per ton. Mr. Sandford says that iron is being landed in Sydney at present at £3 1s. per ton; other persons quote the average price as more closely approaching £4 per ton. I think, therefore, honorable members will see that Mr. Sandford's own figures show that we should be very careful before we consent to vote the large sums of money which it is proposed to expend under this Bill by way of bounties. Nobody is more desirous than I am of seeing Australia make use of her vast deposits of iron ore. But we should be careful that we do not pay too much for our whistle. The Government have made no financial provision whatever for the payment of these large bounties. They are plunging into the experiment almost blindfold, and consequently it behoves us to be extremely cautious when we come to deal with the details of the measure in Committee. I shall support the second reading of the Bill, reserving to myself the right, in Committee, to reduce some of the proposed bounties, to eliminate others, and generally to hedge round its provisions in such a way as to afford less chance than now exists for litigation, and to minimize the evils of a measure which has been badly drawn and badly devised.

Debate (on motion by Mr. CONROY) adjourned.

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES BILL.

Bill returned from the Senate with an amendment.

Motion (by Mr. GROOM) agreed to—

That the message be taken into consideration forthwith.

In Committee (Consideration of Senate's message):

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—Honorable members will recollect that this Bill was passed by the House last session. It was transmitted to the Senate, where it has been agreed to, with the exception of one amendment, which has been made in clause 6. That clause provides—

1. It shall be an offence under this Act—

- (a) if a life assurance company pays money on any policy taken out after the passing of this Act on the death of a child under ten years of age otherwise than as provided by this Act; or
- (b) if a parent or personal representative of a parent claiming money on the death of a child produces a certificate of the death other than as provided in this Act to the life assurance company from which the money is claimed, or produces a false certificate or one fraudulently obtained or in any way attempts to defeat the provisions of this Act; or

(c) if a policy issued under and by virtue of the provisions of section two shall not set forth that the total sum or sums recoverable on the death of any child as assurance moneys or other benefits from any one or more life assurance companies or friendly societies shall not exceed the amount so specified in the schedule hereto.

2. For every such offence the penalty shall be Five pounds.

The Senate has increased that penalty to £45. I move—

That the amendment be agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

Reported that the Committee had agreed to the Senate's amendment; report adopted.

House adjourned at 4.6 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 29 August, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

ASSENT TO BILLS.

Assent to the following Bills reported:—

Supply Bill No. 2.

Evidence Bill.

Service and Execution of Process Bill 1905.

PETITIONS.

Mr. R. EDWARDS presented a petition from certain residents of Queensland, praying that stringent legislation be enacted to prohibit the importation and sale of opium within the Commonwealth.

Petition received.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition from the Central Council of Employers of Australia, praying the House not to enact the provisions of the Trade Marks Bill relating to union labels.

Petition received and read.

Mr. McDONALD.—I should like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the petition is in order? It appears to me that it contains certain passages which dictate to and threaten this House, and if a petition in such terms is to be received, it may at some future time form a precedent for the presentation of others of a much more objectionable character. Among other things, the petitioners say that if this House adopt a certain course, it will commit an illegal act. I presume that no petitioners have a right either to dictate to or threaten honorable members.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have had only the same opportunities as have been afforded to honorable members to acquaint myself with the contents of the petition. I shall go through it carefully, and report to the House later on if I find that it is of such a character that it should not be received.

ORIENT MAIL SERVICE TO BRISBANE.

Mr. CULPIN.—I desire to ask the Prime Minister a question with regard to the subsidy which the Queensland Government have agreed to pay to the Orient Company in consideration of their extending their service to Brisbane. Will the Prime Minister make provision on the Estimates for the repayment of the amount of the subsidy to the Queensland Government, who have practically been compelled to take steps to secure the extension of the service?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Notice of the honorable member's question must be given if an answer such as it deserves is to be supplied. I am not yet officially aware of the execution of the contract, or its terms, or the sum which the Orient Company is to receive. I am, like the honorable member, dependent upon the newspaper reports, and the information thus afforded is not sufficient to enable one to express an opinion. As the Government of Queensland have entered into this contract for their own purposes, and at their own cost, an application such as that indicated by the honorable member would have to come from them, and if it has been in contemplation to make such a request it would have been better if the Commonwealth had been consulted beforehand.

SLANDERS ON AUSTRALIA.

Mr. HIGGINS. — I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the systematic attempts which are being made by some Australian writers for the London press and others to disparage our Australian legislation, and also whether he has noticed a statement contained in an article published recently in the Spectator to the effect that the people of Australia have become ashamed of the Immigration Restriction Act. I wish to know, further, whether he has taken any steps to have proper representations made on the subject.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Unhappily our attention is being continually arrested by statements made in Great Britain, and also in the Commonwealth, which seem to be the outcome of a campaign of calumny against the credit of this country. No one challenges the right of free speech, or objects to the criticisms, of those who take exception to any particular measure of legislation if they offer reasons for their opinions, but I regret that both our legislation and our circumstances are continually being misrepresented, and that grossly, by those who have the best reason for speaking well of this country.

MR. O. C. BEALE'S COMMISSION.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I desire to ask the Prime Minister a question with regard to the following paragraph, which appears in this morning's Age :—

Inquiries in Europe are to be made on behalf of the Commonwealth Government by Mr. O. C. Beale, chairman of the Australian Chambers of Manufactures, with reference to foreign legislation designed "to check and prevent the sale of deleterious drugs and poisons prepared under secret formulæ," and also with reference to infant mortality in foreign countries. Mr. Beale was a member of the New South Wales Birth Rate Royal Commission, of which Dr. McKellar was chairman. He is proceeding to Europe at his own expense, and will fulfil his commission without cost to the Federal Government and Parliament. The Prime Minister has given Mr. Beale an official letter of introduction.

I should like to know what is the nature of the commission that has been issued to Mr. Beale.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The commission which Mr. Beale has undertaken is exactly set forth in the words which are printed within quotation marks in the paragraph referred to. Mr. Beale is about to visit Great Britain and Europe, and being acquainted with more than one European language, and having learnt, during the time that he was a member of the New South Wales Commission which inquired into the subject of the decrease in the birth rate, that legislation which is said to have proved highly effective, has recently been passed in some European countries, has generously placed his services at the disposal of the Commonwealth in order that he may obtain information with regard to such legislation from the officials charged with its administration. He has undertaken this very useful work without cost to the Commonwealth.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I should like to know what are Mr. Beale's qualifications and whether, in a matter of such importance, it would not have been better to give a commission to a medical man acquainted with the subject?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Questions without notice are being multiplied rather inordinately of late, but the honorable member is entitled to an answer to his question.

Mr. CONROY.—I desire to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether the Prime Minister is in order in saying that questions without notice are becoming multiplied rather inordinately. Is not that statement a reflection on honorable members?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think the Prime Minister has made any remark reflecting upon honorable members.

Mr. CONROY.—Did you, Mr. Speaker, hear the Prime Minister's statement?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I heard the remark of the Prime Minister, to the effect that questions without notice were becoming inordinately multiplied. If the Prime Minister holds that opinion he is quite justified in expressing it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Mr. Beale served a long apprenticeship under Dr. McKellar with a number of medical men in connexion with the New South Wales Birth Rate Commission, and took a deep interest in the subject. He is further qualified, owing to his acquaintance with one or two Continental languages. Therefore, although not able to give a medical judgment, and not being required to do so, he will be in a position to consult medical experts in Europe as to the efficiency of the legislation which has been passed dealing with the matters referred to.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether he is correctly reported by the press to have said, upon Friday last, that Britishers coming to Australia under contract did not require exemption certificates?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I did not say that they did not require exemption certificates.

Mr. ROBINSON. — The honorable and learned gentleman is reported to have made that statement.

Mr. DEAKIN.—What I was alluding to was this: that exemption certificates are not generally used in connexion with British subjects, and when the Agents-General in great Britain were authorized to issue those certificates, they were so informed.

RIFLE CLUBS.

Mr. LEE asked the Minister representing the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. How many targets are provided for the military and rifle clubs in the Sydney metropolitan district?

2. Is the Minister for Defence aware that the number of riflemen in New South Wales is rapidly increasing?

3. Is the Minister aware that great complaints have been made by riflemen attending the Randwick rifle range that the number of targets required for musketry club competitions and practice shooting cannot be supplied?

4. Has additional ground been resumed adjoining the Randwick rifle range in order to provide more targets?

5. If so, will the Minister give instructions to have the work of erecting targets put in hand at once?

6. Has Brigadier-General Gordon recommended that magazine accommodation be provided at Randwick range for the use of rifle clubs for storage of ammunition, &c.?

Mr. EWING.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. Seventy.

2. Yes.

3. Yes, on Saturdays.

4. No.

5. No funds have been provided for erection of additional targets.

6. Yes; but there were no funds to which the expense could be charged. The question of a further vote is now engaging the Minister's consideration.

ROYAL COMMISSIONS AND SELECT COMMITTEES.

Motion (by Mr. WILKS) agreed to—

That there be prepared and laid on the Table of the House a tabulated statement of all Royal Commissions and Select Committees appointed since the establishment of the Commonwealth Parliament, and showing the cost of the same.

BUDGET.

In Committee of Supply: (Consideration resumed from 22nd August, vide page 1240, on motion by Sir JOHN FORREST)—

That the item "President £1,100" be agreed to.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—I exceedingly regret that I am obliged to resume the discussion upon the Budget, in consequence of the indisposition of the right honorable member for Balaclava, who, I am sure, would have made a most valuable contribution to the discussion of the present state of the finances of the Commonwealth. To me the financial question seems to be more important now than it has ever been in the brief history of the Federation. We are face to face with accumulating problems, the intensity of each one of which is increasing from year to year, and the figures which have been placed before us by the Treasurer, reveal, in all its nakedness, the gravity which some of those questions are assuming. The Committee, I think, can compliment the right honorable gentleman upon the precise manner in which he put those figures before us. The late Treasurer—a gentleman who I am seriously inclined to think ought to be the permanent Treasurer of the Commonwealth—set the very admirable fashion of supplying the Committee with the most complete and tabulated information regarding the affairs of the nation, and all that was in any way connected with our financial existence. The present Treasurer has followed in his footsteps to the extent that he gave the Committee a perfect set of figures, and made a very succinct and clear statement, so that there can be no excuse for anybody failing to understand the position as it is to-day. I think that the position revealed by the Treasurer's figures is one which calls for very grave consideration at the hands of this Committee. Though I compliment the right honorable member for Swan upon the very clear and full manner in which he placed the affairs of the nation before us, I regret that I cannot compliment the Government upon the character of the statement which he made. When we come to carefully re-read that statement, to which we all listened with a great deal of interest, we find that it contains nothing in the nature of light or leading—nothing calculated to assist honorable members to deal with national affairs with that wisdom which their gravity demands. Throughout the Budget speech there was no indication whatever of the policy of the Government. There was no light thrown upon the way in which they regard the facts and figures which were placed before the Committee. There was no intimation of any measures which they propose to submit, either with a view to carrying on the financial work which has been commenced, or of reforming it, or of remedying any abuses which may exist. There was no indication that the work of economy—so necessary in connexion with our finances—is to be carried on—no indication that we are striving to meet the difficulties that have arisen with the different States in their relation to the Commonwealth, or of the system underlying the increasing expenditure of the Defence Department, or of the attitude which the Government propose to adopt in regard to such great questions as the consolidation of the States' debts. Certainly, these subjects were referred to more or less briefly, and the facts connected with them were placed before the Committee. But these intimations were of that colourless description which affords no light or leading to honorable members. The facts placed before us were very largely such as any honorable member could have ascertained for himself by reference to statistical records. Indeed, to a large extent, it seemed to me that the Treasurer's Budget consisted of Coghlán and platitudes. There was very little else in it. Although it was a full and complete statement of facts, it contained nothing beyond the facts set forth by Coghlán, and the right honorable gentleman's criticisms of these were the merest platitudes, with one single exception, upon which I must compliment him, because I most sincerely agree with his remarks in that connexion. I refer to what I may be pardoned for calling his "breezy optimism" concerning the affairs of Australia. I sincerely agree with his observations concerning those who decry Australia, and who entertain feelings of despondency regarding the great resources of our Commonwealth. The right honorable member did not at all overstate the case. Indeed, the figures which he laid before us confirm his view. They show that equally with other advanced and progressive portions of the world — our sister communities under British rule—we have nothing whatever to fear in the future. Whilst I agree with the right honorable gentleman that our prospects cannot excite alarm—indeed, that they must provoke nothing but renewed belief in the ultimate destiny of this great community—I regret that we have exhibited nothing like statesmanship in developing our marvellous resources, and in regulating those affairs which are now being carried on by private enterprise, as well as ever they can be. It merely requires wise financial arrangements between the States and the Commonwealth to so lubricate the machinery of Government as to increase our ratio of prosperity, and to justify the highest hopes of those who were instrumental in bringing about the Federation. I do not see that the Treasurer has put before us anything that will assist in relieving the existing friction, or in removing the precarious nature of the reliance of the States upon the Federal contribution to their revenue. In the first financial debate in this House, I referred very strongly to what I conceived to be the most difficult point in our Federation, and that was the dependency of the States Governments upon the Federal Treasurer for knowing how they would stand. This difficulty, great as it was in the first year, seems to me to have been growing more acute with regard to some of the States. I think that from a gentleman occupying his position we might expect something of a suggestion of how to meet the difficulty, which certainly is in great States, like Queensland, and in smaller States, like Tasmania, creating a feeling that the Federation has not been the success it was expected to be. But we have had no assistance in that respect, and no indication that we are going to make savings wherever we possibly can. We all looked upon the late Treasurer as one whom we could safely expect to cut down expenditure in every direction, and so remove the slightest cause of any charge on the part of the States that we were unduly swelling expenditure instead of cutting it down to that which was absolutely necessary for carrying on the Federal Government. Although the expenditure goes on increasing at a ratio which, I am sorry to say, is far greater than I anticipated, still we have no indication from the present Treasurer that it is going to be kept down. I wish here to refer to a question I put to, I think, at least three Treasurers, and that is as to whether we could not have a Committee of Public Accounts, which would investigate all proposals for expenditure, and after inquiry from officers known to possess the necessary information, make such a report as would guide honorable members. I believe that such a committee would not only effect an economy in the cost of administration, but would save a very large amount of profitless discussion here on a variety of details in the Estimates, as to which honorable members cannot possibly know anything, and as to which we seek, by a round-about, indiscriminate discussion, to get some information. If the House felt that it could depend upon such a body to investigate the Estimates in detail they would be passed much more rapidly than is now done. If certain items were open to grave exception, the Committee would inquire into them, and in their report would advise the House accordingly, and so facilitate the passage of the Estimates without that useless and prolix discussion which sometimes has taken place over very small items. I trust that the Treasurer, should he remain in office, will seriously consider whether such a committee would not help the Government of the day to get their Estimates put through, and assist the nation by giving a sort of guarantee that the Estimates had been closely scrutinized by gentlemen in a position to discover what was right and what was wrong about them. For, apart from asking questions, a private member of Parliament has no possible chance of discovering the right or the wrong of the various minute propositions which are submitted. A Committee of Public Accounts, however, if it sat during the recess, could assist honorable members to come to a wise conclusion about propositions without the waste of time which must necessarily take place when we proceed in the haphazard fashion we are now obliged to adopt, when a set of Estimates is submitted, and we are asked to pass them, or, what is sometimes worse, we refuse to pass them.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There is a committee of that kind in the House of Commons.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The House of Commons has had a Committee of Public Accounts for very many years, and from a recent article I was delighted to learn what a very useful institution it has been. It examines, if it thinks fit, the various Under-Secretaries, high military officers, the officers of the Exchequer, and the commissariat officers, and ascertains the reasons which have induced any proposals for additional expenditure, and whether it would not be possible to recommend to the House, and through it to the Ministry, the cutting down of certain items, and so insuring economical working of the machinery of government. I hope that the Treasurer will kindly make a note of my suggestion, and ask the Cabinet to consider whether a Committee of Public Accounts would not greatly assist the House and the Government of the day in regard to the Estimates. "Economy," said the great Gladstone—and I think he took the idea from a very much earlier man—"is a great source of revenue." In this Federation we cannot commence too early to insist upon the practice of economy. The Treasurer is generally looked upon as one who views everything in "a let it be done well" sort of style; and I quite agree with him. If we have a great work to be done, and we have ascertained what it will cost, and how it can be done, let it be done well, because that is sometimes a means of economy. On the other hand, in the working of the public departments, although an outsider cannot always put his fingers upon the weak spots, there must be great opportunities for economy which should be availed of. Gladstone descended so low as to insist upon the abolition of fly-leaves from the stationery and reports. I forget what estimate was made, but I know that, by taking that course, he saved a considerable sum to the Government of Great Britain. We might follow such a great example, and see whether we cannot, by making such economies, keep down the cost of government. Take the Budget papers, which are placed before us every year by the Treasurer. One can see at once that they serve but a very ephemeral purpose. They are placed before honorable members very largely for the purpose of this discussion alone. We cannot get along without them, but then we find that some are also published in Hansard in a more condensed form. As a small matter of economy, I should recommend the Treasurer to get the returns set up in a form in which they could also be used in Hansard, and could be much more conveniently consulted from time to time, because the papers in foolscap form are simply duplicate information published in Hansard, and pass out of existence in the course of a few weeks. •

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable member suggest that the returns should be set in that very small type?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Yes. We have to consider whether these things are not worth doing. I think that such little savings would amount in the aggregate to something worth the while of any Treasurer to make, and would considerably reduce the cost of the government of the country. During the recess there was a Conference at Hobart of the Commonwealth Ministry and the Premiers of the various States, in order to see whether some of the great questions which were coming on for consideration could not be approached, and some of the difficulties removed, by a clear understanding between the Commonwealth and the States. I was not altogether in favour of the Conference, although I could not but applaud the right idea underlying it, that some effort should be made to get the States to co-operate with the Commonwealth in such legislation as must necessarily be proposed at no distant date, so as to reduce the friction which sometimes arises when such legislation is proposed, and the States are not consulted. But I do think that the late Government, and the late Prime Minister, who was responsible, carried this idea a great deal too far; and that if the Conference had been completely successful, as it might have been, if all the subjects put down on the syllabus had been dealt with, and determinations had been arrived at, and if such a Conference had been renewed from time to time, we should have seen inaugurated a very unconstitutional practice. Undoubtedly some of the questions referred to the Conference were such that this Parliament, and this Parliament alone, could legislate upon. It is quite in opposition to any of my ideas of the principles of our Constitution, or of any similar constitution upon the British pattern, to establish a consultative body to deal with the large measures with which this Parliament alone has the right to deal. Take such questions as those affecting weights and measures and the coinage, and similar propositions. Under the auspices of the late Ministry such questions were submitted to the Hobart Conference, which was composed of gentlemen who did not find a place in this Parliament, and whatever decisions they might arrive at could not constitutionally bind this Parliament in any way. But it would have been sought to bind this Parliament by reason of the fact that, whatever Ministry was in power, they would have been able to say, "Such and such was the decision arrived at by this great Conference, which represented the people of Australia."

Mr. McLEAN.—The subjects referred to by the honorable member, such as weights and measures, were questions as to which merely an intimation was given to the Premiers of the States at the Conference that the Commonwealth intended to take them over.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I am aware of the fact that, as the honorable member states, those questions were not reached at the Hobart Conference. But they were down for consideration, and they might have been reached if the Conference had had time to consider them.

Mr. McLEAN.—The Conference went through every item on the list.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—While I am in favour of removing any possible ground of friction between the States and the Commonwealth, yet I do hope that we shall never constitute an unconstitutional body or tribunal of that kind to take upon itself the responsibility of formulating what measures shall be submitted to the Federal Parliament. That is our own business. It is for the Government of the day, whoever may compose it, to decide upon what measures shall be proposed to us, and for any irregularly constituted and recurrent meeting of States Premiers or States Ministries to consult with the members of the Federal Ministry as to what should be done would be a thoroughly unconstitutional thing, and one likely to give rise to much more friction than arises at the present time. Because it is easy to conceive that, the decisions arrived at by such a Conference not being carried out, would immediately give far greater umbrage to the representatives of the various States than would be the case if the measures proposed to be submitted to the Federal Parliament had never been laid before them at all, and no decisions had ever been arrived at in relation to them. I hope that while any future Government may—as I think it is their duty to do—endeavour to remove any friction between the various States Governments and the Federal Government, the summoning of a Conference to deal with any such measures as this Parliament can exclusively deal with, will never be attempted again. At the Hobart Conference various important questions were dealt with in such a way as to advance them nearer to that point at which some solution of the difficulties they involve might have been proposed to this House. Take such a question as that concerning the States debts, and that of valuing and paying for the States buildings in the transferred departments. The Conference dealt with those matters rather fully; and, although we have since had a change of Government, I did hope that whatever Minister having charge of finance met this Parliament, he would have been ready with some definite proposition. But we have had the Treasurer meeting us with a clear statement of the question and the difficulties surrounding it, giving us the bare facts, relating how the question was approached in the Conference, and stating the suggestions that were made for dealing with it; but he gave us not the slightest gleam of light, nor did he outline any proposal by which the Government itself proposes to ask this House to solve the difficulty. Now, I will admit that this question presents probably more difficulties than any one who has not considered it can imagine. When we did not know the exact figures, we were all very apt to say that the debts of the various States should be consolidated at the earliest possible moment, and we were ready to say that a considerable saving—amounting to, I believe it was variously estimated, from £300,000 or £400,000 up to £700,000 or £800,000—might be made by such a financial operation. I still believe that a very large saving—possibly in the ultimate as large a saving as the highest of the figures I have mentioned—could be achieved if we could devise some just and equitable means whereby the debts of the States could be taken over by the Commonwealth. But when one looks at the figures surrounding the question the problem assumes the nature almost of a Gordian knot which cannot be unravelled, but which possibly might be cut. And that seems to me to be the only solution at which we shall ever arrive. When we get a Treasurer or a Ministry bold enough to cut this Gordian knot which seemingly cannot be unravelled the question may be settled. It takes a considerable time for one to obtain a grasp of the problem from the figures which have been placed before us by various financial experts. I have worked it out for myself, and it seems to me that my method shows the position more clearly and more quickly than any other presentation of the case that I have seen. Taking first the State of New South Wales, the whole debt, not that which can be taken over by the Federation under the terms of section 105 of the Constitution—but the whole debt as it exists to-day—amounts to £55 per head of the population of that State. The amount of surplus revenue that the Federal Treasurer will return to New South Wales this year would at 4 per cent. interest meet a debt of £51 per head of the population. In the case of New South Wales, there would, therefore, be little difficulty in taking over the debt, considering that what we now return would pay the interest on that debt. When we come to Victoria, the position is not quite so evenly balanced, because the debt of that State amounts to £47 per head—I am not bothering with fractions—and it is estimated that what will be returned on the present year's operations, would, at 4 per cent., pay interest on a debt equal to £40 per head. There, again, there is no great variance between the two figures. The amount which has to be returned to Victoria would very nearly pay the interest on the debt, reckoned at 4 per cent.; indeed, it probably would pay the interest on the debt as it exists at the present time. But in the case of Queensland we are confronted with the gravest difficulty. No simple process by which we could take over the debts of the two larger States—that is, larger from the point of view of population—would apply to Queensland, where the debt to-day is equal to £81 per head, and the amount which has to be returned from the Commonwealth Treasury would, reckoned at 4 per cent., pay the interest on a debt of only £35 per head. There is a similar difficulty met in South Australia, where the debt is equal to £77 per head, and the amount to be returned from the Commonwealth Treasury would, at 4 per cent., pay the interest on a debt of only £32 per head. In the case of Western Australia, which the Treasurer represents, the position is altogether reversed. There the debt is £67 per head, and the disproportionate amount of surplus revenue received from the Federal Treasurer would, at 4 per cent., pay interest on a debt of £90 per head. In Tasmania, the debt amounts to £52 per head, and the surplus revenue returned from the Commonwealth would pay 4 per cent. on a debt of only £34 per head. It will be seen, therefore, that the circumstances of Queensland and South Australia practically prohibit any proposition that would be acceptable to the people of New South Wales and Victoria for dealing with the debts on a common basis. A proposal has been made to take over the whole of the debts, and mortgage some of the States properties as a security. But that system, even if it were agreed to—and from my knowledge of human nature it is not likely to be agreed to by some of the States—is one which, in my opinion, would not work out. If we only took over a certain proportion of the debts, we should not get the benefit to be derived from taking over the whole, and there would be the further complication caused by having to collect the revenue.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The proposition at the Hobart Conference was to take over the whole of the debts.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—That is so, but if we take over the whole of the debts, the question arises as to how we are going to pay. Instead of giving all the surplus revenue, we should, in the case of some of the States, like Queensland and South Australia, require to receive something back. The late Treasurer, with his usual caution—and I like caution on the part of the gentleman who has to look after the finances of the country—stipulated, all through, for absolute, tangible, legal security for the payment of any deficiency. I do not think that the late Treasurer was justified in taking up any such position. The private individuals who at present are the creditors of Queensland and South Australia, do not ask for any such security; they do not seek to step in and collect the railway revenue, or revenue derived from any other source, but simply take the facts as they stand, and depend on an honest British community to meet the interest whenever it falls due. If any way could be found of dealing with the States debts, the Commonwealth Government could very well take up the same position as the private investors and holders of bonds, and simply say, "Without interfering with you in any way, we shall debit you with whatever shortage results from taking over the debts, and we shall use whatever balance is derived from the consolidation, as a sinking fund, to gradually extinguish the debt; and when things improve with us"—and I believe, with many others, that things will improve—"we shall add to the sinking fund, and so gradually reduce the enormous debts which have grown up in Australia." I do not fear those debts, though in some of the States they have grown more rapidly than there was any reason for—we were trying to force the pace. But I believe that the ultimate progress of these States will enable us to bear all those debts, and to gradually reduce if not to extinguish them if we go the proper way to work. But if we go on increasing the debts at the rate we have seen in the past, I think, with other alarmists, that the time will come when our indebtedness will prove a serious trouble. Seeing that we cannot make any proposition that would be acceptable to all the various States, it behoves us to find some way to cut the Gordian knot; and I wish we could find a financial genius to do it. To my mind there is one way, though I do not know whether we shall find a man brave enough to adopt it. My way would be to authorize the Treasurer to buy up the debts whenever he has opportunity at such market rates as he may deem advisable, acting under the advice of the various officers he may consult—whether the stock be that of New South Wales, Queensland, or any other State. He should buy up at a low price whenever opportunity offers, and constantly issue Commonwealth loans to replace the stock. By such means we should, at any rate, be always steadily moving in the direction of consolidating the debts, and reducing the cost of interest, and, further, always moving in the direction of establishing a sinking fund and gradually extinguishing our indebtedness.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Might the States not demur to that?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—There is nothing that I know of to which the States could demur in a scheme of that kind.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would increase the price of the stock, would it not?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Any reduction which we could bring about in the cost of those loans to the States Governments—any plan which would, in however small a degree, reduce the debts by the creation of a sinking fund—should be acceptable, if not to the States Governments, certainly to the people of the States, and it is the people more than Ministries or Governments in whom I place my faith. I have next to deal with what has been in this House the greatest bone of contention amongst us, namely, the Defence Department. I have been charged with many others, en masse if not individually, with having starved and destroyed the defences of this country. My position was that while I was prepared to vote whatever was necessary within our means for the purpose of defending Australia properly and adequately, I was never enlightened as to the measures that were to be taken for such defence—never enlightened as to how the purpose of defending us was to be accomplished. The defence estimates have always been placed before us in such a way that we have had to vote in the dark a lump sum of money, which, in the first instance, amounted to close upon £1,000,000. That amount, however, has been reduced by the Committee from time to time, and, I think, with very excellent results. We, at any rate, have saved expenditure in the past, and I also think we have saved something by reorganizing on a sounder footing with regard to the future. The items under this head for this year show a growing increase as compared with the items of preceding years. I forget how the Treasurer put them, but putting all the items together, including non-recurring expenses which each Treasurer tries to get out of, but which do recur every year all the same, and therefore cannot properly be called non-recurring expense, I find that for the current year it is proposed to spend £1,022,000 on the defence of Australia. That sum includes expenditure on buildings, ammunition, the ordinary current expenses, and the £200,000 required under the Naval Agreement Act. The latter, I think, covers the best part of our expenditure on defence, and gives us more for our money than any other part of it. I am not disposed to object to the expenditure of £1,000,000 on the defence of Australia if it is necessary, and I suppose it is, but I do think that we ought to have placed before us—and before the session closes I hope we shall have placed before us, by the honorable gentleman representing the Minister of Defence in this House—some definite scheme of defence. We should have some outline of what it is proposed to do, and some scheme which will show at what we are aiming, and the point at which in a few years time we propose to arrive. We require some such definite outline to give us confidence that we have some one in the Ministry who understands what he is doing, and that we shall not depart from a proper scheme to suit the particular military influence exerted at any particular time. I hope that we shall have some scheme put before us to justify the growing expenditure on defence. I have said that the Treasurer failed to give us any intimation of the Government policy. I was in error in making that statement, because the right honorable gentleman, in a bare sort of hint, informed the House that the Government intended to ask Parliament to extend the bounties given for the production of sugar by white labour, for another five years. I think that the right honorable gentleman stated also that as the necessary corollary of that, it is proposed to extend the excise for the same period. This is a very serious question indeed, as it constitutes one of the biggest disturbing elements in our present financial arrangements. I hope that, if we are obliged to deal with it in such a way as the Treasurer has suggested, we shall take steps to insure that we shall not have to repeat this process, as has been done in Queensland in regard to other legislation affecting this great question, from period to period. I hope we shall not be asked to extend the time for the payment of the sugar bounties, every now and again for another five years. I am one of those who from the first saw clearly that if one was in favour of that great policy of a White Australia—and however much it may be sneered at, I am still as great an advocate of it as I was at first—we could not carry out that policy in the face of the peculiar circumstances of Queensland, unless we were prepared to pay something for the advantage. I was prepared for one, although it probably affected me personally much more than any other honorable member of this House, to agree to the granting of these bounties. But at the time I felt that this Committee would be asked to extend the period during which they should be paid. I feel now that, even after the proposed extension is agreed to, the Committee will again be asked to extend the period. From the figures placed before us, it is easy to see the disturbing factor which the sugar question is to us in our finances, how greatly it affects the finances of some of the States, and how it affects also the consumers of sugar in the community by reason of the much enhanced price which they are called upon to pay for sugar. If we look abroad, we shall see that this sugar question has been a very troublesome question for the last four or five years in Great Britain itself, in consequence of the operation of the Convention arrived at between Great Britain and France, Germany, Austria, Belgium, and Holland. It was arranged that the bounty which had been paid by the Continental countries should be given up, and Great Britain paid a quid pro quo by imposing a countervailing duty on sugar imported from Russia or any other country which continued the payment of bounties for its production. The effect of this arrangement in England has been most marked. It has cost England, for one or two years, at any rate, the sum of from £8,000,000 to £10,000,000. Prior to the Convention, in consequence of the operation of the bounties which were fixed at varying rates, the maximum paid being about £5 a ton, the consumers and manufacturers using sugar in Great Britain were enabled to get the article as low, I believe, at one time, as £6 per ton. Of course, that was less than the price for which sugar could be produced; but Great Britain got the benefit of that. People were crying out in England and on the Continent against these bounties, and Great Britain entered into the arrangement by which the bounties were abolished. One effect of the abolition of the bounties was that the Continental countries were enabled, by reason of the money thus saved, to relieve internal taxation on sugar to such a degree that the Continental consumption of the article increased to the marvellous extent of nearly 50 per cent. I know of no fact in political economy so marked as this increased consumption of sugar on the Continent, due to the reduction of internal taxation on sugar, as a consequence of the removal of the bounties. I do not recollect any instance in my reading where such a marvellous increase in the consumption of a commodity has taken place. I cannot think that this increase is altogether due to consumption by members of the community. I am inclined to believe that a very large quantity of it must have been due to an increase of manufactures requiring sugar. The effect in England was just as marked in the opposite direction. It is true that in consequence of the removal of the bounty and the interpretation which certain people put on its probable results, there was a slight diminution in the area sown with sugar-beet in Continental countries, and a bad season following the abolition of the bounty resulted in a greatly reduced quantity of sugar being produced on the Continent. As Russia and other sources of supply were shut off from England, the price of sugar rose last year from something like £8 to over £16 per ton. The consumption had gone up 50 per cent. in France, and in England there was a 50 per cent. increase in price. As showing how sensitive taxpayers are to an increase in the price of a commodity, England consumed, in 1901, 87.94 lbs. of sugar per head of population, but in 1902, when the Convention had come into operation, the consumption in that country was reduced to 82.04 lbs., and in 1903 it was still further reduced to 79.69 lbs. per head. The figures for 1904 are not available, but owing to the immense rise in the price of sugar which took place last year, it is certain that the consumption per head of population must have fallen off still further, and in a greatly accelerated degree. The consumption prior to all this had been steadily increasing for forty years, and I say that as soon as we have all the facts before us, we shall find that the consumption in Australia has fallen off to some extent, if not as greatly as it has fallen off elsewhere. In 1901-2 the consumption was from 105 to 106 lbs. per head of the population, and in 1902-3 it was 102 lbs., showing a decrease, at any rate, of 3 lbs. or 4 lbs. per head of population. This sugar question is one of very great interest to the community. We put on a duty, and we give a bounty for the production of sugar by white labour, and the result is that our consumers of sugar, in consequence of our fiscal legislation, will pay £6 per ton more for it than they would otherwise do, and that, on our consumption, amounts to £1,122,000. That is the amount which the people pay for sugar in excess of what they would pay if sugar were free in Australia. How much does the Government get from that? If, as the result of our fiscal legislation, imposing a tax on a commodity so widely consumed as is sugar, £1,122,000 a year went in to the Treasury, we could easily understand it. The figures which the Treasurer has put before us deal with the production of sugar for the current year. The Treasurer expects to receive £110,000 from Customs duties, and £514,500 from Excise duties, or £624,500 in all; but from that must be deducted—though we are never told of this deduction in the Budget speech; we have to turn over several pages of figures to get information about it—£146,000, which leaves the net revenue £478,500, for which the people of the six States will have to pay £1,122,000. That fact should be sufficient to make us pause to consider whether a time should not be fixed for the termination of the sugar bounty, for which we have been obliged to provide in support of the White Australia policy. I believe that it would be almost impossible to carry out that policy if we suddenly put an end to the bounty system, but, on the other hand, we should examine the broad facts of the case to see if we are not paying too much for our whistle, and to ascertain if there may not be some other way by which assistance could be given to the sugar planters without imposing so heavy a tax on the citizens of the Commonwealth. It is my intention to quote in this connexion some figures from an undated report prepared by

Dr. Maxwell, director of the sugar experiment stations of Queensland, laid on the table, and ordered by the House to be printed, on the 13th August, 1901. He says that the production of sugar in Queensland in 1885 was 55,796 tons, and that there were 10,755 Pacific Islanders in the Colony in that year. In another part of his paper he estimates that white labour costs £1 10s. 11d., and coloured labour costs 14s. 1½d. a week, a difference of 16s. 9½d.; so that if in that year white labour had been substituted for coloured labour the sugar produced would have cost £6 per ton more, a prohibitory cost. The kanakas could not all have been employed in the manufacture of sugar. Some of them must have been employed on other work. Then in 1890 Queensland produced 68,924 tons of sugar, when there were in the country 9,689 kanakas, so that if white labour alone had been employed, the cost of production would have been £5 per ton more, also a prohibitive cost. Just prior to Federation, in 1899, Queensland was producing about 123,289 tons of sugar per annum, and there were then only 8,826 kanakas in the country, so that if white labour had been substituted for black the cost of production would have been only £2 10s. a ton more. The present production of Queensland is still greater, while the number of kanakas in the country has still further diminished, so that the cost of producing sugar there with white labour must now be less than £2 per ton, which is the amount of the bounty. These facts, to my mind, prove that the bounty will not be needed for any lengthy period, because now that the number of kanakas in Queensland has fallen below 8,000, it would be impossible for them to produce half the sugar produced in the State, and the cost of substituting white labour for coloured labour would be less than £2 per ton, taking the whole State. I will mention some other facts which, I think, show that there are still greater reasons why the bounty should not continue for a longer period; but before doing so I wish to read the last paragraph of Dr. Maxwell's report. He says—

It is indicated that invention may be expected to provide mechanical devices for the harvesting of the cane crop and for other work.

When I first addressed myself to this question, I was very hopeful that something would be done in that direction, and I still believe that human ingenuity is such that it must, before very long, find out means by which a great deal of the work which is now done by hand, may be done by machines.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—A machine has been invented, but the fact will not be made known until the bounty is secure.

Mr. STORRER.—It has not yet been perfected.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Yes, it has. There is such a machine in Melbourne.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Apparently in this instance, as in connexion with the Manufactures Encouragement Bill, those who are to be benefited by the bounty, have something up their sleeves. Dr. Maxwell continues—

These will further strengthen the current tendency to substitute lower by higher forms of labour, where the conditions of nature permit.

He thought that the tendency had already set in.

This tendency, already very marked, will be accelerated by the settlement of a greater number of white families upon the grain-growing areas, resulting also in a more intense and productive cultivation of the partially exhausted soils. The increment of white settlers upon the sugar-growing lands during the past decade, and the concurrent increase in the volume of sugar produced, with the reduction in the number of islanders employed, demonstrate the present tendency, and indicate that, under the current operation of given natural laws, and particularly in certain latitudes, the Pacific Islander is a relatively declining factor in sugar production in Australia.

Dr. Maxwell, in dealing with this question as far back as 1901, showed that the necessity for employing black labour was diminishing, and that, as a matter of fact, the number of black labourers was falling off, and yet, in the face of these facts, we are asked to renew the arrangement for the payment of the bonus. It behoves us to consider very carefully how far the assistance given to a certain industry will operate adversely to other industries, and, at the same time, overweight the taxpayers for a further period of five years. I alluded just now to the other factors that have played into the hands of the sugar interests during the transition period between the employment of white and black labour in the cane-fields. One of the chief factors has been the abolition of sugar bounties on the Continent, and the large rise in price of sugar in England. I have taken the trouble to ascertain the prices of sugar in bond at Sydney during a series of years, and compare them with the prices of sugar in London at corresponding periods. In January, 1900, the Sydney price of sugar of a quality corresponding with the Colonial Sugar Company's I.A. brand was £15 15s. per ton. At the same time the London price for granulated sugar was £11 per ton, and for raw sugar £9 3s. per ton. In 1901 the Sydney price was £16 10s., and the London price for granulated sugar, £11 5s., and for raw sugar, £9 5s. In 1902, the Sydney price was £15, and the London price for granulated sugar, £8 15s., and for raw sugar, £6 10s. In 1903, the Sydney price was £14 10s., and the London price for granulated sugar, £9 5s., and for raw sugar, £8. In 1904, the Sydney price was £14 5s., and the London price, for granulated sugar, £10 5s., and for raw sugar, £8 5s. In 1905, the Sydney price was £17, and the London price for granulated sugar, £16 5s., and for raw sugar, £14 9s. There was a great rise in prices at the end of last year in London, owing to the abolition of the European bounties. Honorable members will see that, contrasting the price last January with the price prior to the establishment of Federation, there was a rise of £4 5s. per ton. The sugar interests received the benefit of that increased price. It went somewhere. The price in January, 1900, in Sydney was £15 15s. per ton, and in January, 1905, £17 per ton—that was for sugar equal to the I.A. brand of the Colonial Sugar Company.

Mr. R. EDWARDS. — That was due to Federation.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—No; it was not due to Federation; but was caused by the operation of the stupid arrangement entered into by the British Government, and we are following a similar course. I contend that, as in the case of wheat, the value of sugar will be regulated by the world's price, and while we give protection to the extent of £6 per ton, those who are interested in the sugar business can always be relied upon to obtain for their article a price equal to that at which sugar can be landed here from other parts of the world, plus the amount of the duty. That will always be done, whether the benefit goes to this or that company, or to the planter or the refiner. In addition to considering the taxpayer we have to pay regard to the interests of those who are engaged in a variety of manufactures, in which sugar is one of the raw materials. We are paying a bonus and affording very heavy protection to those engaged in one industry, and at the same time inflicting a burden on several other industries. We are encouraging one industry and discouraging half-a-dozen others, because sugar is as much a raw material as is iron, for the production of which the Government propose to offer a bonus. What would be thought of the Government if they proposed to give a bonus for the production of iron, and accompanied it with a very heavy duty, such as sugar now pays, and at the same time also asked that an excise duty should be imposed upon iron produced here, in order to provide funds for the payment of the bounty? That is what we are doing in the case of sugar. I suppose that we ought to have done something to bring about a White Australia, but we have certainly involved ourselves in the most mixed up arrangement of evil fiscal finance that could possibly be conceived. I believe in a White Australia as much as any one does; but I think we can pay too much even for such an advantage, and it behoves us to consider what methods can be adopted to mitigate to some extent the heavy taxation that is now imposed upon the public, and the great difficulties placed in the way of manufacturers in other directions, whose combined capital would represent very much larger figures than the total amount invested in the magnificent sugar industry.

Mr. TUDOR.—What would the honorable member suggest?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I am coming to the only suggestion that I can think of, but we ought to hear still further suggestions from the Government. So far, they have merely intimated that they intend to propose an extension of the bonus period for five years, and to further inflict upon us the excise for a similar period, simultaneously. At an early stage of this question, I said that as surely as God was in Heaven, the Queenslanders would, at the end of the proposed bonus period, come to us and ask for a still further extension.

Mr. PAGE.—Hear, hear; that is the trouble.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Although it would be pretty hard on me, I would be willing to agree to an extension of the bonus period for a further five years, on the understanding that the bonus would be gradually diminished year by year, and absolutely terminated at the end of the fifth year. If, however, we are to continue the £2 bonus and the £3 excise for another five years, the position will be unsatisfactory. I believe that the industry will become exceedingly prosperous. I regard it as one of the most magnificent, and one of the safest industries in Australia. If we continue the bonus for a further five years, we shall surely be asked to extend it further, and possibly may have to agree to do so.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Give them an extension for another ten years.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—No, that would be far too long a period. We should deal with the bonus as we have done with the Western Australian Special Tariff—an arrangement very similar in character to that for the granting of the sugar bonus. We had to agree to permit the Western Australian Government to continue to tax goods imported from the other States for a period of five years, in order to assist that State to join the Federation, and to minimize, as far as possible, the loss of revenue it would sustain.

Mr. JOHNSON.—In that case the limit was fixed by the Constitution.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Yes, and we are as competent to fix a limit to the sugar bonus as were the framers of the Constitution to restrict the operation of the Western Australian Special Tariff. When the question of extending the sugar bonus comes before us in detail, I shall ask that matters may be so arranged that the bonus will gradually diminish and absolutely terminate at the end of the five-year period.

Mr. TUDOR.—Would the honorable member be agreeable to increase the amount of protection as the bonus diminished?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—No, that would be absurd; but I should be willing to reduce the excise duty simultaneously with the reduction of the bonus. I think they should both be reduced pari passu, and gradually disappear.

Mr. TUDOR.—Then the planter who employed alien labour would be in the best position.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—No, he would not, because we have already provided that the kanakas shall be deported.

Mr. PAGE.—But there is other alien labour employed in the industry.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I say that when we have a man in our midst—be his skin black, white, or yellow —we have no right by legislation to prevent him from earning a livelihood. With many others, I regret that these persons have been allowed to enter Australia. But now that they are here, it is inhuman to prevent them from earning their livelihood in their own way. Let the planters compete for the labour of such coloured men—other than kanakas—as remain amongst us. As soon as their numbers become a little smaller, that competition will bring the wages of the coloured men up to such a point that there will not exist the conflict between coloured and white labour which at present obtains.

Mr. PAGE.—That is a rosy picture to paint.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—At any rate, I can appeal to the honorable member's heart in connexion with this matter. I maintain that we have no right to prevent these persons from earning a livelihood. I admit that it was a mistake to allow them to come here. If we had had Federation fifty years ago—as we ought to have had—they would not have been permitted to enter Australia. On the other hand, the kanakas came under an arrangement by which, at the expiration of a certain term, they were to be deported to their homes. We can carry out that arrangement, but we have no right to place any embargo upon the employment of the members of other coloured races who are already in Australia. In view of the paucity of their numbers, and the competition which will ensue between the planters for their services, the wages of the blacks will increase to a point at which they will not interfere with the standard of comfort enjoyed by our white population.

Mr. PAGE.—Would the honorable member agree to pay them the same wages as are paid to white men for doing the same work?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I would not object to doing so. The labourer is worthy of his hire. If the black man can earn as much as the white man he ought to receive the same wages. I wish now to refer briefly to New Guinea. I sincerely sympathize with the Treasurer in his references to this white elephant. I say that it is a disgrace to any Ministry to permit the present state of affairs in regard to that Possession to continue. To vote a paltry pittance of £20,000 annually to maintain a small staff of white officials there—men who are producing no result whatever, is a miserable subterfuge for statesmanship. We should either produce something from New Guinea, and make the Territory play an important part in the British Empire, or we should relinquish our hold upon it. If we cannot do better than we have been doing, I am in favour of petitioning the Imperial Government to take it off our hands. I am informed by those who have recently visited the Possession, that its capabilities are immense. Now that such a great stir has been made in Imperial circles in the direction of extending the cotton-growing area, perhaps something might be done jointly with the Imperial authorities to facilitate the cultivation of cotton and other tropical products in this new settlement. Certainly we ought not to continue paying £20,000 yearly to obtain the meagre official reports which have hitherto been furnished. Contrasted with what the French and Germans are accomplishing in their colonies, with what the Dutch, or what the British are doing in Sarawak, and with the operations of the North Borneo Company, which is developing similar territory at a very rapid rate, and making it a national asset for the race, our efforts have been poor indeed. New Guinea ought to become a national asset for the race. If we cannot accomplish more than we have hitherto achieved with it, it will be better for us to petition the Home Government to take it off our hands. Thus far I have omitted to deal with the question of preferential trade. Now that the honorable and learned member for Ballarat is Prime Minister, one would have thought that we should have had some intimation as to whether the Government intended to do anything in the direction of facilitating preferential trade with the Empire. But no announcement in that direction has been forthcoming. I do not mean to say that I am ready to jump at Chamberlainism, but I am prepared to consider proposals of an Imperial nature in regard to a reciprocal arrangement in connexion with our taxation. I am willing to consider any proposal by which we can extend a preference to the old country, and not only to the old country, but to our kin in other lands. I should not object if a proposal were submitted to go further, by taking in the great American Union. Indeed, I should like to include the whole of our race in any reciprocal agreement of the kind. But because we cannot take the initiative in this movement, I cannot see why we should refuse to take advantage of what has been offered to us by sister dependencies in various parts of the world. Some years ago, when New South Wales was a free-trade State, I know that it enjoyed reciprocal trading facilities with Canada, because owing to the fact that the New South Wales Tariff did not tax Canadian products above a certain amount, the Dominion Government allowed the products of New South Wales to enter Canada at a lower rate than was levied upon those from other parts of the world. That privilege enabled New South Wales to do a very comfortable trade in some small lines. The same principle still operates in Canada. That country offers to admit Commonwealth products at a lower rate than is charged upon foreign products, if we only choose to take advantage of it. Recently we have heard a good deal in reference to the New Hebrides. Only the other day we agreed almost unanimously that it was necessary to do something to draw closer the connexion between the New Hebrides and the Commonwealth. The honorable member for Lang suggested that to accomplish our purpose we could not do better than enter into a fiscal arrangement under which the produce of those islands would be allowed to enter the Commonwealth as freely as they are permitted to enter French possessions further afield. If the Prime Minister sympathises with the motion submitted, our relationship with the New Hebrides could be drawn closer in that way. Communities respond to nothing more quickly than to facilities for trading between them. The Government might have made some proposal of that character. But the greatest charge which I have to make against preferential traders — irrespective of whether they are members of the present Government or of any other Ministry — has reference to the offer which has been made to us, in common with the rest of the Empire, by the colonies of South Africa. A report was recently prepared by an emissary appointed by the late Government in the person of Mr. H. J. Scott, having reference to the trade of South Africa. That report furnishes very valuable and interesting reading. I drew attention to this subject upon 9th October, 1903, when I asked the present Prime Minister—

Whether the Government would, during the recess, obtain full particulars and returns of interchange between the Commonwealth and the South African colonies, and consider the desirableness of entering into reciprocal Customs arrangements with those colonies without awaiting the development of any larger proposal for preferential trade within the Empire.

The honorable and learned gentleman, with that soft answer which turneth away wrath, said, in reply—

Yes, with pleasure; it is a very necessary step.

The Government, of which the present Prime Minister was the head, then went into recess, and was subsequently turned out of office. Now, however, he has returned to office, and I say that if he still entertains that opinion—if he is still a preferential trader—and if we are compelled to wait for the initiative to be taken by Great Britain, we have not to wait for South Africa. That country is willing to give us a preference, and I would like to quote the following paragraph from Mr. Scott's valuable report—

Under the Customs Union, which came into force on the 15th August, 1903, intercolonial free-trade between the British Possessions in South Africa became law, and by removing every Customs barrier facilitated the free interchange of commodities of the parties to the Union, and was the first important step to a future federation of South Africa.

This Convention also introduced the principle of preferential trade with Great Britain, by which it is hoped the first link in the chain of closer union has been forged. To this end a rebate of 25 per cent. of any duty levied ad valorem on goods and articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United Kingdom imported into the Union was granted. Certain goods were also placed in a special class, on which a duty of 2½ per cent. extra is levied if of foreign manufacture, and which are admitted duty free if of British origin.

Provision was also made to extend the preferential rate to any British Colony granting reciprocal privileges to the members of the South African Customs Union, and I would respectfully suggest for your consideration that it would be of advantage to Australia to join in this system of reciprocity. We have everything to gain by doing so, and it will enable our producers to compete with greater advantage over the Argentine, a country at present pouring into Africa supplies of frozen meat, butter, and grain.

In another paragraph he says—

Canada has already entered the Preferential Union, and a line of steamers direct to South African ports is conveying her produce there. One item is worth mentioning; it is that of frozen pork, which is admitted free. Canada sends £60,000 worth yearly, and a company has been formed in Capetown to smoke and cure the carcase, and then sell it as bacon and ham, which, under the Tariff, is liable to a duty of one penny per pound.

Mr. SKENE.—What report is the honorable member quoting from?

Mr. G. B. Edwards.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—From a report by Mr. H. J. Scott, of South Australia, who apparently was appointed by the late Government to report on our trading relations with the South African Colonies. Not only does he express the strong views I have just quoted, but he gives figures which bear out my contention that we have everything to gain from reciprocity. Here is an arrangement offered to us, under which we, the exporters of enormous quantities of produce to South Africa, have everything to gain, and we, the importers of very few commodities therefrom, have nothing to lose. Yet we have in office a Government who, with these papers in their pigeon-holes, either do not bother to look at them, or, if they do, take no advantage of the opportunity thus offered to vastly increase the trade and commerce of this country with a sister community.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Will the honorable member's party support the views he is putting forward?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I do not know that the honorable member allowed my party an opportunity of doing much.

Mr. WEBSTER.—What I wish to know is whether the honorable member is speaking on behalf of his party or not.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Unlike the honorable member, I never speak on behalf of my party. It is sufficient for me to speak here for myself, or, at any rate, from a non-party point of view, as I shall always do in future. I do not believe in party, but I do believe in doing something to facilitate the trade of Australia. In this report on trade between Australia and South Africa we have a practical suggestion made by a competent officer, who was sent abroad to ascertain how we could extend and improve the relations between the Commonwealth and sister communities. This is in accord with principles which have been warmly advocated here by the Prime Minister. Instead of waiting for something to be done in the dim and distant future, why should we not take advantage of an opportunity of this kind to enter into a reciprocal arrangement, which, if it be found to work well, may be further developed? I wish now to refer to a small matter which is rather dear to my heart, and on which I fear I have taxed the patience of honorable members. On two occasions the House has approved of a report from a Select Committee in favour of the adoption of a decimal system of coinage, and getting the advantage of the profit which would be obtained from the Commonwealth coining its own silver. I have not yet been able to induce any Government to practically take up the subject. I have had an interchange of views with some Ministers. The difficulty presented to their mind was, "How are you to get rid of the existing system of coins; how are you to deport them, so to speak?" My suggestion was a common-sense one, I think. It was that we should arrange with the banks to collect the current silver, and export it to their agents in other British communities where such coinage was used, and then supply the banks with a corresponding amount of coinage issued by the Commonwealth mints. That plan seemed to me to be quite rational. But these honorable gentlemen said, "You would not get the banks to do that." When I applied to the banks I was addressed in this way: "Of course, Mr. Edwards, the banks will do anything if they are paid." I asked a banker what would be considered a fair rate of pay for doing this business, and he said, "It would be very small indeed. It would amount to only the interest on the money while we were out of its use, a certain amount for insurance, and a trifle for the clerical trouble." This did not have any effect upon any Ministry, and, therefore, I appeal to the present progressive Treasurer, and ask him whether he, with his great belief in Australia, with his optimism, which I share with him, will not carry out the twice-expressed wish of the House, and so earn an annual profit of £30,000 a year for the Treasury. Canada is doing this very thing now; it has solved the difficulty just in the way I suggested to the late Ministers it might be solved for the Commonwealth. On the 4th July, the Dominion Treasurer delivered his Budget. According to a short telegram in The Times, he referred to the question of entering into a reciprocal arrangement with South Africa, and then proceeded to say—

It has been decided to get rid of American silver currency from Canada.

While Australia is circulating British money, Canada is circulating the money of the United States—

An arrangement had been made with the banks to give them a commission of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. for collecting it. The result would be a profit on the increased circulation of Canadian silver.

I ask the present Government whether they cannot follow the example of Canada in this regard. I have demonstrated, I think fairly well, that there is a considerable profit—amounting to £30,000 a year—to be made out of substituting our own silver coinage for that of the old country. Canada is making a similar substitution, only that she is sending the coins to the United States, whereas we should have to send the coins to other British Possessions in which they are used.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Should we not lose a good deal by having to replace the worn gold, which is now replaced for us by the British Mints?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Yes, but I think we should overcome that obstacle. We ought to restore that portion of gold which we have in currency, and which amounts, at the outside, to nineteen or twenty million pounds. But our cost of restoring that for the future would not amount to a very great deal. According to my calculation, it would amount to a little over £4,000 per annum. That would reduce my estimated saving by £4,000, and still leave the Treasury with a profit of £25,000 or £26,000. I am not aiming so much at the profit as at the introduction of a better system. If it would please the Government of the day to increase the subsidy to the Auxiliary Squadron by the amount of the profit from the coinage of our silver, I should be perfectly prepared to vote in that direction. I must apologize for having occupied more time than I intended, in discussing many questions which are suggested by the Budget, and which require to be very closely scrutinized, so that we may arrive at a wise determination—one which, I hope, will forward the interests of the Commonwealth as well as of the States.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—The honorable member for South Sydney need not have apologised to the Committee for having taken up its time, because he has contributed some valuable information for the consideration of honorable members on one or two matters to which I intend to make some, I hope, short references. I am glad that the honorable member drew attention to the report of Mr. H. J. Scott, of Adelaide, because it was at my suggestion that the report was printed, as containing some very valuable information as to Australian trade with South Africa, showing to what extent it was possible to increase our exports to South African markets. I cannot, however, agree with the honorable member in one of the deductions which he sought to draw, in common with Mr. Scott, however valuable his report may be—that an extension of British trade with South Africa has resulted from the preference granted in the ad valorem rates to British goods. As a matter of fact, the preference is only  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., being 25 per cent. on a 10 per cent. ad valorem rate. It is only on a 10 per cent. ad valorem rate, and there is no preference on fixed duties, which are important. As a matter of fact, although we hear of the value of preferences, when we subject the actual conditions of the trade to close analysis, we find that they cannot possibly have led to that extension of trade with South Africa, which, indeed, is to be attributed to the large imports which always follow war in any country, no matter whether the fixed policy of that country be protectionist or free-trade. There were tremendous imports to America for many years after the American war stopped; and, similarly, although the sphere of the war in South Africa was comparatively small, and although the trade with South Africa is comparatively not great, there has been an extension of imports since the war ceased. I do not know that it has been kept up recently, but there was an extension of trade some time ago. The honorable member also referred to the Canadian experience of preferential trade. I am afraid that the success of the policy is not so clear in Canada as he seems to think. Some of the provincial Legislatures have carried resolutions in favour of Mr. Chamberlain's policy, but when amendments were proposed to be added to those resolutions showing that the method of expressing sympathy with Mr. Chamberlain's proposals should be by lowering the duty on British imports without increasing the duties against the foreigner, and when these amendments were in favour of the reduction of duties they were ignominiously rejected.

MR. HIGGINS.—Has the honorable and learned member read Mr. Foster Fraser's book on Canada?

MR. GLYNN.—I have not read the book to which the honorable member refers me. I have extracts from the original records here. I read an extract published in the Times from a resolution passed, for instance, in the Manitoba Parliament, where by, I think, twenty votes to nine, they rejected a proposal for lower duties in favour of England, unless accompanied by a higher Tariff, so that no injurious effects—from their point of view—might possibly follow from concessions made to England. And though the Canadian rebate, which was 25 per cent. in 1899, became about 33.1-3 per cent. in 1900, yet, if we compare the trade between Great Britain and Canada from 1899 to 1903 we shall find that the imports have not been very much stimulated by this reduction of duties in favour of Great Britain. While in 1899 the dutiable goods imported from the United Kingdom were $27,000,000 in value, in 1903 they were $42,000,000 in value. At the same time, in the case of the United States, the dutiable goods—the same class of goods—the value of the imports to Canada ran up without any preference from $44,000,000 to $68,000,000. So that we should be just as likely to be right in concluding that the absence of preference had benefited the imports from the United States, as to conclude that the preference granted by Canada had benefited the imports from Great Britain. Besides, there had been a corresponding increase in the imports of free goods from Great Britain to Canada. So that it is rather dangerous to postulate general statements as to the success of Chamberlainism, because on a close analysis of the figures they are liable to be upset. If we are to judge from what has been said in Canada, and from what has been said here—even, I think, in one of the speeches of the Prime Minister on the hustings—that there must be some sort of reciprocity, we must conclude that there is not much chance of it. While our exportation of frozen meat and wheat to England is a very small proportion of the total imports into Great Britain, it is idle to expect that she will put an embargo upon her own food supplies. Significant figures which have been published ought to be conclusive upon this point. I find that in 1904 Argentina sent to England fresh meat to the extent of 155,000 tons; the United States, 120,000 tons; New Zealand, 90,000 tons; the Continent of Europe, 15,500 tons; and Australia only 13,000 tons. If we take frozen and chilled beef, we find that the United States sent to England 55 per cent. of the total imported, Argentina 40 per cent., and so on, until we come down to all the other countries aggregated at 5 per cent. Take wheat.

British India sent to Great Britain nearly 6,000,000 quarters; and we go right down the scale until we come to Australia, 2,400,000 quarters, and Canada, 1,450,000 quarters. It only requires an examination of the imports into Great Britain to see how little likelihood there is of the reciprocity upon which some of our preferentialists are basing their policy being recognised by the mother country. The Treasurer referred in his speech to the question of the States debts and the transferred properties. I again express my agreement with the suggestion of the Treasurer that perhaps the proper way to deal with these transferred properties is to pay simply differences. We really are a partnership. The States will have to pay for these properties per head of their population. I think that the proportion that South Australia would have to pay would be about £1,000,000—about one-tenth of the total of the rough estimate laid before the Convention, which was between £10,000,000 and £11,000,000, as the value of the properties to be taken over. The valuation of the South Australian properties then given was about £1,666,000, so that that State would have a surplus to be credited to her by the Federation. That is a much better way of dealing with the matter than paying for properties which belong to the people of Australia. All the States, like partners, are handing over something, and it seems to me folly to credit each State with the total value of the properties handed over, when the States have to pay for them per head of the population, unless under section 93 of the Constitution the basis of payment be altered. I do not want to elaborate the matter, because I do not think there is much chance of that suggestion being accepted. As regards the debts, even in that way a possible solution of the question on the line suggested for the transferred properties may be found. I made the suggestion once before, and I know there are some difficulties in the way of its adoption, but some modification of the Canadian principle may be applied. In Canada, in 1867, when Federation took place, the average debts were estimated at about $25 per head of the population. Some of the States, of course, did not owe so much; Nova Scotia and New Brunswick owing about $22 per head. What was done was to capitalize the difference, and to credit those States who were under the average with that amount in the books of the Federation; and on the amount 5 per cent. is now being paid.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The Constitution would have to be altered in order to do that.

Mr. GLYNN.—No doubt, that is the fault. I brought this matter before the Federal Convention, and, in fact, tabled a motion, which, however, received scarcely any attention. Whether that motion was defeated on its merits, I shall not say.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In Canada power to take that action was provided in the Constitution.

Mr. GLYNN.—And I made an endeavour at the Convention to have a similar provision made in the Australian Constitution. I then also pointed out that we might make a great mistake in providing for taking over only those debts which existed at the establishment of the Commonwealth. The Treasurer has mentioned that we shall have to amend the Constitution if we wish to take over States debts which have been incurred since 1901; and I find, on looking at the official report of the Federal Convention, that I pressed the following on the Committee, somewhat reluctant to give it attention:—

If you are to limit the debts to be taken over hereafter to the existing debts of the Commonwealth, you may subsequently find yourself in this position: That you will be unable to take over any new debts incurred by the States; or to take over debts, the character of which has been varied.

It is doubtful whether even the debts which have been converted since Federation may be constitutionally taken over; probably they may, and I merely say that the matter is doubtful. However, these are big matters to which one can make only passing reference. The Treasurer has given us some big figures in regard to the position of Australia, and those may strengthen the reputation of Australia in the English market, if we can only get people to study them. What we really want, I think, is something to reassure the States that we are not quite so extravagant as they think us. There are still statements made on platforms in the States, from which the public infer that the Commonwealth is particularly and exceptionally extravagant. We have done some foolish things, perhaps, in the way of policy, though there may be a difference of opinion on that point. But I do not think we are quite so extravagant as some States politicians seem to imagine. At any rate, we established a good precedent for the States in rejecting the Loan Bill of £571,000 two or three years ago, and throwing the expenditure on the revenue; and this, doubtless, to some extent, accounts for the increased expenditure. For twenty years prior to Federation, the States had been recklessly borrowing.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The States have since borrowed some £30,000,000.

Mr. GLYNN.—We have reduced the expenditure on defence. I am not quite sure, but I think that four years prior to Federation, the total expenditure on military defence was about £522,000, including the contribution of £95,000 per annum to the Imperial Navy. The amount was increased by about £400,000 by the time the Defence Department was taken over in March, 1901—increased not by the Commonwealth, but by the States, though the increase appears in the accounts for the Federation for 1901. We then proceeded to deal with Defence Estimates by reducing them by £131,000, and, subsequently, by other amounts which I forget.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—By about £200,000 altogether.

Mr. GLYNN.—This ought to stand to the credit of the Commonwealth. If I remember rightly, the expenditure had gone up to over £800,000 on 31st March, 1901, when the Departments were taken over.

Mr. McCAY.—There is now very little real difference between the expenditure by the States and the expenditure by the Commonwealth on defences, after allowing for the different modes of expenditure.

Mr. GLYNN.—Perhaps the honorable and learned member may be able to point that out when he addresses the Committee.

Mr. McCAY.—I have the figures.

Mr. GLYNN.—The figures I have quoted from memory stand in the Audit Commissioner's report, and they are significant. At any rate, we began by reducing the expenditure, and that reduction ought to stand to the credit of the Commonwealth. There is another matter to which it is just as well that public attention should be drawn. The Treasurer has shown us that new expenditure last year, caused by Federation, amounted to £312,000; and it would be easy enough to mislead the public by telling them that Federation has swollen the "other," or non-transferred, expenditure by £795,000 in addition. There is "other" expenditure, for part of which, no doubt, we are to be blamed, as I shall endeavour to show in a moment when referring to sugar duties. For some of that expenditure, however, we certainly are not to blame; because, as I say, we ought to receive credit for throwing on to revenue expenditure which formerly was attached to loan account. When those matters are taken into account, there does not seem, except in connexion with the sugar duties, to have been any errors of financial policy—I am giving only my own opinion—on the part of the Commonwealth. If I may refer to my own State of South Australia, the position would seem to be that her share in the new expenditure is £27,669, and of "other," £74,383. The latter is, to a great extent, as I have said, due to our debiting to revenue expenditure formerly debited to loan account; it is also due to South Australia's share of the losses on the sugar duties, which up to this year have been comparatively light, and is further due, in a very small amount, to expenditure in New Guinea. The greater proportion is due to the revenue having to bear expenditure which was formerly met with loan moneys. As regards revenue, it is pleasant to find that the Postal Department, which previously paid well in South Australia, is again displaying elasticity, even under lower rates. I always held that South Australia could not expect to maintain the policy which formerly gave that State such a high revenue from the Post and Telegraph Department. I remember that the Federal Convention had a return presented, showing that in 1896, while Victoria received a revenue of £91,000 from telegrams, South Australia received £89,000, although the population of the former State was two and a half times as great. The comparison would be equally significant if made between South Australia and New South Wales. South Australia was wedged in between other States, and charged 2s. on Inter-State telegrams, instead of the rate of 1s., which prevailed in New South Wales and Victoria. That policy, of course, could not be kept up; and when under Federation a reduction was made even to a greater extent than 1s., because there was an internal reduction, there was a corresponding shrinkage for a short time in the revenue. It is pleasant, however, to find that the Treasurer estimates next year to receive from post and telegraphs a revenue of £276,000 as compared with £277,000 received in the year 1901-2. As business increases an equal buoyancy will, I think, be perceptible in subsequent years, as compared with the revenue anticipated for the current year. I notice on page 3 of the Budget papers a sum of £35,300 declared to have been received for work done for the Savings Banks, of which amount South Australia contributed £4,000. I appeal to the Treasurer whether it is fair to retain this money at the expense of the salaries of a great many of the officers. In South Australia, several officers were getting fixed salaries under the Civil Service Act of 1874. They were also allowed the amounts paid by the Savings Bank to the Postal Department for doing Savings Bank business. There were other allowances, but I do not intend to refer to them. The State Government told the officers that the status they got by the total of these payments was the status to which they were truly entitled under the Civil Service Act, and not the status represented merely by the salary fixed by that Act. The Savings Bank allowance was therefore regarded, as virtually, though not technically, part of their salaries. The result is that several officers are now, when the Savings Bank allowance is taken from them, practically reduced to the grade of the salary only. There are men who, to my knowledge, in some cases are working from 6.15 a.m. to 9.45 p.m.—they work intermittently, but they are at work during those hours all the same, because they cannot go twenty yards away from the Post-office without finding a substitute, as they are liable to be called on for duty at any time between those hours.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—That is sweating.

Mr. GLYNN.—It is sweating. I speak now with positive knowledge, and it seems to me that it is undoubtedly sweating. Under the new arrangement, these men will lose in some cases as much as £50 a year.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That system was exceptional, I believe, in South Australia.

Mr. GLYNN.—Oh no! the right honorable gentleman's figures show that it was not.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—On what page is the matter dealt with?

Mr. GLYNN.—On page 3 of the Budget papers. Of course, I do not know what the local law was in New South Wales.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I know that in Western Australia they never got anything extra for doing that work. It was a part of their duty, and I thought the same system was followed in all the States.

Mr. GLYNN.—These allowances have been regarded in South Australia as part of the salaries of these officers, although, under the Civil Service Act, they do not appear as part of their salaries. My point is that it is grossly unfair to these officers that owing to the arrangements made by the Federal Government, they should lose these allowances, when they were told before the Commonwealth Bill was adopted that such things would come under the term of "accrued or accruing rights." I ask the Treasurer to look into this matter, and see whether he cannot, at small expense, recognise what it was fairly anticipated might be comprised within the term "accrued or accruing rights." The right honorable gentleman must admit that these allowances have to be made in all cases of transition, even though we wish to reform the Department. When Western Australia came into the Federation, she asked for and obtained exceptional terms, although she got them under false pretences.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Under what?

Mr. GLYNN.—Under false pretences.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member does not mean that?

Mr. GLYNN.—The right honorable gentleman astonished us by the figures he gave the other day.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The prospect did not look so good at the time. Things turned out better than we thought.

Mr. GLYNN.—Undoubtedly, that may be so, but these are the figures on the subject. In Western Australia, Customs duties for 1900, the year before Federation, produced a revenue of £944,000.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was not so much as we usually got.

Mr. GLYNN.—Never mind; that was the revenue at the time the Treasurer was pressing the other States so hard for special terms to induce Western Australia to enter the Federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—You all agreed to them.

Mr. GLYNN.—In 1904-5 we have a revenue from Customs in Western Australia of £1,029,000, exclusive of the special Tariff. So that in Western Australia there was actually received in 1904-5 a great deal more revenue than was received in 1900, without taking the special Tariff into account.

Mr. CARPENTER.—There has been an increase of population.

Mr. GLYNN.—That is so, no doubt; but Western Australia has not suffered from Federation. We might leave the whole of the special Tariff results out of account, and Western Australia will be found to be not in a worse, but in a better, position than before Federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is an extraordinary thing that members of the Federal Convention thought that the opposite would be the case.

Mr. GLYNN.—They would then have believed anything from the right honorable gentleman; he appeared to be so very simple. At the same time, these are the facts, and it is as well to bear them in mind, especially when the right honorable gentleman makes such strong appeals for consideration for his little project for the construction of the transcontinental railway, which he always puts forward as a sort of compensation for the sacrifices made by Western Australia in coming into the Federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—“Understanding” is the word I used.

Mr. GLYNN.—To come to something sweeter. The honorable and learned member for Werriwa and myself strongly pointed out in 1902, when the sugar question was being considered, that we were making a huge sacrifice of revenue that was not justifiable. I mention the honorable and learned member and myself because we stood to the last in opposition to the proposal then made by the Ministry. We both predicted that, as it was proposed that these sugar bounties should be given only until 1907, as sure as possible before 1907 an agitation would spring up for their extension. We also said—and in this connexion I might quote my own words—that—

A time will subsequently come when there will be a glut of production. . . . An export bounty will be called for.

That will be the next step, which at present we do not propose to take.

Mr. PAGE.—That time has not arrived yet.

Mr. GLYNN.—No; but it is indicated in the Budget speech of the Treasurer. The right honorable gentleman showed that the local supply had overtaken the demand, and that the industry will have to look out for markets abroad. I shall show in a minute what chance the industry has of getting these markets abroad. It is significant that a recent writer in one of the English reviews, the name of which I forget, though I made a note of it at the time

I read the article, points out that when the glut does come there is always some demand for bounties on production and for the encouragement of the export trade. In France, for instance, there was an import duty on wheat, but when there was a glut of production there was a demand made for a bounty on export, and it was granted. The writer I refer to says—

Bounties on export were never heard of while the sugar producing countries depended on outside sources for any material of its supply; they arose when imports ceased, owing to an increase of home production, simply in response to the clamour of manufacturers for help and encouragement.

That is the statement of a writer who has examined the European sugar question, and his remarks apply with equal force to Australia.

Mr. CONROY.—That is absolutely the case.

Mr. GLYNN.—The honorable and learned member reminds me that he and others stated, when the bonus was first proposed, that the time would come when the production of sugar in Australia would equal the consumption, and that then trouble would arise from the loss of duty. What is the position? Last year the consumption of sugar in Australia was about 180,000 tons, and the quantity of sugar produced 160,000 tons, while the production of this year is estimated at 183,000 tons, or more than the consumption of last year. What chance is there of finding a market for our surplus sugar outside Australia, which the Treasurer suggests can be found? The world's production of sugar has increased tremendously of late years, while, during the last century, the cost of production has very much decreased. To take a period of twenty years, the world's production of sugar in 1882-3 was 3,983,000 tons, and in 1904-5, 9,827,000 tons. Great economies in the production of sugar have recently been effected, although they have not yet been applied to some of the older sugar-producing countries, and the Commission has shown that this non-application of improved methods is the cause of the trouble in the West Indies. In the face of this increasing production, there is not much chance for Australian sugar in the world's markets, unless we do what we shall surely be asked to do, give a bounty on export to continue the encouragement which it will be alleged the industry requires.

Mr. CONROY.—Allowing the owners of the richest land to continue to levy on the owners of the poorest land!

Mr. GLYNN.—As the honorable member for South Sydney has shown, the price of sugar has increased in the United Kingdom; but that has been the result of Chamberlainism. Mr. Chamberlain began his campaign by some diplomatic notes in 1897, and, on the 30th September, 1903, a treaty which had been entered into at his instance by the non-producing sugar countries, came into force by proclamation in England, with the result that there has been an increase of 160 per cent. in the price of sugar, comparing the price in 1902 with the price in 1905; and it has been shown that a rise of 1d. per lb. means a tax upon the consumers of sugar of £15,000,000. That has been the result of the policy of stopping importation from Russia, Argentina, and Denmark, in September, 1903, and from the Dominican Republic, in July, 1904. I do not wish to give many instances of the disastrous effect of the treaty in England; but I should like to mention that in the confectionery trade it has caused loss of employment to between 15,000 and 20,000 hands. If we coddle the sugar industry here, we shall have a similar result, because our policy will do great injury by increasing the price of sugar to industries for which it is a raw material. As our law stands at present, the sugar excise expires on the 1st January, 1907. The import duty is £6 per ton on cane sugar, and £10 per ton on beet. Now, when our production, as it is anticipated it soon will, reaches our consumption, if there is no longer any excise, the whole of the import duty will go to the sugar industry. I do not say that it will all go to the producers, because I believe that the bulk of it will not do so, and that we are really wasting a great part of the bounty by paying it to refiners and others engaged in the industry. Now, the revenue from sugar in 1902-3 was £780,000, and the whole of that amount, and, indeed, a larger amount, allowing for the increase of population, will therefore be lost to the Treasury if the law is not amended. This shows the folly of the settlement agreed to by this Parliament two or three years ago, although we were then told that it was a perfect and a fair one. Let us consider the operation of the duties up to the present time. The revenue in 1902-3 was £780,448, and in 1904-5 £628,511, a difference of £151,937, but it is necessary to add the £128,165 paid in bounties last year, so that the real difference between the revenue of 1904-5 and that of 1902-3 is £280,102, which is a pretty stiff payment for the taxpayers of the Commonwealth to make to the sugar industry. The estimated revenue for 1904-5 is £607,500, or £172,948 less than the revenue of 1902-3, and, adding the £151,670 to be paid in bonuses, the total payment to the sugar industry next year will amount to £324,618. I am sorry that the honorable member for South Sydney thinks that when the bounties cease the excise duties must go, because that will mean the sacrifice of the whole of our revenue from sugar, since the import duties will act prohibitively directly our production is equal to our consumption. If, however, the excise be not continued after 1907, we shall be giving away, on the basis of the 1902-3 receipts, £780,000, or more probably, allowing for the increase in population, £1,000,000, to an industry which, I hope to show, is not entitled to a penny of compensation. If the excise duty is kept on, however, and the bounties continued, we shall get a net return of £1 per ton on a production of 180,000 tons, that being the difference between the excise and the bounty, as all our sugar will by that time be produced by white labour.

Mr. TUDOR.—No.

Mr. GLYNN.—If the honorable member says that the law which was passed three years ago with flying colours is futile, it shows the foolishness of some of the cocksure assertions which were then made. The position will be that we shall be getting £1 per ton on a production of 180,000 tons, and the loss, on the basis of the 1902-3 revenue, will be £600,000 per year. That is the amount which, with a slight deduction for New South Wales growers, will be given to the Queensland sugar industry. Furthermore, of course, the price of sugar will be increased to the consumers, though I am dealing now merely with the effect of the continuation of the bounty on the revenue. According to the statement made by Sir Edmund Barton, in introducing the Pacific Islands Labourers Bill, there are about £6,000,000 invested in the sugar industry, estimating the value of land as capital.

Mr. CONROY. — A most extraordinary thing to do.

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not now wish to examine that estimate, but I desire to point out that, if the policy of the Government is carried out, we shall be making a present of 10 per cent. on the invested capital to an industry which our White Australian policy has by no means destroyed. Of course, if Victoria likes to do this, it is her affair, because the consideration of the kanaka question is no longer bound up with the Tariff, and she is the biggest loser of revenue among the States. I do not know the exact amount, but probably it will eventually reach between £200,000 and £300,000. I hold that Queensland is not entitled to one penny of this compensation. Sir Edmund Barton, in introducing the Pacific Island Labourers Bill, on the 2nd of October, 1901, said—

From 1868 this traffic has been condemned, not only by the rest of Australia, but by the continued policy and repeated utterances of the statesmen of Queensland. . . . In introducing the Bill the Commonwealth is carrying out only what has been the declared policy of Queensland for the last twenty years at least.

That Bill was intended to stop the importation of kanakas, and was not intended to confer any special Tariff advantage upon the sugar-growers. In 1877 Sir John Douglas, who was then Premier of Queensland, declared that the policy of kanaka importation was bad, wrong, and utterly rotten, and not one of the Acts passed by the Queensland Legislature contains any suggestion of compensation. The only consideration that was shown to the sugar-growers was given to them by way of an extension of time, which expired in 1902. In 1892 Sir Samuel Griffith, after the importation of kanakas had been stopped for two years, granted the sugar-growers a further term of ten years, in order to enable them to adjust themselves to the new conditions to be brought about by the substitution of white for black labour. At the end of that period the policy of kanaka importation was to stop. There was to be no compensation. I do not see why we should be so generous as to pay Queensland for the abolition of a policy which it had determined to abandon long prior to the establishment of Federation. We know, of course, that various considerations operate to induce honorable members to cast their votes in a certain way, but I really cannot understand how any body of men who had the interests of the Commonwealth at heart could hand over to Queensland the bulk of £780,000 per annum to compensate her for the abandonment of a policy which she had determined should cease in 1902. Now let us look at the case of New South Wales. I know that the representatives of that State have not asked for any compensation. They are generally sensible in their demands. Under the general policy, however, wherever white labour was found producing sugar it was to receive the benefit of the bonus, and, according to the figures contained in the Treasurer's Budget papers, we have actually been paying New South Wales for increasing the production from the black labour employed. In 1902, 19,423 tons of sugar were produced by the employment of white labour, and 1,426 tons by the employment of black labour, the bounty paid amounting to £36,303. That was the state of the industry when the sugar bonuses came into operation—practically the whole of the production was by means of white labour, and yet we gave the planters of New South Wales bounties amounting to £36,000.

Mr. CONROY. — We gave that to the owners of some of the finest land in the world.

Mr. GLYNN. — The honorable and learned member can doubtless speak from personal knowledge of the subject. I am merely dealing with the figures presented by the Treasurer. In 1904 the production of sugar by means of white labour amounted to 17,812 tons, or less than was produced in 1902, whereas the production of sugar grown by black labour had increased to 1,838 tons. Nevertheless, we paid to the New South Wales sugar-growers bounties amounting to £36,107. That bonus was intended to encourage the substitution of white labour for black labour, and yet apparently more black labour than ever is being employed in New South Wales.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We had to do that under the Constitution. We could not treat one State differently from another.

Mr. GLYNN.—No doubt, but that shows how bad the policy was—how wretched its operation. Queensland is not entitled to compensation, and New South Wales has never asked for any. If we desire to be generous, we must be just. I contend that South Australia has a far greater claim to come cap-in-hand to the Commonwealth than either of the States mentioned, and certainly a far greater claim than Queensland has. Yet it has never done so. I will trespass upon the attention of honorable members to the extent of quoting a few figures which will show the position occupied by South Australia under Federation, and the expenditure upon which that State has embarked for Australian purposes. South Australia built a railway from Port Darwin to Pine Creek, and prolonged her lines in South Australia proper by pushing them northwards in pursuance of the Australian policy of constructing an iron road right through the continent. According to figures furnished to me by the Commissioner of Audit in 1898—I do not think they have altered since—the loans floated for the purpose of building these railways amounted to £2,493,000. In addition to this, South Australia built the overland telegraph line as an Australian project. The amount devoted to that work originally was £517,000, and £50,000 or £100,000 has since been spent upon it. I am not sure as to the larger amount, but I know that an additional expenditure of at least £50,000 has been incurred. In connexion with the railways mentioned, South Australia has been a continuous loser, and as regards the telegraph line, she lost for several years in the interests of Australia. I cannot speak with accuracy as to the present state of affairs, but the line must show diminishing receipts, owing to the competition of the Pacific Cable Company with the Eastern Extension Cable Company. The Eastern Extension Company sends all its cables over the South Australian line, and when the Pacific Cable took over some of its business, the South Australian telegraph receipts on the overland line fell off to the extent of £13,000 to £14,000 in the first year. The actual indebtedness incurred by South Australia in connexion with various expenditures which must be looked upon as Australian—the greatest of which I have already mentioned—amounted in June, 1904, to £3,527,000, and I put it to honorable members that, inasmuch as these large undertakings have not returned any interest, South Australia has made fairly substantial sacrifices in the interests of a policy that must be regarded as Australian rather than of a purely State character. South Australia incurs an annual loss of £106,000 in connexion with the Northern Territory, and the deficiency is increasing, so that in ten years a further indebtedness of over £1,000,000 will have accumulated. The loss to South Australia in connexion with the Northern Territory has been increased by the operation of the Federal Tariff. South Australia had a special Tariff for the Northern Territory, which, in 1899, yielded £34,347; whereas the receipts from Customs and Excise in 1903-4 amounted to only £14,132. Therefore, the annual loss to South Australia in connexion with the Territory has been increased by £20,000, a fairly substantial sacrifice, regarding which the South Australian politicians have not made the slightest clamour. I might push matters still further. Under the book-keeping sections of the Constitution South Australia is losing a good deal of money, because there is not a sufficient number of Customs inspectors along the tremendous frontier presented by the Northern Territory to Queensland, and consequently there is a very great leakage of revenue in favour of Queensland. In other words, duty is collected by Queensland upon imports passing through that State to the Northern Territory, and that duty is retained by Queensland, instead of being credited to South Australia. In this connexion, I desire to quote from the last report of the South Australian Audit Commissioner. He says—

I have called the attention of the Government to the urgent necessity for taking action to obtain officers to watch the interests of the Northern Territory at suitable places on the borders, especially those of Queensland. These would require the production of Customs certificates of duties collected in Queensland and upon all goods passing the border into the Northern Territory, so as to enable the Territory to claim those duties.

Also, that for the past three years (nearly) Queensland should repay the Excise and Customs duties that were received by her on goods that were afterwards sent into the Territory.

I say that upon these figures, there are considerations which justify South Australia in asking for a subsidy, quite as much as Queensland is warranted in seeking an extension of the compensation payable under the existing Act. If the principle is good for one State, it is good for another.

MR. HENRY WILLIS.—The honorable and learned member is referring to the sugar bonus?

MR. GLYNN.—Yes. If any mendicancy is to be indulged in, all the States can share in it upon a similar justification.

MR. CROUCH.—But the honorable and learned member cannot select a State. He has to select an industry; and what industry would he select in South Australia.

MR. GLYNN.—We kept the kanakas out of South Australia—in Queensland they were admitted. Queensland sinned for a time, and is to be paid for transgressing, whereas South Australia has not received a penny for not sinning at all. In 1892, the Parliament of the latter State placed upon the statute-book an enactment which provided for the employment of coloured labour in the Northern Territory, but, under stress of public opinion, it was never put into force. The Commonwealth is compensating Queensland for having employed black labour, but is not giving anything to South Australia for refusing to put into force the statute to which I have referred. I am sure that honorable members will excuse me if I again refer to South Australia, because one has to present statistics in relation to his own State in order to show how the Federation is working. The effect of the operation of the sugar bonus upon South Australia was as follows:—Our revenue from sugar in 1902-3 was £97,000; in 1904-5, it was £61,000—a shrinkage of £36,000. The bonus represented £13,000, so that next year, as against 1902-3, the net difference will be about £23,000. That is not quite a fair comparison, because the revenue from this source in 1902 was rather a large one. It was beyond the normal revenue reaped by South Australia prior to Federation, through a mistake made in the method of giving rebates instead of bounties. Let us take the normal revenue from sugar in South Australia at £60,000, and see what will be the effect of retaining the £3 per ton excise, and of granting a bounty of £2 per ton, as suggested by the Treasurer. Our consumption is about 17,000 tons, and consequently, we shall be credited with £51,000. But as we have to contribute one-tenth of the bounty—that is the proportion of new expenditure which is generally assigned to South Australia—we shall be required to pay £30,000 by way of bounty, leaving as the net duty, under the continuation of this policy of bounties and excise, a sum of £21,000, as against our former revenue of £60,000. That is a very large sacrifice for South Australia to make, considering that she is just as much entitled to consideration as is Queensland.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—What does the total loss represent?

Mr. GLYNN.—About £39,000. I say that what we ought to do is to retain the excise of £3 per ton, and to lower the import duty. The difference between the excise duty of £3 per ton and the import duty of £6 per ton is altogether too great. Six pounds per ton is the maximum import rate in Australia, and I do not think that it has been levied in any but one State. In Western Australia, prior to Federation, they had no import rate; in South Australia it was £3, and in one State I think it was £6 per ton. So that we have really adopted the maximum rate instead of the average rate. Consequently I suggest that the import duty upon sugar should be reduced to £5 or £4 per ton. Even then we should still be giving a preference to the local manufacturer. I would abolish the bonus altogether. If it be retained, it ought to be upon the principle suggested by the honorable member for South Sydney, of a sliding scale which would be indicative of the intention of Parliament to absolutely abolish it at the end of the period when it would automatically expire. I do not wish to quote figures showing the burden imposed by the bonus upon our producers, because that task has been most excellently performed by the honorable member for South Sydney, who knows far more about that aspect of the matter than I do. His figures indicate that, in addition to a very great loss of revenue, an increased burden will be thrown upon the consumer, aggregating from £1,200,000 to £1,400,000.

Mr. CONROY.—A little more than that, I think.

Mr. GLYNN.—It may be so. I have seen it estimated that £5 or £6 per ton represents the increased price, which, under the operation of the Tariff, can be obtained by the local producer, as against the price received in 1900. Upon a consumption of 180,000 tons per annum, that would run into a very large sum. Some time in June last a letter was published in the Age, in which it was pointed out that the Colonial Sugar Refining Company pays £10 per ton to the producers for its sugar, and that, after paying £3 per ton excise, which would make its total outlay £13 per ton, it sells that commodity for £22 per ton. That shows that the producer does not derive the benefit accruing from this policy. The figures which I have quoted, if correct, prove that there is a difference of £9 per ton between the price of crude and refined sugar in Australia, whilst the normal difference in England is about 25s. per ton—a very significant comparison. In the daily newspapers of the 17th June I saw a telegram from Queensland, in which it was stated that, as a result of these duties, the cost of the raw material for the factories was increasing, and in consequence the output of jam was shrinking, and that the consumption probably would be diminished.

The result is that, whilst in June, 1899, the factories in Queensland turned out 5,025,000 lbs. of jam, in 1902 they turned out 2,910,000 lbs., and in 1904 1,357,000 lbs.—a very singular shrinkage, to an extent caused by the operation of this fiscal policy. These are figures which, if not conclusive, seem to me to be so, and which are well worthy of the consideration of honorable members before they accept the policy suggested by the Government of extending a bounty which originally ought not to have been granted.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I do not know whether members of the Opposition are expected to criticise fully the speech of the Treasurer, but in my opinion the Budget speech has yet to be delivered by him. We certainly heard the right honorable gentleman give a great mass of figures connected with the estimates of revenue and expenditure, but he did not give very much information concerning some of the most important items of that expenditure. In connexion with the Estimates, there is yet a great deal to be explained, which we were entitled, I think, to have explained when the Treasurer delivered his so-called Budget. We are left absolutely in the dark in regard to a great many of the most important items on which we shall be called upon to vote by-and-by. I regret that the information has not been given, because if it had it might have considerably facilitated the business to be done.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the honorable member will state some points I may be able to explain them when replying.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I trust that the right honorable gentleman will do so in replying, without making it necessary for me to unduly prolong my speech by going through all the items for the purpose of furnishing a skeleton for his Budget.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I shall come to the conclusion that the honorable member does not know any if he does not tell me of any.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The right honorable gentleman has not given honorable members an opportunity of knowing much about them. Certainly he came down here with his Estimates, and made a speech, in which he gave a mass of figures, which are contained in the Estimates, and which honorable members could have obtained for themselves by a perusal of the printed document. Probably I shall ask the right honorable gentleman to give us some information on several points. A large amount of information is required before honorable members can vote on a number of items, and doubtless it will be supplied when they come under consideration. In my opinion, the Treasurer should not wait until that stage is reached; he should have afforded the information when he addressed the Committee.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I submit that I did so.

Mr. JOHNSON.—In his own opinion the right honorable gentleman may have done so, but that opinion is not, I think, shared by anybody else.

Mr. WILKS.—All the newspapers in Australia say it is the worst Budget ever delivered.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They are prejudiced. I take their comments cum grano salis.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The first item that was dealt with by the right honorable gentleman was the question of immigration. Undoubtedly this is one of the most important questions which we can have to consider. Australia is confronted with the fact that her population is not increasing as we had a right to expect it would. In view of the increased taxation which is taking place this raises a very serious consideration. I see that the Treasurer made some reference to the subject in his speech, but he did not indicate how he proposed to deal with it. I propose to read an extract from his speech on that point—

State aid to immigration has ceased for a longer period in some States than in others; but, speaking generally, I think the period is twenty years. In my opinion, and in the opinion of the Government, the population question presents the great problem that lies before us in Australia.

That, I think, is the opinion of every one who thinks at all on the question; but neither the Treasurer nor the Government has proposed any plan for our consideration. The right honorable gentleman went on to say—

It is not the desire of any one, I am sure, to add to the population—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What have we been doing in the Budgets during the last four years?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am not concerned with what we have been doing during the last three or four years. I am only concerned with this fact, that the Treasurer opened his speech with a reference to a question which, he said, is, above all others, the most important one for the Commonwealth to consider. Therefore it is not a question of what we have been doing during the last three or four years, but a question of what the present Government intends to do when its Treasurer puts the subject in the forefront of his alleged Budget.

It is not the desire of any one, I am sure, to add to the population of the cities and towns, which are already too large in proportion to the population of their respective States. Sydney contains 36 per cent., Melbourne 41 per cent., and Adelaide 45 per cent. of the population of their respective States. The whole question is a serious matter which we have to face. I have no doubt that every honorable member, if asked, could give his own particular reasons why the immigration has been so small.

The right honorable gentleman went on to state what, in his opinion, is the cause of so little immigration into Australia. He said—

In my opinion the principal reason must be looked for in the competition of the United States and Canada. More State encouragement has been given to immigration in those countries than here, more especially the great encouragement in the shape of a free land grant system, which, for years past, I have been in the habit of saying, was the great factor in laying the foundation of the prosperity of the United States, and afterwards of Canada.

Later on, he said—

Admitting, as we all do, that we must have more people in Australia, three things are, in my opinion, essential—one is cheap passages to the country; the next is cheap land on arrival; and the third is assistance from a Government land bank to work the land. Of course, the Commonwealth has no land; it has no mines, nor has it any railways or other means of transit under its control. The States have all these agencies. They have railways, mines, and lands. Now, it occurs to us that if the States and the Commonwealth were to work together in regard to this matter, recognising that they have a common interest, something very satisfactory might be achieved. It seems to me that the Commonwealth should select the immigrants and bring them to Australia on terms to be arranged, and that the States should provide land for them, and finance them through the land bank.

It will be seen that the Treasurer does not help us much in the way of a practical suggestion. Here is simply a bald general statement, which may mean a great deal or may mean nothing at all; but, so far as concerns the practical solution of what the Treasurer says, is one of the gravest of the problems that confront us, his remarks are absolutely useless. Certainly, the suggestion that we should have cheap fares to this country is, in my opinion, a good one. But who is going to provide the cheap fares?

Mr. Johnson.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Government of New South Wales has even complained of my saying that much.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Is the Commonwealth, or are the States, to provide the fares?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—My idea was that the Commonwealth should do so.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Now we have something definite. The Commonwealth should provide fares for suitable selected immigrants.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is what I intended.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The right honorable gentleman did not make that clear.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It was to be inferred, I think.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Nothing was stated as to how this expenditure was to be met. It is intended, the Treasurer now says, that the Commonwealth should incur that expense, which, of course, will mean a considerable addition to the expenditure which already has to be met out of our one-fourth of the revenue. However, if it would do any good towards settling the question, I, for one, should not grudge the expenditure; especially as if the immigrants were profitably employed we should get a return from their productions which would recoup the Commonwealth. I do not say that it would do so entirely in the first years of the experiment, but in the long run the Treasury would benefit. The next point that the right honorable gentleman emphasized was that we should have cheap land for the immigrants on arrival. Here we are confronted with a question that opens up the whole land problem. Considering the different land laws that exist in the various States, the suggestion of the Treasurer is simply worthless, unless he is prepared to propound a scheme for the consideration of the States whereby cheap land could be provided, on a sound and proper basis, for the prospective immigrants on their arrival.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member will see, further on in the speech, that I proposed to confer with the States to ascertain what could be done.

Mr. JOHNSON.—To confer with the States may possibly lead to something being done, but to say that the provision of cheap land will be the result is simply conjecture. The Government might have outlined some proposal for submission to the States as a practical scheme. It may happen that if a Conference of States Premiers were held for the purpose, some solution might be evolved of a satisfactory nature. However, I am of opinion that if the Government had taken the initiative and prepared a scheme for submission to the States, we might have reached a practical solution a great deal earlier than could otherwise be expected.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Government has been in office only seven weeks.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Is the Government prepared to propound such a scheme?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member will see what I say lower down in the speech; the Government will endeavour to arrive at an agreement with the States and to work with them.

Mr. JOHNSON.—“Endeavour to arrive at an agreement.” That does not meet the point that I am submitting. I contend that the Government themselves should be prepared to propound a scheme, and should not wait an indefinite time for a conference to be held. Let the Government bring forward their scheme, and, if the States do not approve of it, they can submit an alternative scheme. I wish to see the Government take the lead in this matter, which is the very foundation upon which all other proposals affecting the Commonwealth must ultimately rest. Before we deal with the question of immigration, however, we have to consider that of settling the people who are already here. We find it difficult to do that. We have a large percentage of our population aggregated in cities like Sydney, Melbourne, and Adelaide. That is a most disastrous thing from the point of view of the development of the lands of the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — And from the financial point of view also.

Mr. JOHNSON.—And, unquestionably, from the financial point of view also. This population question is also inextricably involved in the defence question. The very first problem we have to solve, even before dealing with the question of immigration, is that of settling profitably on our lands the people who are already here. In every State there are thousands of men who want land, and millions of acres that want men; and while there remains anything which prevents the men who want the land from having access to it, there is still a problem to be faced. I shall be very much interested to see in what way this Government proposes to face that problem. I have a way of dealing with it, but I doubt very much whether my method would be acceptable to the Government. I am not wedded to any particular scheme, although having a preference for one over others. Yet I am most anxious to see the question faced vigorously, and with a determination to solve it. Because every question that faces us—the question of revenue, the question of the establishment of industries, the question of defence, the question of our very existence as a Commonwealth—depends primarily upon the settlement of this one great question.

Mr. KENNEDY.—This Parliament cannot intervene in the matter of land settlement.

Mr. JOHNSON. — I do not see why it cannot. There is nothing in the Constitution, so far as I have been able to discover, which prevents the Commonwealth Government from making a suggestion to the States, or to prevent mutual co-operation between the States and the Commonwealth.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Commonwealth cannot get a little bit of land that it wants for one purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I see the point of the honorable member's remark. But the Commonwealth Government can get any amount of land—perhaps more suitable than the “bit” referred to by the honorable member—for the purpose of establishing the Federal Capital. The Treasurer, in his Budget speech, goes on to say—

The States have all these agencies. They have railways, mines, and lands. Now it occurs to us that if the States and the Commonwealth would work together in regard to this matter, recognising that they have a common interest, something very satisfactory might be achieved. It seems to me that the Commonwealth should select the immigrants and bring them to Australia on terms to be arranged, and that the States should provide land for them, and finance them through the land bank.

To my mind, a proposal to finance these immigrants through the agency of a land bank is most objectionable, savouring too much of the socialistic idea of the establishment of a State bank.

Mr. GROOM.—Would the honorable member prefer an out-and-out grant?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I would prefer that the immigrants who come to this country should not require to be financed by a land bank, but should be of the class who, at the present time, are emigrating to America and Canada, with means of their own.

Mr. GROOM.—In Canada is not some assistance given?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Some assistance is, I understand, given.

Mr. GROOM.—Does the honorable member not agree with some assistance being given?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not think assistance should be given unless under very exceptional circumstances. The immigrants we desire are of the farmer class, who are anxious to find new places of settlement, and who have means to start for themselves, only requiring proper facilities in the way of assistance in selecting land, in the removal of burdensome taxes on the requisites of their industry, in cheap means of transit to market, and other conveniences which minister to comfort and success. But if we get a class of paupers into the country, who rely entirely on the State to finance them, I am afraid that, in the long run, we shall find them flocking into the cities, and helping to swell the already large army of unemployed.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Surely the honorable member does not say a man is a pauper because he has not a lot of capital?

Mr. JOHNSON.—It is not necessary for an immigrant to have a lot of capital for the purposes of small settlement, which I think is the best, similar to what we find in Japan—

Mr. MAUGER.—What does the honorable member call "small"?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not desire a class of immigrants whose only object is to add field to field and acre to acre, simply for the purpose of obtaining large estates, and emulating the style of the lord of the manor. Those are not the men we want, but men who are anxious to secure a homestead, and form family groups of settlement.

Mr. GROOM.—Is it not desirable that we should assist such men to acquire homesteads?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Certainly; but, in my opinion, there are in England at the present time men of that type in sufficient numbers who have capital enough to start in a small way. If such people desire to come to this country, they might be assisted by means of reduced rates of passage, and in a variety of other ways. Such a class as this is preferable to a class which is practically pauperized before leaving the old country for our shores. I would not even debar men of very limited means indeed from coming here, provided they had the other essential qualifications, and also provided we could be certain that, after their arrival, they would go into the country and develop our resources in the way originally intended. But we have no means of knowing that the immigrants who come would do so; and if we have much of the kind of legislation we have been having recently, which has tended to denude the country districts of the agricultural labouring population, and to attract them to the cities by means of minimum wages, and other artificial methods of remunerating labour, the only result will be that the immigrants, instead of going out, and helping to develop our natural resources in the rural districts, will simply, as I say, join the ranks of the large army of unemployed in the cities.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Does the honorable member object to a minimum wage?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I think the minimum wage is one of the most absurd laws ever passed. What it has had the effect of doing is to make the minimum wage the maximum.

Mr. MAUGER.—Not in a single instance.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It is driving altogether out of employment men who otherwise might have been able to earn what is now the minimum wage, and it is bringing the wages of the highest skilled men to the minimum level.

Mr. MAUGER.—Does the honorable member not know that not even the average wage is the minimum wage?

Mr. JOHNSON.—In New South Wales I have the assurances of employers of labour—

Mr. MAUGER.—Get the official returns.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I think I know as much of this subject as the honorable member is likely to be able to tell me.

Mr. MAUGER.—If the honorable member says that the minimum wage is the maximum, he knows nothing about the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Then that settles it. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports claims a monopoly of all such knowledge, and no one else can possibly know anything about the matter. Coming now to the Estimates, I see there is an item of metals and machinery, from which the estimated revenue is £445,000. That is an item on which we ought, I think, to have a little information. What I desire to know, and what the Treasurer has not explained, is whether this estimate of nearly half-a-million is based on the normal values of metals and machinery imported, or whether it is based on a possible inflation of values by the Minister of Trade and Customs, or his subordinate officers. It would be interesting to have the information, because we have lately had some little experience, in connexion with harvesters, of what may be done in this direction. While speaking on the item of metals and machinery, I wish to say a few words on the subject of those harvesters. I hope that this principle of the Minister taking on himself the right to assess the value of imported machinery will not be acted upon in the future. I hope that the practice of officers of the Department, in attempting to get the Minister to make assessments of values, will be discouraged, not only by this House, but by the Government when this House is no longer sitting. As I pointed out the other day, if the Ministry had the audacity to raise the duties on machinery, behind the back of Parliament, when Parliament is actually sitting, how much more likely are the Ministry to carry that audacity to greater lengths, when Parliament is in recess, and is no longer in a position to bring the acts of the Minister under review.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—That is very unkind.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It may be unkind, but it is a very necessary thing to say. It was unkind of the Minister to try to ruin—perhaps he did not intend to do so, but the effect would be just the same—a deserving firm of importers, who had been conferring very great benefit on the farmers of this country by importing harvesters.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They are pure philanthropists!

Mr. JOHNSON. — They are quite as much entitled to be considered philanthropists as are McKay and Company. At any rate, their philanthropy is actuated by no less worthy considerations than is the philanthropy of the manufacturers of the Sunshine Harvester. In this connexion I wish to refer to the Canadian report, and to the action of the Collector of Customs for Victoria. It will be remembered that a number of invoices from the Massey-Harris Company were, on the initiative of Mr. McKay, submitted to the Comptroller-General of Customs for consideration, with a view to raising the valuation of these harvesters for purposes of duty at the port of entry in the Commonwealth. Action was taken on the following letter from Mr. McKay, dated 14th June, 1905, in which the writer says—

The American export price is still less than mine, but I would suggest that you would fix the duty on future lots at £63, plus 10 per cent., which would bring the cost over the landed cost in Italy of 5ft. machines (which is the size imported here), the freight being somewhat more to Australia than Genoa. Our American friends will probably be importing at an early date, and I ask you to give this matter early attention. Would it not be advisable to charge duty as mentioned above, and let the onus of disproof fall on the importer.

I say that is a most impudent suggestion on the part of Mr. McKay. What right has he, or any other person, to go as a rival manufacturer of these articles to the Comptroller-General of Customs and tell him what he should do in regard to the valuation of these goods at the port of entry? If the Comptroller-General of Customs had done his duty, he would have told Mr. McKay to mind his own business. That is the reply which should have been given to that gentleman's letter. But what did he do? Did he stand on the dignity of his position and assert his right to be the best judge of the action he should take in his position as Comptroller-General of Customs? Not at all; instead of doing that he tamely bends the knee to Mr. McKay, and immediately starts to put his suggestion into execution. Acting upon the suggestion, which virtually amounted to positive dictation and direction, he collected a number of invoices of the Massey-Harris Company, which he sent to Canada with a request that the Commissioner of Customs there should go through them and give him information as to what was the fair market value of Massey-Harris harvesters in Canada. From the papers which were laid on the library table, we have seen that the Commissioner of Customs in Canada gave these invoices to a special inspector, with instructions to make a full inquiry. After full and complete investigation as to the ruling prices in Canada, a report was furnished absolutely favorable to the Massey-Harris Company, and confirmed the valuation set out in their invoices. Prior to this report from Canada, the following report from Mr. Smart, the Collector of Customs in Victoria, was submitted to the Comptroller-General:—

Upon careful investigation and examination of the books of the Massey-Harris Company, I am satisfied that the invoice price for stripper-harvesters, viz., $183 (about £36 2s. 6d.), with $2

(8s. 4d.) extra for poles and adjustments, represents a fair wholesale market value of these machines.

That was the opinion of Mr. Smart himself.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That was not the last opinion he gave.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That was the opinion he gave before, and, I presume, he had then as much knowledge as when he gave a different opinion later.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is not to be presumed at all.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Yes it is, or else he would not have made that minute. I should like to know whether any pressure was brought to bear on Mr. Smart to induce him to alter his opinion later.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Who by?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I should like to know whether any pressure was brought to bear on him by the Minister of Trade and Customs, or any one else.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Why does not the honorable member say that he suspects the Minister, and then prove his justification.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I should like this information, because it seems to be a most remarkable thing that, shortly after making this report, a report which was amply confirmed by that received from the Canadian Commissioner of Customs, Mr. Smart should alter his opinion. In the face of the Canadian confirmation of his first report, I should like to know what new light was thrown on the subject, and what new evidence was brought forward to induce Mr. Smart to vary his original report, with a view to increasing the alleged value of these machines for dutiable purposes at these ports.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Why does not the honorable member speak out like a man, and not make insinuations?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Why does not the Minister act like a man, and not use the power of his position to injure unjustly the business of a reputable firm for the pecuniary advantage of a rival in business? I say that it is an abuse of his position as Minister of Trade and Customs for the honorable gentleman to go into that office, and, behind the back of Parliament, artificially raise the duties on these articles. That is a great abuse of the Minister's position, and there has also been a gross abuse of the powers of the officers under him.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Does the honorable member say that I ever saw Mr. Smart on the subject? It is cowardly to make these insinuations.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I say that the action of the Minister calls for very strong comment, and I am prepared to pursue the matter further.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I rise to a point of order. The Minister of Trade and Customs has just now, in effect, called the honorable member for Lang a coward. I am sure that that is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN.—I ask the honorable gentleman to withdraw that statement.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—At the desire of the Chairman, I withdraw the statement.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable gentleman may be perfectly sure that he will not prevent me saying what I think it my duty to say, whether what I say affects him or not. I say that the honorable gentleman's action in this matter calls for the most severe condemnation we can give to it.

Mr. KENNEDY.—We heard something about this before.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have read what Mr. Smart reported prior to the report from the Canadian Commissioner coming to hand.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Canadian Commissioner will not give information, and the honorable member knows it.

Mr. JOHNSON.—He confirms Mr. Smart's statement as to the probable value of these machines. I am surprised that the honorable member for Moira, as a farmer's representative, should take the stand which he does in this matter, because it certainly will not assist the farmers.

Mr. KENNEDY.—When they require assistance they will not go to swindling importers to get it.

Mr. JOHNSON.—No; but apparently, according to the honorable member, they will go to monopolist manufacturers to get mulct in heavier charges than they would have to pay to any firm of importers.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They know the philanthropy of the importers.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The best way we can secure to the farmer the benefit of cheapness is to allow the freest competition in the supply of these articles, and not to bolster up any individual manufacturer or any monopoly of the manufacture of those things which the farmer has to use. Above all things, we should consider the interests of the farmer, because he is the backbone of the country. Anything that will assist him in his production is worthy of the most serious consideration by members of this House. Anything that militates against his production by increasing the cost of the implements he has to use, should also receive our serious consideration, with a view to removing all the difficulties that lie in his way.

Mr. KENNEDY.—We have heard something like that before.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable member will hear it again, and he cannot hear it too often for his own good, or for the good of those whom he represents. What is required is the freest possible competition in the manufacture and importation of these goods, so that the farmer may be able to get them at the cheapest possible price.

Mr. KENNEDY.—How many farmers are there in the honorable member's constituency?

Mr. JOHNSON.—And not at the exorbitant rates which must follow the establishment of monopolies. I have been to some extent drawn off the track by these interruptions, and I will now go back to Mr. Smart's report on the Canadian report. Mr. Smart reports on 6th October, 1904—

I am of opinion that the invoice value shown by the Massey-Harris Company for harvesters is correct. The value is about £12 in excess of the International Harvester Company's values for similar machines, which would be a reasonable profit.

Then he goes on to say—

Previous analyses of Massey-Harris values for other machines have resulted satisfactorily for the firm.

Mr. Smart's statement is based not only on the valuation of the machines then, but also upon his experience of the relations of the Department with this firm, which the honorable member for Moira has, in the most unwarrantable fashion, stigmatized as a swindling firm.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is not correct. What I said was that the farmers do not expect philanthropy from swindling importers. I did not designate any firm.

Mr. JOHNSON.—But, when the interjection was made, I was referring to the Massey-Harris Company.

Mr. KENNEDY.—If the cap fits that company, they may wear it; but I did not designate them.

The CHAIRMAN.—I would point out to the honorable member for Lang that it is not necessary to take notice of interjec-tions, and I would also ask honorable members to abstain from interrupting the speaker.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Some interjections are of such a character that one can hardly pass them by.

The CHAIRMAN.—I would remind the honorable member that no notice is taken in the official report of interjections to which the speaker does not reply.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Mr. Smart's declaration that previous analyses of the values of other Massey-Harris machines had resulted satisfactorily to the firm, is high testimony to the honour and integrity of the company, and shows that it cannot be properly designated a swindling importing firm. In speaking on this matter, I have no personal bias, because I know no one connected with either the Massey-Harris Company, or their business rivals. I am dealing with the facts simply as they are disclosed in the papers. When the Estimates are under discussion, I intend to give an opportunity for further debate on this matter by moving reductions in the salaries of both the Comptroller-General and the Victorian Collector of Customs, because I consider it necessary to let these officers know that it is the business of Parliament to increase taxation, and that Parliament will not tolerate any attempt by officials to usurp its functions, or to arrogate powers which it was never intended that they should possess.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is their business to protect the revenue.

Mr. JOHNSON.—There are provisions in the Customs Act which give them ample powers for the protection of the revenue without resorting to the extreme course of increasing valuations. I know that they acted under one of the sections of the Act; but I take it that that section was intended to be used by the Minister with the greatest discretion possible, and the manner in which it has been used shows the unwisdom of clothing Ministers with too wide discretionary powers. The time may come when a free-trade Minister will be in office, and what would the honorable member for Moira and others, who support the action of the present Minister in increasing duties, do if such a Minister decreased duties?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Surely, the honorable member does not hope to see a free-trade Minister in power again?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I trust that I may see the day when the protectionist fallacy will have been relegated to the limbo of the forgotten and unhonoured past, to which many ancient superstitions have already been consigned, although it, the most ancient of them all, still survives. I am confident that when the lands of this country are open to free settlement, and when our people enjoy the benefits of complete freedom of exchange, we shall not be troubled with the unemployed question, and union labels, tariffs, and other artificial but ineffective means of raising wages and increasing avenues of employment will be considered unnecessary. Coming now to the sugar bounty question, I wish to say that I shall fight against the continuance of the bounty with all the strength at my command. Although the bounty was given only for a limited period, there is now an agitation, before the expiration of the period, for its continuance for a further term, which clearly shows the truth of my remark on the Manufactures Encouragement Bill a few days ago, that, once a bounty is given, there is no certainty of its ever being repealed. No doubt, if we grant a bounty for the encouragement of the production of iron, the iron-workers, like the sugar-growers, will, towards the termination of the period for which the bounty is to operate, cry out that their industry will die unless encouraged by a continuation of the bounty. In this matter I disagree with the remarks of the honorable member for South Sydney, who this afternoon said he would be prepared to support the continuation of this bonus for another five years, provided it were fixed on a diminishing scale. The honorable member must know that when this bonus was decided on in the first place, there was a time limit fixed; and it is only reasonable to suppose that what is happening now in the demand for a continuation, will happen again as soon as the further period of five years is about to expire. We shall have the bonus with us for all time, because, on the self-same grounds, demands will be made for its extension, whenever it is proposed that it shall be discontinued. Honorable members who now vote for a further extension of the term in the belief that at the end of that term the bonus will disappear, will vote on premises which are altogether wrong, as proved by our past experience.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member is against all bonuses?

Mr. JOHNSON.—No, not all bonuses. I can conceive circumstances when, in the interests of the nation, a bonus might be very useful and desirable. But this particular industry does not comply with any of the conditions which I have in my mental vision at the present time.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Would the honorable member vote for the bonus on a diminishing scale?

Mr. JOHNSON.—No; if we have an Act of Parliament declaring that a bonus shall be paid for a certain time only, I am prepared to see that Act carried into effect. But, so far as my vote is concerned, it will not be given for any further extension. As I have already said, if we give a bonus to one industry, every industry has a right to the same privilege, and if we give bonuses all round, the industries are simply in the same position they would be in if no bonuses at all were given.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I suppose the honorable member knows that in the absence of a bonus the industry will drift into the hands of black labour?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not believe that the industry will drift into the hands of black labour, seeing that before any bonus at all was given, all the sugar grown in New South Wales was grown by white labour. I see from page 6 of the Estimates that, while the estimate for 1904-5 was £100,000, the expenditure was £121,408, and that the estimate for this year is £146,000, showing an increase of £24,592. Last year the expenditure was £21,408 in excess of the estimate, and the question arises, what guarantee have we that the estimate of £146,000 this year will prove sufficient? May we not reasonably expect to see on next year's Estimates a further amount added in view of the excess of expenditure this year? Is it not reasonable to anticipate that that will be the case, in view of the fact that the estimate last year was exceeded by £21,408? It has been suggested that the sugar bonus is necessary in order to obtain a white labour standard of wages. It may, or may not, be the case that the bonus is required for this purpose; but it must be remembered that coloured labour is not always the cheapest. I came across an instance of that the other day in the city of Melbourne, when, in conversation with a well-known manufacturer of furniture, I ascertained that the best and most expensive furniture in his establishment is made by Chinese labour. The manufacturer, who is a protectionist, told me that the wages of the Chinese workmen are higher than the wages of the white workmen employed in the same trade—that, in some cases, the Chinese will not work for the wages of the white man.

Mr. GROOM.—Did the manufacturer give the honorable member any idea of the rate of wages he pays to the Chinese?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I intend to get some further information from this manufacturer, and I shall be glad to place it before honorable members.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Is the case cited not the exception which proves the rule?

Mr. JOHNSON.—No; the manufacturer told me that, in preparing an estimate for some furniture to be supplied to the State Government, there was a stipulation that the furniture had to be made by European labour, and he suggested to his son the advisability of giving two estimates, one for European labour and the other for Chinese labour. In making out the estimate, the manufacturer found that it would cost from 16 per cent. to 20 per cent. more to have the furniture made by Chinese labour than it would to have it made by European labour. I am giving honorable members the benefit of a protectionist manufacturer's own statement in the city of Melbourne.

Mr. CHANTER.—What is his name?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not know whether I am at liberty to disclose the name, but the honorable member for New England was with me when the statement was made.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The manufacturer made no secret of the statement.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The statement was not asked for, but was volunteered, and of the furniture that was shown to us in the establishment, the highest class was made by Chinese labour. I do not quote this instance as an advocate of Chinese labour, because I advocate a White Australia.

Mr. CHANTER.—Has the honorable member any objection to give the manufacturer's name?

Mr. JOHNSON.—If I had the manufacturer's permission, I should gladly do so, but at the present moment I do not know whether or not the conversation was regarded as confidential. The information might, moreover, be used for the purpose of boycotting and persecuting the manufacturer.

Mr. GROOM.—Some of the manufacturing firms in Victoria put a stamp on their furniture to show that it is made by European labour only.

Mr. JOHNSON.—And manufacturers stamp the furniture so as to show when it is made by Chinese labour.

Mr. CROUCH.—That is compulsory under the Victorian Factories Act.

Mr. JOHNSON.—In any case, the most highly finished and expensive furniture in that establishment was made by Chinese labour.

Mr. RONALD.—Because the Chinese have driven Europeans out of the trade.

Mr. JOHNSON.—If so, it must have been because of superior skill, since it could not have been on account of lower wages, for the Chinese wages were higher. I was, at the time, getting an estimate from the manufacturer for an article of furniture for myself, and I found that the expense depended largely on whether I wanted the article made by Chinese labour or by European labour—that, if by the latter, I could get it made more cheaply. I merely give this instance to show that coloured labour is not always synonymous with cheap labour.

Mr. RONALD.—I can assure the honorable member that coloured labour is the cheapest in Melbourne.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is not so in this particular line of industry, according to this protectionist manufacturer and large employer of labour. I give honorable members the statement just as it was given to me; and if, at a later stage, I find I am at liberty to do so, I shall be happy to give the name of the manufacturer.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Does the honorable member seriously contend that, as a rule, Chinese labour is dearer than white labour?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not. I have not said so. What I say is that those who contend that the payment of this bonus is necessary for the purpose of maintaining the white man's standard of wages lose sight of the fact that occasionally the rate of wages paid to the coloured labourer is not always necessarily lower than that given to the white labourer. In the case that I have quoted it was actually higher.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member would not favour the payment of a bonus even for the purpose of employing the white labourer as against the black?

Mr. JOHNSON.—No. I would devise some other scheme, for we have the knowledge that the bonus has not decreased the employment of black labour, or the quantity of sugar grown by black labour. Imported sugar pays a duty of £6 a ton, and Australian sugar an excise of £3 per ton. Upon Australian sugar that is produced exclusively by white labour a rebate of £2 a ton is allowed, so that the amount of duty which is actually paid is only £1 per ton. In other words, a protection of £5 per ton is extended to Australian sugar which is produced exclusively by white labour. I wish now to deal with the question of the consumption of sugar within the Commonwealth. At the present time our consumption is about 180,000 tons per annum. Consequently, if the whole of it were produced by white labour, the revenue from that source would be only £180,000. In this connexion I should like to quote a few remarks by the right honorable gentleman. He says—as will be seen by reference to page 1218 of Hansard—

I now come to a very important matter—the sugar question. As we add to our local production of sugar, our receipts from Customs duties upon that article must fall off, and our Excise receipts increase. The import duty amounts to £6 per ton, and the Excise duty to £3 per ton. In 1902-3, the Customs duties upon imported sugar amounted to £502,931, whereas, according to the estimate for the current year, they will reach a total of only £93,000.

Later on, the Treasurer states—

The supply of locally-grown sugar has nearly overtaken the demand, and very shortly the industry will enter upon a new phase, inasmuch as our producers will have to look for markets abroad, and engage in competition with the whole world. It is estimated that at the end of the current financial year—in about ten months time—47,500 acres of sugar-cane will be cultivated by white labour.

If the local demand will soon be overtaken by our own production, and if our sugar-growers have to export their surplus to the markets of the world, how will they get on seeing that the price of sugar outside of Australia will be regulated by the price of the article produced in competition with all other countries? Under these conditions, I fail to see how the industry can stand, and how our sugar-growers can become exporters, except at very great cost to the Commonwealth. Later on, on page 1219 of Hansard, the Treasurer said—of the bonus policy. In this connexion it is proposed to introduce Bills extending the bounty for five years after the expiration of the present term—that is until 1911—upon the same terms as those contained in the existing Act.

As I have already stated, I entertain a very great objection to the continuance of this bounty system, because I am satisfied that just as the sugar-growers are crying out for an extension of the period during which it shall be operative, so they will raise another outcry—before the term for which the bounty is renewed has expired—for a further continuance of that policy. I should like to know where this thing is going to end. When the honorable member for South Sydney declared that he was willing to support the proposal to extend the bounty for a further period of five years, provided that it absolutely ceased at the end of that term, I think he must have overlooked the fact that, at its termination, the question is bound to be brought forward again just as it is being brought forward now. Year after year we see that the sum placed upon the Estimates for the payment of the bounty is increasing. In the end, it must involve the people of the Commonwealth in very heavy taxation.

Mr. EWING.—The excise pays for the bonus.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The excise will be wiped out at the end of a certain term, and we shall have to face the prospect of a continually diminishing revenue from that source.

Mr. EWING.—Every State is getting more by way of excise than it is paying by way of bounty.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The Vice-President of the Executive Council will have an opportunity of explaining that matter at a later stage. I shall be pleased to have some light shed upon this matter by the luminous mind of the honorable gentleman. I am sure that the Committee will be very glad to hear his opinions, seeing that he represents a district in which the sugar industry is one of very considerable importance. Perhaps, as a member of the Government, he will break through this conspiracy of silence which has been characteristic of the Ministry and its supporters on all these most important matters affecting the vital interests of the people of Australia. The annual consumption of sugar in Australia is about 180,000 tons, so that if all the sugar were grown with white labour the revenue derived from that source at £1 per ton—the Excise duty less the rebate—would amount to £180,000. For the year 1904-5 the revenue collected on imported and Australian sugar was £628,511; and for the year 1902-3 it was £780,448. The amount of revenue we should get if all sugar were imported would be £1,280,000. These figures show that through the policy of granting a bonus and levying Excise duty, we are actually suffering a loss of about £100,000 per annum. Looking at the question from a revenue stand-point, it would pay us very much better if we were to import all the sugar we need.

Mr. PAGE. — If the honorable member had his way, there would be no one employed in the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOHNSON. — That is where the honorable member makes a mistake. There is a difference between encouraging employment in natural channels, which require no State coddling by tariffs or bonuses, and giving employment in industries which it is declared can only be sustained by artificial stimulus.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN. — What does everybody else say?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I cannot help what anybody else says. My view is that it is far better to give employment in developing the natural resources of the Commonwealth without artificial aid — without penalizing all other branches of industry for the purpose of benefiting a few specially singled out for this preferential treatment. Looking at the question from the stand-point of fairness and equity, we have no right to distinguish between one source of production and another. If we intend to give a bounty to the sugar industry, we ought to give a bounty to the farming, fruit, and other industries. As a matter of fact, the bounty to the sugar industry penalizes other industries which, from a national stand-point, are equally important.

Mr. MAUGER.—Is not the bounty to the sugar industry mixed up with the White Australia policy?

Mr. JOHNSON.—It has no right to be mixed up with what is purely a racial, and not a fiscal, policy. This attempt to mix up the two questions so as to make them interdependent is an absolutely wrong proceeding. The question of the Tariff and the question of revenue should be separated from the question of race. Surely there are other means which could be devised for preserving a White Australia? It does not even preserve a White Australia; but, even if it did, it could only do so at the expense of permanently injuring several industries of first importance to the present and future prosperity of the Commonwealth. As a matter of fact, the consumer does not derive any benefit from the grant of this bounty. He has to pay the same price for his sugar, whether it is grown by black or white labour, or whether it is imported. Notwithstanding the immense sums paid in bounties to the sugar-growers in Queensland, the taxpayer, in addition to having to pay the bounty, is called upon as a consumer to pay an inordinately heavy price for his sugar. Before Federation, Queensland had to grow her sugar in competition with the rest of the world; and, after supplying her own market, she had to supply the markets of the other States in competition with the rest of the world.

Mr. PAGE.—For what purpose does the honorable member think Queensland joined the Federation?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not know. If she simply entered the Federation for the purpose of putting her hand into the pockets of the other States, she acted from a very unworthy motive. But I do not believe that her people acted from that sordid motive. When Sir Edmund Barton talked about the advantages of Federation to the people of New South Wales, and asked them to join the union, he did not say that Queensland desired to join for the purpose of putting her hands into the pockets of New South Wales and the other States.

Mr. PAGE.—Nor did she. She wanted to get into the markets of the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Sir Edmund Barton talked about the glorious unity of race under the Southern Cross, and all that kind of high-flown sentiment. That was the kind of pabulum he served up to the electors of New South Wales.

Mr. PAGE.—It is a strange thing that the majority took it.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It was never represented to the people of New South Wales that Queensland regarded New South Wales in the light of a milch cow for the northern State. The sugar question was never put before them. Whatever arguments may have been put before the electors of Queensland to induce them to join the Federation from a sordid motive—from the prospect of monetary gain at the expense of the rest of the community, and of other industries of equal importance in the Commonwealth—certainly they were carefully hidden from the electors of New South Wales. If honorable members were called upon to pay these bounties out of their own pockets, what would they think of the proposal? As business men they would repudiate any such suggestion, and laugh it to scorn. Nevertheless, they do not hesitate to ask Parliament to pay money out of the public Treasury for a similar purpose—a proposal which they would repudiate in their private capacities.

Mr. PAGE.—Who pays it if the taxpayer does not?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I say that the taxpayer ought not to be called upon to pay it. He is not only called upon to pay the bounty, but also to pay an exorbitant price for his sugar.

Mr. PAGE. — The taxpayers are quite willing to pay it.

Mr. JOHNSON.—They have never been consulted.

Mr. PAGE.—They have been consulted at each election, and say they are quite willing.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable member is possessed of a singularly fertile imagination. Another point is that this additional bounty of £2 per ton for white-grown sugar has not lessened the production of sugar grown by black labour. That is one of the peculiar features of this business. The bounty was asked for in order to promote the growth of sugar by white labour.

Mr. PAGE.—And it is doing so.

Mr. JOHNSON. — I doubt that very much, because from the evidence before us we find that just as much sugar is grown by black labour as was the case previously.

Mr. PAGE.—But what about the white-grown sugar?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Certainly, more sugar is grown by white labour than previously, but as a matter of fact, the amount paid in bounty for the encouragement of the growth of sugar by white labour has not had the effect of decreasing the quantity grown by black labour. Indeed, we have evidence from some of the north coast districts of New South Wales that it is not profitable to continue to grow sugar under unfavorable conditions. People there were in the habit of growing sugar in an unsuitable climate; but frosts intervened to divert their attention to other more suitable industries, and we now find that many of the farmers are turning their energies and their talents to a more profitable direction by converting their lands into dairy farms. It would be far better if the people in Queensland who are trying to produce sugar by the stimulus of the bounty would turn to some more profitable means of production, where they would not require artificial aids. I object to bounties on principle, except perhaps for some special purpose of great national concern where the interests of the whole community are clearly served by such means; and then the payment requires to be hedged round with very great safeguards in the public interest.

Mr. PAGE.—Does not the honorable member think that the present Minister of Customs would hedge the payments round with sufficient safeguards?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I feel certain that the present Minister of Customs would do everything he could to raise the taxes imposed on the people of the Commonwealth. But I have yet to learn whether the honorable member for Maranoa is to be numbered amongst those who will assist him in those operations. We have to consider the effect of these bounties on other industries in Victoria, New South Wales, and Tasmania.

Mr. MAUGER.—The people of Victoria are not objecting to them.

Mr. JOHNSON.—If they are not objecting they must be a very patient and long-suffering people. It must be remembered that the people of Victoria are so inured to this system of State coddling, that their moral sense has become absolutely blunted to the wrong and the robbery involved in it. But if the people of Victoria have not complained, those in other States have done so. That is notably the case in Tasmania, where, I am informed, the duty amounts to a tax on the fruit-grower of about £9 per acre. We, as a Parliament, have no right whatever to place one State at a disadvantage as compared with another, or one section of people at a disadvantage in comparison with other sections.

Mr. FISHER.—How much protection does the fruit-grower get?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have it on the authority of one of the Tasmanian representatives, who knows the industry pretty well, that about £9 per acre is the penalty the fruit-grower is called upon to bear for the purpose of bolstering up the Queensland sugar-growers.

Mr. FISHER.—The fruit-growers have a protection of 1½d. per lb. on jams and jellies.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I will show what it means to the jam-producer. If the honorable member has any fresh light to throw upon the subject I shall be happy to hear him when I have finished. I prefer to deal with the subject in my own way, and to expose the shamelessness, the robbery involved, the injustice to every other section of the community, and the absolute indefensibility of the sugar bounty, which, I am sorry to say, this Government has been so weak as to agree to continue under pressure.

Mr. FISHER.—There was no pressure.

Mr. TUDOR.—What did the honorable member's Government do about this matter?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Unfortunately, I have never had a Government, but I can promise the honorable member that if ever I do have a Government, this kind of business will receive very scant treatment at my hands.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable member may be very sorry for those words some day!

Mr. JOHNSON.—If the situation ever arises that I have to eat my words as to matters of principle before forming a Government, I shall relinquish the task from the very jump. Let me take the question of jam production, to which the honorable member for Wide Bay has alluded, and let me show the cost of the bounty on an acre of plums before they can be converted into jam. The bulk of the plums that are grown are produced for that purpose. But before they can be converted into jam they have to bear a burden of £18 5s. 8d. per acre.

Mr. FISHER.—The bounty has not increased the price of sugar by a fraction of a penny.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It has not decreased the cost of sugar by a fraction of a penny, nor has it decreased the quantity of sugar grown by black labour. I am as much in favour of a White Australia as is any member of the Labour Party, but I do not think that that end will be accomplished by means of a bonus and of Tariff conditions such as are now in operation.

Mr. MAUGER.—How would the honorable member accomplish the object in view?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not propose to go into that question now. At another time I shall probably have a chance to do so. Reverting again to the question of the extent to which the jam-making industry is burdened at present, I would point out that the growers of peaches have to pay £19 5s. 8d. per acre; the growers of apricots have to pay £20 5s. per acre, and the growers of quinces £24 per acre before their fruit can be converted into jam. Why should the sugar industry be subsidized at the expense of others, who are called upon to pay large sums of money in the form of taxation? By penalizing the industries to which I have referred, we are inflicting an injustice on them which, as representatives of the people, we have no right to do. In this connexion I may quote a paragraph from the speech of the right honorable member for Balaclava, delivered when he was the Treasurer in a previous Administration. He said—

New South Wales has undoubtedly received very large benefit from the sugar rebate, because before Federation they were growing nearly all their sugar by the aid of white labour, and, consequently, the bonus has been a little God-send to them.

Even according to the statement of the right honorable member for Balaclava, a most ardent protectionist, the sugar grown in New South Wales prior to Federation was produced by white labour, and it is to be presumed that the growers were not conducting their operations at any loss. Therefore, the bonus has been a little God-send to them. They have, during the last three years, received £114,000 out of the public Treasury, not because they have produced more sugar, but because they have gone on doing exactly what they were doing before any bonus was granted.

Mr. FISHER.—It is only fair to remind the honorable member that the sugar-growers of New South Wales had the benefit of the heavy protective duty that was retained by a free-trade Government.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The duty had been considerably reduced, and they did not have the advantage of the bonus. We could produce anything in Australia, whether the conditions were favorable or not. We could produce ice-fields and raise Polar bears in Northern Queensland, but what would it cost to do so? In cold countries, products natural to the tropics could be grown, and, similarly, the products of the Arctic regions could be raised in tropical countries, provided that those interested were prepared to pay the cost.

Why, however, should we devote our attention to fostering unnatural industries to the neglect of those which can be carried on without any special assistance? Passing away from the question of the bonus, I wish to refer to our Territory in New Guinea. We shall have to provide for the needs of the people who are settled there, and for the development of the Territory in a somewhat better fashion than has hitherto been attempted. At page 1207 of Hansard, the Treasurer is reported as having said—

There is an expenditure also in regard to our only Possession—British New Guinea—of £20,000. We have taken over this Territory, and have promised to provide £20,000 a year for its government. It is a great responsibility, though perhaps we have not so far felt the burden.

Then he proceeded to refer to the area of the Territory and to other details, and, at a later stage, remarked—

I am sorry to say that I have not the most recent statistics, as, owing to the few facilities afforded for communication with the Territory, it is difficult to get information, but I am able to inform honorable members that the value of the imports for 1903-4 amounted to £77,000.

Mr. WILKS.—Mostly grog.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I believe a considerable portion of it was.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No, it was not. Grog represented only £3,700.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The bulk of revenue is derived from other sources. In reply to an interjection by the honorable member for Franklin as to the number of officials being sufficient to supply the information with regard to New Guinea, the Treasurer said—

That is so, but I do not think it is their fault that it has not been supplied. The difficulty is due, I think, to the inadequate mail service between the mainland and the Territory.

Here we have an indication that the residents of New Guinea are not being properly served in the matter of the mail service. In fact, so bad is the service that we cannot obtain particulars such as I think should be before us when we are called upon to consider matters which have a direct bearing on the future of the Possession. It is essential that an efficient and regular mail service should be established between the mainland and New Guinea.

Mr. EWING.—Would the honorable member be prepared to give a bonus in order to secure it?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not think that a bonus would be necessary; but, as I have already said, under some circumstances bonuses are defensible, especially when we are dealing with matters of great national concern, or are seeking for means by which we can promote the development of our territory and encourage settlement. It would be interesting to know what is to be done in the way of developing British New Guinea, but I can find in the Treasurer's speech no indication of a policy on the subject having been determined on by the Government.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The first thing to do is to pass the Bill.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Provision has already been made on the Estimates for a vote of £20,000 to carry on the work of government in that Territory. I hope that the Treasurer, when he comes to reply to the debate, will tell us what is proposed in this regard, and also what is to be done in connexion with produce grown in the Territory after settlement, being encouraged, has taken place there. Are we going to deal with produce imported from the Territory in the same way as we deal with that imported from the New Hebrides? Are we going to place barriers in the way of producers in New Guinea getting their products to our markets? These are matters on which we are entitled to have some information, and I hope that, in considering the question, the Ministry will give attention to the advisability of permitting rebates of duties on produce grown in British New Guinea, or any of the adjacent islands, by British settlers, not from the fiscal stand-point, but with a view of trying to enlarge our own Territory, and to people it with an industrious Australian or British population. I have dealt very briefly with this subject, and I now pass on to the question of defence, which I regard, next to the question of population, as being the most urgent matter with which this Parliament has to deal. In my view, the two questions are of the first importance, and are co-related. I am not one of those who would advocate the starving of the defences, but I desire that the money voted shall be expended in the right direction. My view of the question is that we have to look to the Imperial Navy for our first line of defence. Our second line of defence must be the proper equipment and fortification of our harbors and rivers, and coastal defence generally; and our last line of defence should be our land forces. It seems to me from such a study of the Estimates as I have been able to make, without that complete and full information which we might have expected from the Treasurer, that the great bulk of our expenditure is in connexion with our land forces.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What do honorable members want now?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We want definite information about something.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Yes, we desire some definite statement as to what is proposed to be done. Dealing with the question of naval expenditure, I find that the right honorable gentleman at page 1206 of Hansard is reported to have said—

For this year it is estimated that the naval and military expenditure will amount to £591,431, being £32,928 in excess of the actual expenditure last year, but £696 less than last year's vote. In addition, there are the following items to be considered:—Naval agreement, £200,000, representing the amount payable for a full year; works and buildings and rent, £30,055; miscellaneous, £2,529; making a total expenditure of £824,015. Besides there is extraordinary expenditure represented by additions in new works, £57,516; arms and special armament and equipment, £140,000; making a total of £197,516; whereas last year this expenditure amounted to £200,320.

The item of £140,000 for arms and special armament and equipment is one on which we should have complete information.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is complete information in the Estimates and Budget papers.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I think the right honorable gentleman might have explained these items when making his Budget speech. He ought to have shown why this expenditure is necessary.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—So I do, further on.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have not seen the explanation so far, and I apologise if the right honorable gentleman has furnished it, and I have inadvertently overlooked it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is all before honorable members, every bit of it.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I admit that the Estimates are before us, and while they are all very well in their way, they require a certain amount of explanation as regards details. Questions may arise when the items come before us for consideration in detail later on, and they will then have to be explained more fully than they have been so far. All that discussion might have been saved, if the Treasurer had supplied us with this information in the beginning. Dealing with the expenditure under the headings fortifications, barracks, rifle ranges, and drill halls, I find that the total amount required for New South Wales is £5,718. Some of this is for new works and some for additions to existing works. The total for Victoria under the same headings is £4,726; Queensland, £1,325; South Australia, £549; Tasmania, £303; and Western Australia, £21,292. To put these figures in another way, the amount proposed to be expended under these heads in Western Australia is nearly twice as much as that proposed to be expended in all the other States put together.

Mr. KELLY.—And it is being expended at the wrong port; it should be expended at King George's Sound.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I believe the observation of the honorable member for Wentworth to be a very pertinent one. The explanation given of the proposed expenditure in Western Australia by the Treasurer is as follows:—

The fortifications at Fremantle, which are to consist of two forts—one at Arthur's Head and one at North Fremantle—are being pushed on with, and the efficiency of existing fortifications is being improved. The difficulty with regard to fortifications is that improvements are constantly being required, and that a fort which may be efficient to-day is considered to be out of date in a few years time. We have had experience to that effect already in Australia. There can, I think, be no doubt that a much larger expenditure will be necessary in order to place our fortifications on an up-to-date footing, as also with regard to our naval defence.

Mr. MAUGER.—Is it in order to read from the Hansard report of this session?

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON.—To continue the quotation—

At the present time the people of Australia, who are a self-reliant and progressive people—as I shall be able to show before I sit down—pay only one-fifteenth per head of the amount paid by the people of the mother country for their naval defence. That being so, the matter only requires to be put before them in a way that is acceptable to them, when I feel sure that it will have the attention that it deserves.

I think that the people of Australia desire to make an adequate contribution towards the upkeep of the Imperial Navy, having regard to the protection which they receive from it, and the interests to be conserved; but if our fortifications become out-of-date when only two or three years old, I should like to know what is the condition of the defences of Sydney and Newcastle, and other places along the coast of New South Wales and of the other States. Although the vast sum of £21,292 is to be expended on two forts in Western Australia, only a comparatively small vote is proposed for the coastal defences of New South Wales and Victoria, although each of these States has a much larger population than that of Western Australia, and has cities which are more exposed to attack. I do not know whether Western Australia is receiving a disproportionate vote because she is represented in the Ministry by the right honorable member for Swan, but the next largest sum on the Estimates for a similar purpose is less than one-fourth of the amount proposed to be voted to Western Australia, and is to be spent in the State of New South Wales, which is very much more populous. If our fortifications are not in a thoroughly satisfactory condition, it is time that we made provision for making them what they should be. I should like to know if provision is made in the Estimates for the purchase and maintenance of submarines, torpedo destroyers, and other means of defence for our harbors and rivers against hostile attacks. Our attention should not be concentrated on our land forces—which constitute our last line of defence—to the neglect of our coastal and naval defences.

MR. KELLY.—As the Government are not able to speak on this subject, they might keep a quorum to listen to those who do speak.

THE CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member, I take it, wishes to direct attention to the state of the Committee. This is the first time that that has been done during the present session, and I wish, therefore, to point out that the Chairman of Committees is not empowered to cause the bells to be rung, the procedure provided for in the Standing Orders being to call in Mr. Speaker. Last session, however, that procedure was by general consent dispensed with. I will, therefore, put the question. Is it the pleasure of the Committee that I cause the bells to be rung?

MR. WILKS.—Hear, hear! Anything to save time. [Quorum formed.]

MR. JOHNSON.—I do not believe in starving the defence vote, so long as the money voted is to be expended for the benefit of the Commonwealth in the most effective and necessary direction. In speaking of the need for looking after our coast defences, I had in mind the fact that there are, I believe, no fewer than sixteen foreign naval stations within easy striking distance of Australia. In considering the Estimates, we ought to keep that fact amongst other facts steadily in view. It is only of late years that Australia has been placed in this position; and it would be a position of serious import to us as a Commonwealth, should Great Britain at any time be involved in war with any of the great European naval powers. Let us hope that we may never see the probability realized, but there is always the possibility that we may be placed in that position at any time; and it is of the first importance that we should be prepared to make adequate provision in our Estimates year by year for the defence of the coast of Australia. So far as I am concerned, I do not grudge any reasonable expenditure for this purpose. There is much matter in these Estimates for hostile criticism; in fact, there is enough material to occupy one for five hours at the very least. But I do not propose to deal with any other subjects at the present time, because I am anxious, as far as I can, to expedite business. Where legitimate expenditure is involved, I shall offer no obstruction to the passing of the Estimates; but where vital principles in which I believe are violated, I shall oppose each item with the full strength of whatever powers I possess. As to the continuation of the sugar bonus, the iron bonus, and proposals of that kind, I declare to the Committee that they must look to me for the strongest opposition. I consider those proposals absolutely wrong in principle. To dip our hands into the public Treasury for the purpose of enriching certain favoured sugar-growers, or other individuals engaged in any particular industry, to the detriment of other producers, and the general disadvantage of the rest of the community, is unjust and wrong, and involves the imposition of wholly unnecessary burdens on the back of the taxpayer.

MR. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I intend in this very devious debate to confine myself to the one subject of the States debts. This is the only opportunity which honorable members have to deal with the important discussion which took place in Hobart last February, and in Melbourne in February, 1904. I conceive that we shall have ample chances hereafter of dealing with the questions of the harvesters, the sugar bonus, defence, and the Public Service; and that the eternal fiscal question, important as it is, need not always be dragged into our debates. I must say that at the Hobart Conference, the Premiers of the different States and the Federal Treasurer appear to have been further apart than they were in February, 1904. The clause for taking over the debts, which was carried at the Treasurers' Conference in Melbourne, in 1904, was struck out at the Conference in Hobart in February, 1905; and, I think, it was properly struck out. The scheme had not been sufficiently matured; and, in other respects, I think the Conference at Hobart achieved great results. The leading men concerned made appreciable advance towards agreement, in that, for instance, they decided on the postponement of the appointment of an Inter-State Commission, so as to save expense.

Mr. WATSON.—Parliament had tacitly agreed to that before.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I was not aware of it; but, at all events, a resolution to that effect was put on record at the Hobart Conference. I may say that at the beginning of Federation I suggested, in an article in the review edited by the honorable and learned member for Parkes, that an Inter-State Commission was not required at present. That idea was scouted by those who then said that both the High Court and the Inter-State Commission were mandatory in the Constitution. The High Court has been established, but now we hear no more about an Inter-State Commission being mandatory, and we get on very well without such a body, by means of a Conference of the heads of the various Railway Departments. With regard to the transferred properties, it appears, as it ought to have appeared from the first, to be more a bookkeeping matter between the States than anything else, though there are practical difficulties as to the valuations. As to the income tax, there has been a resolution carried that there ought to be an alteration of the Constitution for the purpose of making Federal officers and Federal members of Parliament pay the same tax as others; and I cordially concur with that idea, whether it be carried out by means of an alteration in the Constitution or not. As to the States debts, some of us remember the reckless promises made by advocates of the Constitution. The people were assured right and left that there would be a material reduction of interest almost as soon as Federation was established; but those promises have not been carried out, and there does not appear to have been any definite move towards carrying them out, except it were in the discussions to which I have referred. Yet this is a very material point. If we could reduce the interest on our debts of £234,000,000 by 1 per cent., we should reduce the expenditure each year by £2,340,000. Even if we were to reduce the interest by only  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., it would mean a lightening of the burden on our revenue by £1,170,000. If we could only conceive how much of our difficulties would be avoided, or how we should be able to do good in the way of enterprises and works all over the Commonwealth, by the saving of nearly one million and a quarter per annum, we should recognise at once that any effort and ingenuity would be justified in solving the problem. Such a saving would be a great relief in view of the ever-increasing expenditure and diminishing receipts of the Federation. We shall shortly be in a very uneasy corner—

Mr. WILKS.—The Treasurer stated in his Budget that we had not enough revenue to meet the interest charges.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I think that the honorable member must have misunderstood the Treasurer. What the right honorable gentleman said was that the interest charges amount to more than the net Customs and Excise revenue returned to the States.

Mr. WILKS.—Exactly.

Mr. HIGGINS. — Of course the deficiency is made up by the States from their own systems of taxation. I have read with very great interest the contributions to the discussion of this subject by the right honorable member for Balaclava, the honorable member for Kooyong, Mr. Irvine, and Mr. Speaker, and I do not think that the paper written by Mr. Speaker, which was submitted to the Treasurers' Conference, held in Melbourne in February, 1904, has received half the attention which it deserves. That paper covered only three pages, but I do not find that in the discussion which took place either in Hobart or in Melbourne any direct reference was made to what Mr. Speaker pointed out.

Mr. EWING.—What was the date of that contribution?

Mr. HIGGINS.—It was written in February, 1904. No doubt there is an excuse for the fact that it has not received the attention which it deserves, because the problem of the transfer of the States debts presents so many faces that each individual is very likely to look only at one face of it, and to ignore the others. I wish to divide what I have to say on the matter into comment on the position as regards the existing debts, and as regards future borrowings, and then to deal with the constitutional restrictions upon what we should like to do. In Australia we have debts which are repayable at all kinds of dates from the present time till 1950. Indeed, since the Constitution came into force some new debts have been incurred which will not mature till 1952. Unless some change is effected the States will continue to incur more and more debts, and we shall obtain no reduction in interest charges. The States will continue to borrow for themselves, and the rate of interest will remain as it is. The position I take up is that the only way in which we can induce a bondholder to accept a lower rate of interest is by offering him a bond that is more desirable in other respects. After all, that is a mere truism. We may have bonds which are more desirable in other respects, and in return for them we may secure a reduced rate of interest, in the same way as British consols by virtue of the position of British credit bear only 2½ per cent. interest, whereas a South American Republic can borrow money only by paying 8 per cent. or 10 per cent.

Mr. WILKS.—Because there is a danger of repudiation in that case.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That fact is obvious. The way in which we can make our bonds more desirable to the present bondholders is first by giving them a better guarantee or security—the bonds being on a sounder basis — and, secondly, by making the bonds or stock more negotiable, more useful for more purposes, and more attractive to more persons. It seems to me that we can achieve both of these results. We can give the Federal backing—we can put the Federal credit behind the debt. We can also give bondholders a more desirable bond by having a uniform stock, and by making it—if necessary—interminable, so that it can be redeemed only by purchase in the market, and we can create a sinking fund which shall be securely placed in the hands of independent trustees.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What is the Federal backing worth just now?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I shall deal with that matter in due course. It must be remembered that we have a separate contract with every bondholder, and when the Constitution declares that we may take over the States' debts, it does not mean that we may simply say to our bondholders—"We will become your debtor now in lieu of the States, and at such interest as we choose to pay." We have a separate contract with every bondholder, and any exchange from a State to a Federal bond must be voluntary on both sides. For instance, we cannot make the holder of a £100 Tasmanian bond at 4 per cent.—there is a Tasmanian loan of £1,000,000 which will fall due in 1911—exchange it for another bond carrying only 3½ per cent. interest. We must offer some inducement to him, if we wish to effect an exchange. The point put by Mr. Speaker is as follows:—

The utmost care, as I then pointed out, must be taken to avoid the giving of any Commonwealth guarantee in respect of any State stock, as to either principal or interest, without securing for the Commonwealth from the holders of the State stock some adequate return for the added value which must follow the guarantee, which added value should be secured for the people of the Commonwealth.

He then points out how in Canada, which is the nearest analogous case that we can get to the Commonwealth, because in Canada there is a Federation and there are Provinces—there is always a big margin between the price of Dominion stock carrying, say, 3 per cent., and any provincial stock bearing the same rate of interest. So it is with all the percentages. Mr. Speaker continues—

Judging from precedent in Canada and elsewhere, and under normal conditions, the difference in market values between average State stocks and Commonwealth stocks of similar denomination may be expected to be in a tight market about 8 or 9 per cent.

At present we have a tight market, although it is getting easier every day—and in an easy one from 4 per cent. to 6 per cent., though, of course, the stocks of different States might vary over a range of even 3 per cent. or 4 per cent.

Assuming that Quebec stock was worth £95 in the market, Dominion stock for the same term, and at the same rate of interest would be worth about £103, or £8 more in a tight market. Mr. Speaker goes on to say—

To illustrate, dealing first with 3 per cent. stocks:—While Commonwealth stock at 3 per cent. for a certain term should command par (and Canadian Dominion 3 per cents. are even now quoted in London at  $\frac{3}{4}$ ths over par, and have been much higher),

Dominion stocks were £100 15s. at the time mentioned here—

New South Wales stock of similar denomination (i.e., same rate of interest and term) are on the same day (31st July, 1903) quoted also in London at £89, while the stocks of the other Australian States are quoted at about the same figure.

So that on the same day, bearing the same rate of interest, and for the same term, you have Canadian stock worth £100, and New South Wales stock worth only £89. I referred to the last quotations I could find, and obtained some figures which I beg honorable members to consider. From The Times of the 24th July last, I find that on the 21st July, Canadian 3 per cents. were £97 buyers, and £98 sellers, that is to say, they could be got for about £97 10s. On the same date, Quebec 3 per cents. were £87 buyers, and £89 sellers. There was a difference of nearly £10 on each £100 between the value of Dominion stock and that of Quebec stock.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Perhaps that was because some interest became due in one case and not in the other.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I took stocks for the same term and excluded those cases in which it was ex-dividend.

Mr. GLYNN.—In Canada, there are very few provincial debts. Most of the provincial assets were taken over with the debts.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I admit that the honorable and learned member will be able to find differences, in some cases considerable and in other cases not very serious. But I am coming to the nearest analogy I can get. We have no Commonwealth stock, and we cannot say at the present time what Commonwealth stock for a certain term and bearing a certain rate of interest would fetch in the market. At the same time, we have good reason to believe that as the value of Canadian stock is much higher in the market than the value of the stock of any province, so our Federal stock would be worth more in the market than the stock of any one of the States, however great. I find that while on the same date Canadian 3 per cents. were £97 buyers, and £98 sellers, New South Wales 3 per cents. were £87 buyers, and £88 sellers, and Victoria 3 per cents. were £87 buyers, and £88 sellers. I may mention that Canadian, New South Wales, and Victorian stocks are stocks in which trustees may invest.

Mr. GLYNN.—It is not so many years since Canadian and New South Wales 3 per cents. were almost at the same figure.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am speaking of their value at the present time.

Mr. GLYNN.—Still, Canada was a Federation then.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The mere fact of there being a Federation affects the value of stocks in the case of our States. On the same date, New Zealand 3 per cents. were £87 10s. buyers, and £88 10s. sellers. On the same date, Canadian  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cents. were £100 buyers, and £102 sellers, while Nova Scotia  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cents. were £94 buyers, and £95 sellers.

Mr. WATSON.—Something would be due to the fact that Canada borrows very sparingly, I think.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Her debt is £55,000,000 at the present time.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes, but proportionately it is much smaller than our debt.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It must be recollected that the Provinces of Canada borrow very sparingly, too. I admit frankly that we shall find differences; but the point I wish to establish is that the mere fact of the credit of all Australia being behind the Tasmanian debt would give value to that debt. That is enough for my purpose.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The price of Australian stock has been very much higher. Three per cents. have been up to £101.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Of course, the Treasurer, who was Premier of Western Australia for such a long time, will recognise that the value of all stocks has fallen since the South African war. We all know that our States are absolutely solvent. What we have to consider is not what we know, but what other persons think. In London it would add to the value of a stock in the market very considerably if it were known that the credit of all Australia was behind that stock. The very name of Australia, although this may be sentimental, would have an effect on the stock, and gives it a value. Persons who wished to invest in these stocks would get skilled advisors connected with the exchange, who would look into the matter, and see that the Commonwealth had unlimited powers of taxation, both direct and indirect; that it had exclusive power to impose Customs and Excise duties, which, of course, is the most flexible weapon of taxation. That, of itself, would give tremendous strength to any Federal stock that might be offered. If, in addition to these advantages, you were to make the stock interminable, you would attract a great many persons who have long trusts to fulfil, and who do not wish to be continually thinking of how to replace their investments.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Interminable on both sides?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes. Of course, I should prefer, if it were possible, that we should have the option of terminating the stock, and paying off the debt.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is often done.

Mr. HIGGINS.—At the same time, on the balance of advantages you would find it best to make the stock interminable, because you would get more persons to compete for it. A great many persons do not wish to be called upon suddenly to find new investments.

Mr. WATSON.—With interminable stock, a sinking fund would appreciate the value.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member has hit the point. In the old days here, we used to stiffen the shares of certain banks and companies by buying them in the market. But this is perfectly legitimate in regard to stocks. If you have a debt of £100 to pay, and you buy it for £99, it is good business. Supposing that the stock were interminable, a man would feel, "I have not to part with the stock until I wish to sell it." At the same time, there would always be a sufficient quantity of stock in the market, in purchasing which the sinking fund could be used. The mere existence of a sinking fund would be a tremendous strength to the stock. The advisors of the investors would see that. The sinking fund could be vested in trustees, and many would be attracted to exchange. Another advantage is that the larger the stock the more valuable it would be. It is a very curious thing that in most matters the larger the quantity of stuff you have the smaller price you can command. But in the case of stock, the larger the quantity you have the more valuable it is. If in London a man of business wishes to get credit, what does he do? He simply makes use of the fact that he can get British stock and British consols at a moment's notice, as long as he has the money. He often gets a bill discounted by attaching thereto the stock certificate, which is held until he repays, and he pays at a very low rate of interest in the meantime. Supposing that he got the bill discounted at 1 or 1½ per cent., he would make 2½ per cent. from the stock which he holds as a debt of Great Britain. A large uniform interminable stock would be of tremendous value in the market. There are, briefly speaking, two classes of people who go in for stock. One is the ordinary investor—trustees and the like; the other is the speculator and dealer, who wants stock for financial purposes. We want to attract the latter class as well as the former. I say that a large stock, uniform, always to be had in plenty, easily understood, and not to be repaid, except by purchase, which could be used freely for discount and advance purposes, would attract a number of people whom State bonds never attract now. Just to give an instance—assume that a Tasmanian bond at 4 per cent., becoming due in 1911, is worth £99.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I think that the importance of the figures which are being quoted by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne entitles him to have a quorum present. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. HIGGINS.—Of course, my assumption with regard to the Tasmanian bond is merely hypothetical. Assume that a Commonwealth bond at 3½ per cent. was worth £100. That is quite possible. There is, then, a difference of £1 between the value of the Tasmanian bond at 4 per cent. and the Commonwealth bond at 3½ per cent. But there are very many who would prefer to exchange the Tasmanian bond for the Commonwealth stock, because for each £100 they would get £1 of profit, the difference between £99 and £100; and, on the other side, we should reduce the interest, and Tasmania would be relieved to the extent of ½ per cent. She would be paying 3½ per cent. instead of 4 per cent. for the remainder of the term of the loan. There are many people who would be glad to exchange on that basis, which would mean a profit to both sides; but there are many who would not, or could not, perhaps, because their trusts would not let them. But, at the same time, there would be a considerable saving of interest. Take another instance. Take a Queensland loan. There is, in 1915, a Queensland loan coming due of £11,405,300 — a huge loan to meet. The interest is £456,212 a year. If a Queensland 4 per cent. bond were worth £100 at par, and the Commonwealth 3½ per cent. bond were £102, exchange would be very probable; because the man who held the State bond would get a bond worth £102 for his £100, and, at the same time, the interest would be reduced by £57,000 a year. Queensland would be relieved of interest liabilities to that extent. What has been proposed by the ex-Treasurer? What he has been fighting for is to take over all the debts of the States at once, and to give the Federal backing of the bill for nothing. So that we should, as it were, be indorsing the bills of Tasmania, and of Queensland, and of the other States for nothing, and the Commonwealth would have to look to the States to indemnify it against all those payments. That is to say, as to the Tasmanian loan, the holder would get his 4 per cent. as before, but guaranteed by the Commonwealth; and if the Commonwealth backing made the Tasmanian bond rise from £99 in value to £105 in value, the holder would get £6 for nothing. That would be simply madness, and I am amazed that the late Treasurer—whose absence to-day we all deplore—should lend his name and the weight of his authority to a proposal for giving the Federal backing for nothing.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Did not the Hobart Conference consider this question?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I cannot find, in any part of the report of the proceedings of the Hobart Conference, any reference to this point, which was first raised in the Convention by our present Speaker.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I mean that it considered the general question.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The general question, yes. If we look now at what the ex-Treasurer proposed with regard to the debts—it was not accepted, I may say, by the Hobart Conference—it was “that section 87 of the Constitution be amended by extending the term of ten years therein mentioned to thirty years.” That is to say, he proposed to extend the operation of the Braddon section till the year 1931.

Mr. WILKS.—The States representatives now require it to be interminable.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes, they have asked for that. But I desire honorable members to keep their minds directed to what the ex-Treasurer proposed, because it is all one whole. He wants to extend the operation of the Braddon section till 1931, and thereby to postpone the problem till the next generation. The next part of his proposal is that, “subject to the foregoing and following stipulations the whole of the State debts be taken over by the Commonwealth, when arrangements can be made.” That is clear enough—to take over the whole of the debts. The ex-Treasurer was working upon the basis of section 105 of the Constitution, which permits the taking over of the whole of the debts, or else a part relatively to population.

Mr. CHANTER.—The whole of the debts to date, or the debts when the Commonwealth was formed?

Mr. HIGGINS.—The whole to date. He holds that we are not to confine ourselves to the debts that existed at the time of the formation of the Commonwealth, but ought to include the £32,000,000 which have been borrowed since the Commonwealth was established. And I agree with him. But, at the same time, I want honorable members to observe that the ex-Treasurer proposes an amendment of the Constitution. I hope that that will be borne in mind when I come, a little further on, to deal with my own suggestion.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Could we not do it with the consent of the States, without an amendment of the Constitution?

Mr. HIGGINS.—No, we could not. The extension of the Braddon section to 1931 would leave the Federal Parliament hampered in its Tariff arrangements as well as in its development for another generation.

Mr. WILKS.—It would hamper the whole fiscal policy.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Exactly. We should have to collect in Customs and Excise duties £4 for every £1 that we required, and I think that we should exhibit lamentable weakness if we extended the operation of the Braddon section for one year longer than is provided for under the Constitution. That section was intended to operate for ten years merely to give us breathing time, and an opportunity to look about us; and surely it will be a scandalous thing if we are not in a position to bring forward some better device after we have had an opportunity to ascertain how our finances shape themselves. In spite of that provision in the Constitution, the three-fourths of the Customs duties which is returned to the States is not sufficient to enable them to meet the interest on their loans. The interest payable on the whole of the States loans is £8,363,564, and the revenue returned to the States for the year ended 30th June last was £7,142,564. The result is that the States have had to make up a deficiency of £1,221,000. What security does the right honorable member for Balaclava propose for the repayment of this deficiency by the States to the Commonwealth in the event of the Commonwealth taking over the whole of the States debts? He says, "Let us have a special Appropriation Act for each State." Prima facie the Act which a State Parliament makes may be repealed by that Parliament, and therefore the right honorable gentleman says that provision must be made that these Appropriation Acts shall not be repealed. An arrangement of that kind would involve the amendment of each of the States Constitutions, and to induce six States to pass an identical amendment of the Constitution, and an identical Appropriation Act would be almost a Herculean task. It would be much better if, in place of taking over the States debts between the present time and 1911, when the Braddon section will cease to operate, the debts were taken over gradually, as the market would permit, and the bond-holders were willing to adopt the Commonwealth instead of the State as its debtor. We should watch the market and make use of the opportunities that might present themselves from time to time. The transference of the States debts to the Federal power would relieve the States Treasurers of apprehension far more effectively than would the extension of the operation of the Braddon section. The best way to relieve the States Treasurers of apprehension would be to put the burden of the States debts on the Commonwealth, and that end could be achieved only gradually, if at all. The right honorable member for Balaclava proposes these amendments and others under his scheme.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What chance would the Commonwealth Treasurer have of buying stocks on favorable terms if the bond-holders knew that he wanted them? If they knew the Treasurer wanted to buy, they would hold out for bigger prices.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We all know that the bond-holders would naturally hold out for the biggest price they could get, but the Treasurer would not be under any obligation to buy at any particular time.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But would the bond-holders sell?

Mr. HIGGINS.—This is no novelty. What I am suggesting is done continually with interminable stocks. If you have a sinking fund, you can watch the market, and buy in as opportunity offers through agents. If you have a huge amount of debt, as we have in Australia, it is easy to operate in that way, and to buy up stocks as opportunities may present themselves, because there are always people who wish to realize their investments. If you have to pay £100, and you find that you can buy up the debt for £99, it is good business to buy it.

Mr. WATSON.—If you have the cash.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes; and a sinking fund would provide the cash. I understand that the right honorable member for Balaclava proposes to amend the six States Constitutions in identically the same way in three different matters, and in addition to amend the Federal Constitution in three or four distinct matters.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—What does the present Treasurer propose to do?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I have absolute confidence that when the present Treasurer has had time to bring his good sense to bear, he will put forward a good proposal, but I think it would be absurd to expect him to present to us a cut-and-dried formula after having occupied the position of Treasurer for only about six weeks. The honorable and learned member for Angas very properly called attention to the doubts which exist as to the exact powers conferred by section 105 of the Constitution. Having regard to what has occurred since Federation, I have doubts as to whether that section could be applied at all, because some of the States have borrowed further, and some have renewed old loans since the Federation was established. It is quite certain that the section cannot be applied to the £32,000,000 which has been borrowed since Federation; and I think I have established the fact that if we are to deal effectively with the problem of the States debts, some amendment will be required. I feel that upon a matter in which no strong party feeling need be exhibited, and in which it should be easy to arrive at a consensus of opinion among the financial statesmen who are responsible to the people of Australia, we could induce the public, even under the conditions prescribed in the Constitution, to sanction an amendment. There need be no party feeling exhibited in this matter, because it stands upon a footing utterly different from that of the fiscal question; and surely we should be able to devise some scheme to which all parties could agree without any acrimony, and put it before the public and ask them to sanction it. There must be an amendment of the Constitution, or else Tasmania and all the other States will have to go on paying the interest on their debts as at present. Now I desire to deal with the subject of future borrowing. The right honorable member for Balaclava says that all moneys required by the States upon loan should be raised through the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not understand that the honorable and learned member has put forward any plan.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I shall do so afterwards, and shall afford the right honorable gentleman an opportunity to criticise it. In clauses 3 and 6 of his proposal, the right honorable member for Balaclava proposes that the States shall not borrow in London except through the Federal Treasurer; but that if a State so desires, it shall be at liberty to raise loans within the Commonwealth. In clause 8 he provides that any debt incurred by a State within the Commonwealth may at or before maturity be taken over by the Commonwealth Treasurer as if it were a transferred debt. The proposal, which is perfectly right, would involve an amendment of the Constitution. We ought to have only one borrower in London, and that should be the Federal power. It is of the very essence of Federation that we should present one face to the foe and one front to the financial world.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Would that exclude all borrowing by the States?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes, in London. It is important that in London investors should have to deal with only one borrower. Of course I admit that if this proposal were carried out it would diminish the importance of the States Ministries to some extent, and I am sorry to see, arising out of the discussion which took place at Hobart, too much of the spirit which is expressed in the words, "Oh, we shall be very small potatoes if we cannot go to London, and float loans for ourselves." We have to look at Australia from a different point of view. If it is necessary in the interests of Australia that we should present only one front to the financiers in London, let that be done; and I think the people of Australia will back us up in doing it. We should be able to show people in London that we have an unbounded power of taxation, direct and indirect; and we should be able to show the advantage of having one great uniform Australian stock. Then, again, the fear of States Premiers that they would have to come cap in hand to the Federal Treasurer for leave to borrow for public works, is quite exaggerated. I think that was the view taken by the Premier of New South Wales particularly. He said, "Am I to go cap in hand to the Federal Treasurer to ask leave to borrow, and have him criticising my proposals for the construction of public works"? The late Treasurer never proposed that. The right honorable gentleman had no idea in proposing to leave the matter to the Federal Treasurer that he should say whether this or that public work should be constructed. All he wanted to provide for was that he should have complete security that the Federal Treasurer would be paid any excess of interest which could not be met from the borrowing State's share of Customs and Excise revenue. That is what he desired. In just the same way, a mortgagee, when he is asked to lend money, as a rule does not ask what the money is to be spent for, but sees that he has good security for his loan. So it would be with the Federal Treasurer. And what he would say would be, "So long as I can see my way to a reasonable certainty that I shall get back any deficiency of interest from the State, of course I shall borrow for you." The right honorable member for Balaclava tried hard and manfully to secure the assent of the six Premiers to this proposal. Apparently he seemed to think that he could not go on with his proposal for further borrowing, unless he had the assent of the six Premiers. But I feel that if he waits for the assent of the six, he will never get it. I think that it will be the duty of the Federal Treasurer, if he can secure the assent even of four out of the six, to go on with the scheme. I fully agree that it is very advisable that the Federal Treasurer should consult the wishes of the States Ministers. I fully agree that it is the duty of the Federal Treasurer, if he can, to get them all to assent to any policy he proposes with regard to finance; but at the same time, there is a certain limit. The Constitution gives the Federal Parliament, and the Federal Ministry, certain powers and responsibilities, and I feel sure that if the people of Australia are asked to sanction the giving of certain powers to the Federal Treasurer which will result in benefit, in the reduction of taxation, to the whole of the States of Australia, they will give that power in spite of any State Ministry. The late Federal Treasurer's proposal No. 9, is as to a sinking fund to which he refers in this way—

Upon all loans raised or renewed there shall be provided a sinking fund of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Provided, that where a sinking fund already exists in a State, the total, whether arising therefrom or in respect of loans or renewals, shall not be required to exceed  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum.

I may say that that seems very sound. I think that the amplest powers should also be given to buy the stock of a State or of the Commonwealth at any time when the market is favorable. It is apparent, from what I have said, that there must be, if the scheme of the late Treasurer is to be carried into effect, several formidable constitutional changes. There will further be no reduction of existing debts, and there will be a present made to existing bondholders. But if we are to change the Constitution, let us have a change which will cover the whole ground. What is required is a radical change of section 105, giving the Federal Treasurer the power of bargaining with individual bondholders. That is the essence of the whole change that is required. What is wanted is not a swooping down of the Federal Treasurer to take over all the debts of the States, but power to bargain with individual bondholders.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Is that the only amendment of section 105 which the honorable and learned gentleman would suggest?

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is the main part of it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Does the honorable and learned gentleman propose the taking over of a part of the debts, or of all the loans of the States?

Mr. HIGGINS.—What I propose would mean that the Treasurer would have the power to select and take over such debts or such portions of debts as he thought advisable, when a good opportunity offered to do so.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I understand that; but is he to take over a proportionate amount of the debts of each State, or to take over the whole of the debts?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I do not at all agree that there is any need for equality in taking over the debts of the States. At the Convention there was much jealousy between the States which was quite unfounded. It was held that, as one State had borrowed more than another, it would be unfair to take over the debts of a State that had borrowed to the extent of £81 per head of its population, and also to take over the whole of the debts of a State which had borrowed, say, only to the extent of £47 per head of its population. There are these differences in the Commonwealth. Victoria has borrowed £47 per head of its population, whilst Queensland has borrowed £81 per head. It was thought, therefore, after long discussion, that there must be some means provided to secure equality in taking over the debts of the States, whether the whole of the debts were to be taken over, or only a rateable proportion of them. However, these things will not work. My feeling is that we shall not find a Federal Treasurer, in the face of the Commonwealth Parliament, ever venturing to do any injustice to any of the States. He will be watched closely as to what he is doing, and will feel in duty bound not to do anything that will not be best for all the States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned gentleman has just asserted that he will, unless he is watched.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It must be understood that there would be nothing to be gained by any inequitable arrangement of the kind, because the State concerned would still have to find the interest. The only point is that in one year the Treasurer might take over more of her debts from Queensland than he would take from Tasmania. In this way Queensland might secure a greater reduction of interest payment than Tasmania. That is all; and there would be no putting of an additional burden upon any State. It would simply mean less benefit to the State which has least taken over.

Mr. WATSON.—The present constitutional provision will not work anyhow.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The proposal which I submitted through the medium of the Sydney Daily Telegraph and the Melbourne Age was stated in this way:—

That an amendment of the Federal Constitution should be submitted to the Federal Parliament, and the Federated States, in the manner prescribed in section 128 of the Constitution. Substantially it should provide for the repeal of section 105 and the substitution of a new section. The new section should enable the Federal Treasurer from time to time to give any holder of State debentures Australian stock in exchange.

I think the Treasurer will agree that a uniform Australian stock will be the proper thing. I go on to say—

This power should apply to all State debts, whether existing on the 1st January, 1901, or not. The Federal Treasurer should be empowered to borrow money for a State at the request of the State Treasurer, and to keep the amount borrowed in the same way as a debt taken over for the State. The latter part of the existing section should be re-enacted, making it incumbent on the States to indemnify the Commonwealth in respect of the debts taken over, and enabling the Commonwealth to retain the interest from any surplus revenue payable to the respective States.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There would not be likely to be any.

Mr. HIGGINS.—In some States there would be.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We might say that there are none now, except in the case of Western Australia, perhaps.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If you reduced the interest, there would be a surplus. At all events, it would be practically re-enacting the last part of section 105. I say further—

Then should follow such provisions as may, on advice, be found advisable for securing payment to the Commonwealth of any deficiency in the interest, or for stopping the mouths of critics of our finances, or for making the Australian stock safe and attractive.

I can see, from what the right honorable member for Balaclava said, that he has had skilled advice from London as to what precautions are to be taken in regard to Australian stock, and I should lean a good deal upon that advice. He expects a good deal from confining the borrowing to the Federal Government. I then proceed—

Either enact that the revenue of every State shall be deemed to be permanently and irrevocably appropriated to the payment of any deficiencies; or enact that in case of failure to pay a deficiency, the Federal Treasurer may put in a receiver of the gross railway revenue until his claim be satisfied. Also provide that from the time that any debt is taken over for a State, or that a State Treasurer requests the Federal Treasurer to borrow for him, regular payments, at a rate prescribed, be made into a sinking fund to be kept under proper control, and that the State revenue be irrevocably appropriated for the purpose; and that the States shall have no power thereafter to borrow outside Australia except through the Federal Treasurer.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is pretty stiff.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes; but it is worth while being stiff, if you can thereby make our stock higher in price on the London market.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would be difficult to enforce.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I refer only to a change in the Constitution. There would be no enforcing, but merely a carrying out of what the Constitution provides.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—To put in a receiver would be stiff.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I agree that the power to put in a receiver is beyond anything that we have known, and it is only because the right honorable member for Balaclava informed the assembled Premiers that he was advised that the mere power would be of great advantage to Australian stock, and would improve our credit, that I should support it.

Mr. GROOM.—The existence of the power would render unnecessary its exercise.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The existence of the power is the important thing; the exercise of it is very unlikely. As in the story of the coon and the colonel, when the coon in the tree, knowing the colonel to be a dead shot, said, "Don't shoot; I'll come down"; so in this case, if there were power to put in a receiver, a State would see its way clear to make up any deficiency. I have only said that you should have such provision as might be found from expert advice to be essential, and useful, for the purpose of making your Australian stock valuable. The Braddon provision cannot be continued, though, I think, that the ex-Minister of Home Affairs was the only one present at the Conference last February who saw clearly the position as I have been putting it. He is reported, at page 52 of the report of the Conference, to have said—

If there is in future, after the Braddon clause expires, danger of great extravagance in Commonwealth expenditure, then it is well for the States that they should be secure; and the best way to be secure is to put certain present State liabilities upon the Commonwealth. In the meantime, there may be this security given to the States, which I think they are entitled to ask for, that during the period whilst the liability is growing, but before sufficient debts have been transferred for interest to absorb the surplus revenue, there should be an extension of the Braddon clause. I believe it to be a reasonable proposal; but, at the same time, I am of opinion that the Federal Parliament might take a different view. The most solid vote in that Parliament is the most strongly opposed to in any way curtail the powers of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is a million and a half short at the present time.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I think a million and a quarter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—More than that this year.

Mr. WATSON.—That deficiency hardly represents the true position, because it is not a lump deficiency when you come to the bookkeeping provisions.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The book-keeping provisions do not expire in October, 1906; but the Federal Parliament may alter them from that date, and the Braddon provision will be in the same position in the year 1911. My proposal is to leave it as it stands until the financial circumstances of the States more nearly approximate. It would not be fair to Western Australia that £428,397 of her revenue should be given to the more needy States; but if the distribution among the States were on a population basis, Western Australia would get during 1905-6, £428,397 less than she would get under the present system.

Mr. WILKS.—How would Tasmania come out?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Tasmania, South Australia, and Queensland, under a per capita system of distribution, would get more than they get now.

Mr. WATSON.—That is because there are so many abstainers from beer and tobacco in Tasmania.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is owing to the intoxication of the Western Australians that that State has so good a revenue. At Kalgoorlie I have seen men four-deep at a bar. It is that kind of thing which swells the revenue of which the Treasurer boasts so much.

Mr. CARPENTER.—They are consuming less in Western Australia now.

Mr. HIGGINS.—In the course of time the conditions of the States will become more alike. The Hon. John Henry, who was one of the most thoughtful members of the Convention, and whose words on finance I value very much, does not, perhaps because he is not a lawyer, look at the constitutional points involved as some of us would, but his mind has been running in the same way. He says—

It will always be in the interests of the States to do their borrowing in London through the Federal Treasurer, and it is obviously desirable, in the interests of all Australia, that there should be no conflict in so important a matter between State and Federal Treasurers. There is every probability (taking Canada as an example) that our Federal bonds would rank higher in London than State bonds. To secure an advantage for the people of Australia in this and other matters will be the aim of Federal and State Treasurers alike. As to when a conversion of our State bonds into Federal bonds can be effected, and how to our advantage, is a question for future settlement under the advice of experts. The holders of our State bonds will not part, unless to their advantage, and the difficulty is, how are we to reduce our annual interest charge by conversion and give the holders of our bonds an inducement to part?

That is exactly the problem I have tried to meet. Many people would be very glad to exchange State bonds for Federal bonds if they could only see that the value in the market of the Commonwealth bonds was something greater than that of the bonds of the State—if they could see that the holder of Commonwealth bonds had a certain advantage, and that, although we reduced the interest, they could get £101 for a bond which otherwise would be worth only £100. And it must be remembered that we should not pay the extra £1, but that would be paid by the buyer.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Has the honorable and learned member given any attention to the Canadian fixed-payment system?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes, but I do not wish to confuse that with the matter I am now considering. I may say that an arrangement of that sort is, I think, possible consistently with the position taken up by the right honorable member for Balaclava, as well as with my position.

Mr. WATSON.—The difficulty is to arrive at the sum to be fixed.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I do not wish, as I say, to mix up my proposal with a very wide question, which would lead to a great deal of extra controversy, and which may be discussed independently. We have a most difficult financial position to face. It is quite certain that with the present taxation the one-fourth of the Customs and Excise revenue is not sufficient for the Commonwealth, if we have regard to expenditure which is contemplated. We have, problematically perhaps, a transcontinental railway to provide for, in addition to old-age pensions, and penny postage. We certainly have to provide for a Federal Capital, and for the undergrounding of telegraph and telephone wires, and new Departments and functions to take over, including quarantine, lighthouses, meteorological matters, and banking. Then we have to provide for a sugar bonus, and bonuses for manufactures, and for a High Commissioner, and we may perhaps have to undertake the locking of the Darling. We have also to provide torpedoes and torpedo destroyers, in addition to the £200,000 for the naval subsidy. We have to pay £50,000 or £60,000 a year for weather telegrams, and there is an increasing Public Service expenditure. At the time of the transition, the Public Service expenditure in the Federal Departments was only £3,733,218, whereas now it is £4,606,273.

Mr. WATSON.—Against that there is an increased revenue in the Post and Telegraph Department.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am glad to hear that, but, at the same time, we cannot expect to get increased revenue without increased expenditure. For my own part, I do not grumble at giving people an ample means of living if they work for us; the King's service ought to be honorable, and, within reasonable limits, a sufficiency ought to be given to every person employed. I am speaking now only as to the facts.

Mr. WATSON.—The increase of expenditure, so far as the Post and Telegraph Department is concerned, is not a net increase.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am very glad to hear it. Debts are becoming payable in the different States. For instance, next year a debt of £2,183,000 will fall due in Victoria; in 1907, debts of over £5,000,000 will fall due in the States; while in 1908 over £7,000,000 of debts are payable. I know perfectly well that the States, which have to meet debts at fixed dates will be subject to a "squeeze," such as Victoria experienced two or three years ago, when debts belonging to that State were converted. Victoria had to carry out the work of conversion in the most unfavorable state of the market ever known; she had to borrow £5,000,000 in the process, and add more than £500,000 to her debt. That is what we cannot stand, and ought not to stand. We ought to set to work at the earliest possible stage to see if we cannot reduce the burden upon our people. I am very glad to say that there is a fact which will give a great deal of confidence in our finances. Some financiers in London, who are by no means in sympathy with present-day views, have been amazed to find that the only party which appears to be increasing in Australia—the Labour Party—is the party which is against borrowing. That is a party which favours sound finance; and but for its aid there would have been a stupid loan floated two years ago in London.

Mr. KELLY.—The Labour Party in New South Wales supported Mr. O'Sullivan for all it was worth.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am now speaking of the Federal Labour Party. The fact I have cited is far-reaching and important, and it has also been observed that since the party I refer to came into power the borrowing on the part of Australia has decreased.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Labour Party will have to borrow when they begin to nationalize industries—the tobacco industry, for instance.

Mr. HIGGINS.—In conclusion I may say that I have never known the present Treasurer fail to master a problem to which he applied his mind. I do not wish to flatter the right honorable gentleman in his presence, but I think that all he has to do is to apply his mind to this problem as he has applied it to novel and grave problems in Western Australia. I am quite sure he will come to a good, practical conclusion, and I hope sincerely he will be able to associate his name permanently with a great scheme for the conversion of Australian debts.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—It is a great relief to honorable members on this side to at last see the conspiracy of silence broken in regard to all matters connected with Government business. We know that the honorable and learned member who has just resumed his seat is not one who can be too easily kept under the Government whip or under Government control. That may, perhaps, be the reason that on this occasion the honorable and learned member has not hesitated to break the general rule and address himself to the House on questions connected with the Budget. It is quite appropriate that the honorable and learned member should have specialized from the Government benches on the question of debts; for we on this side, at any rate, hold that the party on that side of the House is bankrupt in almost everything except the possession of the Treasury benches, and we can only regret that those benches are of such importance in our dealings in this Chamber. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has referred to "the problem of reducing our interest," but I think he would have to rack his brains very considerably if he had to solve the problem of how further to reduce the interest which this House appears to take at present in public affairs.

Mr. WATSON.—While the honorable member for Wentworth is speaking it is difficult to maintain interest.

Mr. KELLY.—I was not indulging in any little badinage; I was referring to the most learned address of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. It certainly does seem strange that in the middle of such a disquisition, containing figures so important, it should have been necessary to wake the Government up to their duty to keep a House. The question to which I propose to devote myself this evening is a question which the Government, to judge from the Treasurer's Budget speech, have evidently not very seriously considered. I refer to the defence question. It will be clear to everybody who has read the Budget speech that the Government have no defence policy. If that fact had not been made sufficiently apparent by the Treasurer's deliverance, I should merely have to refer honorable members to a memorandum which was circulated to-day in regard to the Defence Department. That memorandum, I believe, is intended to carry out the tradition in this Chamber, that a report of the doings of the Department should be circulated each year coincidentally with the delivery of the Budget.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not at all; it is merely intended to explain the Estimates.

Mr. KELLY.—Is it not designed to afford us any information in reference to what is happening in the Department?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No.

Mr. KELLY.—The information which it contains is infinitely more scanty than that which was embodied in the last report. The Committee wish to know something of the workings of the Council of Defence.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That matter is not dealt with by the paper at all.

Mr. KELLY.—No; the paper does not give us the information to which we are entitled. We have had a Council of Defence in existence since January last.

Mr. EWING.—If the honorable member wishes to gain information upon that matter, why does he not ask questions?

Mr. KELLY.—Because the Vice-President of the Executive Council was specially selected for his present office on account of his ability to dodge giving answers to questions, and he accomplishes his task very well. Ministers have been specially placed upon the Council of Defence in order that they may obtain a knowledge of the policy which that body deems it necessary for Australia to adopt in regard to defence matters, and yet, Ministers will not tell us anything in reference to the defence of the Commonwealth. If they will not, or cannot, tell us, surely the Committee, in considering the Estimates, are entitled to some report setting forth the proceedings of the Council of Defence, its recommendations, and what has occurred in the Department since the last Estimates were passed. The scantiness of the report submitted might lead one to suppose that the Government had no intention of circulating it until they were asked to do so by the honorable and learned member for Corinella. I am informed, however, that the report was in print when that request was made. It is distinctly a waste of money to print a report of this character, because it is merely a résumé—and a poor one, too—of the Estimates which are under consideration.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It contains a lot of information, and its compilation involved a deal of trouble.

Mr. KELLY.—I could gather all the information that it contains merely by looking through the Estimates. The Treasurer, at odd moments during the deliverance of his Budget—because his statements were never connected—spoke of the Imperial Navy and of our contribution thereto. But even in regard to that matter, which has been a hobby with the right honorable gentleman, we look in vain for that definiteness which we have a right to expect in a Budget pronouncement. He said—

There can, I think, be no doubt that a much larger expenditure will be necessary in order to place our fortifications on an up-to-date footing, as also with regard to our naval defence. At the present time the people of Australia pay only one-fifteenth per head of the amount paid by the mother country for their naval defence. That being so, the matter only requires to be put before them in a way acceptable to them, when, I feel sure, it will receive the attention it deserves.

For the moment, it looked as if the right honorable gentleman's great Imperial soul was about to lift him beyond all petty considerations of place or dependency upon labour support. It looked as if he were about to throw off all restraint, and roundly chide his masters in the Corner upon their parochial view of an Australian Navy for Australian Defence. However, those who expected such a relapse from the Treasurer were doomed to disappointment, for the very next day he went back upon the view which he had almost definitely expressed in his Budget speech. On the occasion to which I refer.

the deputy leader of the Opposition was speaking, as follows:—

The Treasurer told us last night that he was strongly in favour of Imperial defence, and that we ought to pay more for our defences.

The report proceeds—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not say anything about the Imperial Navy. I am not taking back anything I said, but all that I asserted was, that we should have to spend more on our own defences. I did not say in what way that expenditure should be made.

The following dialogue then occurred:—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Am I to understand—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member is to understand only what I said.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—As the right honorable gentleman refuses to vouchsafe any explanation, I must proceed in my own way. I am indebted to him for his courtesy in declining to assist me to understand what he had in mind.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is all in Hansard.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But Hansard is not available to me at this moment. The right honorable gentleman, at all events, told us distinctly last night that we require to spend more for the purposes of Imperial defence.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—For the purposes of defence.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think the right honorable gentleman used the word "Imperial."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I refer the honorable member to Hansard.

And yet I have just read in Hansard the right honorable gentleman's own words, in which he distinctly mentions what ought to be done in regard to our contribution to the Imperial Navy! I regret two things: first, that, in regard to Imperial defence, he should have gone back upon his statement at such brief notice, and, secondly, that he should have so singularly short a memory of his own words. At any rate, the Treasurer seems to recognise the necessity of an Imperial Navy, even though he obviously lacks the public spirit or the pluck to advocate it for two days together, and so to dare members of the Labour Party in the corner. What the right honorable gentleman seems to lack, however, is an appreciation of what an "Imperial Navy" means, and the immense difficulties in the way of creating one. He seems to think that Australia has merely to pay a few million pounds, and the thing is done. During the course of the Treasurer's speech, some honorable member interjected—

We ought not to pay more for naval defence until we have a voice in deciding in questions of war and peace.

I do not agree with that interjection, but only wish to suggest that the Treasurer's reply was significant. He said—

I have often said that if we wish to have control we must pay, and we have never yet offered to pay our due proportion. I have not the slightest doubt for my own part, although I was sneered at some time ago for saying so, that those who are willing to pay will always find that they will be allowed a good say.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—What did he mean by a "good say"?

Mr. KELLY.—I presume that he meant a "good say" in the management of the navy.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—But we do not desire that.

Mr. KELLY.—The Treasurer seems to think that the whole question of contribution without representation would be solved the moment we paid, because by some miraculous intermediary we should be granted that control to which we would most certainly be entitled—that is, if we paid—not, of course, what we pay now, or three or four times that amount, but a large subsidy per capita or according to the protection we receive.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—They would give us representation in the House of Commons, I suppose.

Mr. KELLY.—I hope nothing of the sort would be necessary, as I shall explain presently. The Treasurer seemed to recognise the dependence which each section of the Empire must necessarily place in every other section when a national crisis came. He recognised, as all thinking men must recognise, that help could not come from member to member of our family unless we controlled the seas in time of war, that the ocean highways are the Empire's lines of communication, and that if those lines be broken no help could come from section to section of the Empire, and that the enemy could, therefore, concentrate at its leisure on each point to be attacked. No doubt the Treasurer recognises, as all honorable members who consider this subject must recognise, that the length of our coastline and the sparseness of our population, which make it impossible to easily concentrate our land forces on threatened points of attack, make it trebly imperative that Australia's battles must be fought out on the sea. I have no doubt that the right honorable gentleman also recognised that the need of each member of our family of nations is identical, and that the effort of all must be put forward unitedly. On this point Captain Mahan says—

To have the greater force and then to divide it, so that the enemy can attack either or both fractions with decisively superior numbers, is the acme of military stupidity; nor is it the less stupid because in practice it has been frequently done.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY. — Where is this enemy to come from?

Mr. KELLY.—That is the opinion of a distinguished countryman of the honorable member.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY. — We have no enemies; we are friendly with the whole world.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What is his country?

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member for Darwin has been a citizen of many States in Australia, and I think of many States in the United States; but I am referring to the country of his birth.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But he is a Canadian.

Mr. KELLY. — I cannot believe that. That is the opinion—and it is obviously founded on the merest common-sense—of the greatest naval authority, whom, I suppose, we have ever had. Recognising, however, all these points, and being as ardently desirous as any honorable member that Australia should soon realize her duties to the Imperial Navy, I cannot see that the position is quite as simple as the Treasurer would have us believe. He tells us to pay our share, and that everything will be all right. The question is, will it be all right? Let us suppose that Australia contributed her fair proportion, and that that doughty Imperialist, Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman, who is very anxious to reduce the naval vote, were in power in England at that particular time. What would be easier than for that statesman to reduce the burden of the English tax-payer by an amount corresponding to that which we had contributed? Consequently, what we had contributed would not be an increase to Imperial protection, but would only be a lightening of the burdens of the British tax-payer. At the present time England undertakes sole responsibility for the naval defence of the Empire, although that certainly is not creditable to her outlying dependencies. Every party in England, however, now recognises this responsibility, although they have different ways of honouring it. But let contributions once begin to come in before any proper basis of contribution or allotment of responsibility is decided, and then what was previously the responsibility of one, infinitely the stronger section, becomes the responsibility, not of all, for there is no responsible head, but of none. Would this failure to allot responsibility conduce to the general security of the Empire? Most obviously not. Then there is the difficulty of contribution without representation—a difficulty that is mainly serious for the way the case may be misrepresented. Persons who take this line of argument point to the loss of the American Colonies by England, and say it was due to the same principle of contribution without representation. These gentlemen are begging the question, for what lost the American Colonies to Great Britain was not voluntary contribution without representation, but enforced contribution without representation. What Australia is asked to do is to voluntarily contribute; she is not compelled to contribute. The principle of compulsion has never been authoritatively even hinted at. But this difficulty will no doubt become a serious one when our contribution is in any way proportionate to the services rendered to us. This question of constituting the Imperial Navy on a true Imperial and representative basis is a problem which must be tackled in the near future, not only by the Imperial authorities, but by the responsible heads of all sections of the British Empire. Then, again, comes the point of how we are to arrive at the best representation of contributors to the Imperial Navy. The problem to the new Imperial authority would be not “How is the money contributed to be used?”—for that would be entirely for the professional executive to decide—but “When is this money to be used?” If we are to have representation on the Empire's councils as to when the money is to be used, it is obvious that the fairest way in which this could be done, if it were possible to be done, would be for us to have representation on its Foreign Councils, that is, the councils that would decide when war should be declared and the Navy brought into requisition. Well, to show how almost impossible of attainment this is at first sight, I have only to quote three or four figures. Say, for the sake of argument, that Great Britain was contributing her last year's amount—£36,000,000—and that Australia was contributing what the Treasurer, I understand, thinks it should contribute, £3,000,000.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I never said anything of that sort.

Mr. KELLY.—Does the Treasurer say he has never said that it should be £3,000,000?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have never named any sum.

Mr. KELLY.—I at once withdraw the statement.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — The honorable member should not have made the statement when there was no foundation for it.

Mr. KELLY.—I think the right honorable gentleman has talked time and again of what we should contribute. I was not eager to do any injustice to him, for I have sufficient of his misdeeds to talk about without trying to attribute to him things which he has not done.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That would be very much better than inventing.

Mr. KELLY.—The Treasurer has hinted that I have been inventing for a purpose. That insinuation is unworthy of the high office which the Minister occupies. When the deputy leader of the Opposition was speaking on this matter the other evening the right honorable gentleman did something which amounted to a misleading of the Committee, whether intentional or not. I have quoted from the right honorable gentleman, and have shown that he has a memory which is singularly deficient; but, however deficient it may be, I think that at least he might pay the courtesy to honorable members to suppose that they, at any rate, are honest and open in their methods of dealing with these subjects. I did not, however, wish for a moment to imply that he had stated any definite amount. I had a recollection that some such amount had been named by persons who are anxious that in time, not immediately, Australia should realize her Imperial responsibility to that extent.

Mr. EWING. — The honorable member knows that that is simply a calculation based upon population, which no one maintains is reliable.

Mr. KELLY.—I am only putting a case from that particular point for the purposes of argument. I am at one with some few honorable members on the other side of the House to have Australia recognise her responsibility.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Treasurer has referred to it time and again.

Mr. KELLY.—In any case, I do not wish to bandy words with the Treasurer on this point, but I shall take the figures as I was giving them when his most uncalled for interjection was made.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — The Treasurer would not have denied it if he had not begun to "smoodge" to the Labour corner. That is the plain English of it!

Mr. KELLY.—I confess there is a great deal in what the honorable member says.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — The honorable member is always very polite.

Mr. WILSON.—I beg to call attention to the state of the Committee.

The CHAIRMAN.—Have I permission to ring the bells?

Mr. MAUGER.—I think that Mr. Speaker should be called in.

Mr. SPEAKER, having taken the Chair. [Bells rung; quorum formed.]

Mr. KELLY.—At the time when the honorable member for Melbourne Ports seemed to think that it was necessary to waste some five minutes—

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! The honorable member is not in order in saying that.

Mr. KELLY.—I can only say this, that I, at any rate, had no intention to waste time by having Mr. Speaker called in.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member will confine his attention to the subject before the Committee. The fact that Mr. Speaker was called in is not the question before the Chair.

Mr. KELLY.—I was pointing out, when this lamentable break in the proceedings took place, the almost impossibility of any arrangement for any representation of contributors to the Imperial Navy on a Foreign Council of the Empire. Let us presume for the moment—only for the sake of argument—that Great Britain was contributing some £36,000,000 per annum to the Imperial naval war chest. Let us suppose that Australia and Canada were each contributing some £3,000,000; South Africa, £1,000,000; and Newfoundland, £250,000. It is obvious that Newfoundland could not have less than one member; and if we take it that Newfoundland had one, and that the Commonwealth and other sections had their proportionate representation, a very short calculation will show that that Foreign Committee would consist of no less than 173 members. It will be obvious to every honorable member, and to every person who considers the subject, that a Committee of 173 members would not be a workable body. Such a Committee would necessarily have to deal with most intricate subjects, which would unquestionably be better dealt with under one executive head. This is only another of the difficulties in the way of conceding representation to us in respect of our contribution. However, it is of no use beating the air at the present time with this subject. We are all anxious to see the question definitely faced. We are all anxious to see the naval defence of Australia put on a proper footing. The first step must be to hold an Imperial Conference, specially to consider this Imperial question; and I do regret that the Treasurer, instead of saying a thing one day which, in deference to the clamour of honorable members in the Ministerial corner, he had next day to withdraw, did not definitely commit his Government to the almost non-committal course of seeking a conference on this great question. While the Treasurer seemed to recognise the Imperial necessity for an Imperial Navy, he did not apparently realize the importance of what any ordinary student of these matters regards as an obvious complementary adjunct of a navy, that is, coastal defence. The Treasurer certainly spoke, in his Budget speech, a great deal about coastal defence; but we cannot find, in the Estimates, a single benefit that this Government proposes to confer on an arm which they themselves admit is grievously undermanned, and grievously inadequate for the important duties it may be called upon to execute. Captain Mahan says of coast defence that—

Proper coast defence, the true and necessary complement of an efficient navy, releases the latter for its proper work—offensive, upon the open seas, or off the enemy's shores.

In that passage Mahan lays it clearly down that any country which regards its navy as its first line of defence—as this island continent of ours must do—must regard its coastal defence as complementary to its first line. Without coast defence, the navy is not free to devote itself to its proper work.

Mr. EWING.—Does the honorable member think that he could get out a scheme of coast defence in a few days, or in a week or two?

Mr. KELLY.—I think I could do more than indulge in a little talk, which costs nothing, in a few days or weeks. I think I shall be able to show my honorable friend one thing that he might have done, without committing this Commonwealth to an expenditure of more than a few thousand pounds, and which would mean all the difference between having our principal seaport and naval base made absolutely secure, and leaving it open to raid by any torpedo-boat. Now, it is quite possible that some honorable members may confuse the idea of carrying on a defensive war by taking the offensive, with the idea that is so hateful to all Anglo-Saxon peoples—of declaring war aggressively. This confusion of ideas is again admirably explained by the same naval authority whom I have previously quoted. Speaking of the United States, Captain Mahan says—

The view that the United States should plan its navy—in numbers and in sizes of ships—for defence only, rests upon a confusion of ideas—a political idea and a military idea—under the one term of “defence.” Politically, it has always been assumed in the United States—and also in Australia, of course—and very properly, that our policy should never be wantonly aggressive; that we should never seek our own advantage, however evident, by an unjust pressure upon another nation, much less by open war. This, it will be seen, is a political idea, one which serves for the guidance of the people and of the statesmen of the country in determining—not how war is to be carried on, which is a military question, but—under what circumstances war is permissible, or unjust.

That, I think, clearly shows the difference between waging war offensively for defensive purposes, and declaring war, aggressively and unjustly. Having then decided that coastal defences are a necessary complement of a navy, what are we to understand by coastal defence? We all know that it is not proposed to fortify every harbor or river mouth. Captain Mahan indicates what is required in the way of coastal defence, as follows:—

If the great coast cities are satisfied of their safety, a Government will be able to resist the unreasonable clamour—for such it is—of small towns and villages, which are protected by their own insignificance.

In the general question of preparation for naval war, therefore, the important centres and internal waterways of commerce must receive local protection, where they are exposed to attack from the sea; the rest must trust, and can in such safely trust, to the fleet, upon which, as the offensive arm, all other expenditure for military maritime efficiency should be made.

That clearly sets forth the coastal defence policy that should govern all peoples who depend for their first line of defence upon naval action. What are the important centres in the Commonwealth, which, according to the principles laid down by Captain

Mahan, should be protected? Our important centres of trade are Sydney, Newcastle, and Melbourne—though not in that order. Strategically, Sydney, as the naval base of the British fleet in these waters, is the most important port in the Commonwealth. Other important strategical points are Newcastle, because of its coal, and Thursday Island and King George's Sound, because they are coaling stations which must be kept up to meet the requirements of the Imperial fleet in these waters. Our most important port, both from a trade and a military point of view, is Sydney. Can any one say that the centres I have mentioned are reasonably defended? We know that the coastal defences of a country must vary according to the reliance it places in its navy for its protection. With our Empire everything depends upon the navy. If that arm of our defence collapsed all would be lost. Our coastal defences are subsidiary to the navy, and must be made efficient in order to leave the navy free to do its work. If this be done with absolute efficiency the enemy's fleets will be blocked up in their own harbors, and only single ships, or, at most, very small squadrons will be able to roam the seas, and that only at great risk to themselves. Before the command of the sea can be gained and the enemy's fleets can be penned up in their own harbors, hostile vessels will no doubt roam at large—I do not think they will roam long—and their object will be, whilst avoiding the British squadrons, to do as much damage as they can to our commerce, and our strategical centres. If an enemy's ship, or small squadron, saw a chance of destroying our naval base in these waters it would no doubt be prepared to take considerable risks to carry out its object. On this point, I should like to quote the authority of the British Empire on garrison defence, namely, Garrison Artillery Training for 1904, volume II. This authority lays it down that the class of vessels likely to be used in such raids as I have mentioned are—

Torpedo boats, and torpedo-boat destroyers, perhaps accompanied by a larger vessel for the purpose of breaking through obstructions at the entrances to harbors.

We have made no provision for preventing such obstructions, and therefore the larger vessel mentioned would not be required. Hence, we may expect that any attack upon us would probably be made by means of torpedo boats which would be carried here on the decks of cruisers. As for the torpedo-boat destroyers, they are not likely to pay a visit to these waters, unless they come from one of the naval bases which foreign powers are now establishing in the South Pacific. The same authority points out that the attack would probably be made "by day or night, or in thick and dirty weather." In order to show that this danger from raid is real, I need only remind honorable members that within the last few days it has been reported in the press that one naval power—Germany—is contemplating the building of large commerce destroyers of 15,000 tons and upwards. These ships can only be destined for use on distant stations, and as Germany is devoting her attention to the development of her interests in the South Pacific, it is fair to assume that these commerce destroyers are designed for service in these waters. Each of these ships would carry a torpedo boat of the type to which I have referred, and would be able to make a raid such as has been indicated. Now, what defence should be provided against such an attack? I propose to again quote from Garrison Artillery Training, in which it is stated—

As briefly indicated in section II., the form of attack to which the ports of the British Empire are most liable is raid by torpedo boats, with the object of destroying shipping or docks within the defences. The object of such an attack may be attained by one boat getting through the defences unharmed, though the remainder may be sunk in the attempt; and the essence of success lies in surprise. It is therefore probable that a torpedo boat attack would be made either at night, just at break of day, or in thick weather; and it is quite possible that it might take place even before the formal declaration of war. Under these circumstances it will be evident that the defence must be so organized that surprise shall be impossible, and that when an attack is made the probability of any boat getting through unharmed shall be a minimum.

I may mention here that the necessity for preventing surprises affords the explanation of the desire of the late General Officer Commanding that we should have at least two reliefs for our quick-firing armament—

Since the conditions which obtain at every port are more or less different, a set scheme cannot be laid down; but the general principles can be enunciated, and these must be applied locally to the preparation of schemes for defence. The defences provided against torpedo boat attacks are generally as follow:—Electric lights, quick-firing guns, and, in some cases, booms and mines. Electric lights are usually arranged so as to illuminate as brightly as possible the whole water area for a distance of at least 1,000 yards from the narrowest part of the entrance to the harbor, or from the outer edge of the boom if one exists.

We have made no preparations for the construction of a boom at any of our ports—

In advance of this illuminated area it is often possible to place other lights to throw a beam across the entrance, so that any boats approaching the harbor must be seen as they pass through. These are termed sentry beams.

We have no preparation for sentry beams so far as Sydney is concerned—and are placed sufficiently far in advance of the illuminated area to allow of due warning being sent from them to the inner defences before the boats can pass over the intervening distance.

The main gun defence is concentrated on the illuminated area, and it is here that the torpedo boats are to be sunk or disabled; the sentry beams are not fighting lights, but merely for purposes of warning, and even if guns are mounted in such positions that they can fire on boats passing through them, too much dependence must not be placed on their fire for the purposes of defence.

With respect to armaments, this authority lays down the following:—

Armaments.—The 12-pr. Q.F. is the gun mostly used for defence against torpedo boat attack; 4·7-inch Q.F.'s will be found in some places mounted for this purpose, and where this is the case they will be treated, though not classed, as Light Q.F.'s.

Then I recommend this passage to the Vice-President of the Executive Council, as representing the Minister of Defence—

6-pr. Q.F.'s also remain in many places, but they cannot be relied upon to stop a torpedo boat.

Yet these are the only guns that we have in the port of Sydney in the way of anti-torpedo boat armament! I have asked the Minister whether the light, quick-firing armament in Sydney is efficient for its purpose, and he has not seen fit "in the public interest" to answer the question. Now this authority to which I refer definitely lays it down that 6-pr. quick-firing guns cannot be relied upon to stop torpedo boats, and this authority further lays it down that raids will in all probability be undertaken by torpedo boats. Therefore I say that, on the best authority in the British Empire, our principal naval base is at the mercy of the first raider who pays it a visit. Of course, other guns besides light, quick-firing guns are necessary for the protection of a place of the importance of Sydney. If we had only light quick-firing guns, and no others, raiding ships could afford to take what pepper-might get from these light guns, and come in in spite of them. If we had only artillery of different calibres and no submarine mine fields, a fairly powerful ship could still run the gauntlet of our batteries, and, getting inside, do what damage she afterwards could. Consequently, we require a definite system of mine fields, light Q.F. guns to protect them, which would also be anti-torpedo boat guns, and heavier guns to keep ships at a respectful distance. I have already shown the Committee that at Sydney, at any rate, we have no quick-firing guns of the type laid down by the best authority extant as essential for the purposes of defence.

Mr. WEBSTER.—What have we got in Sydney?

Mr. KELLY.—I do not wish to waste the time of this Committee, and I am therefore trying to curtail my remarks as much as possible. I may say that we have a fair number of guns of heavier kind, but we have only five guns of comparatively up-to-date type. We have a considerable number of guns on hydro-pneumatic mountings, which are still hard-hitting guns, though there are some who do not think them up-to-date. Still they are hard-hitting guns, and I am not complaining of them. The guns which we require at Sydney at once, and without waiting for another year, or to enable the Ministry to consider the serious expenditure necessary to put our coastal defences generally on a sound footing are 12-pr. quick-firing guns. These guns can be landed in Australia, including the cost of mountings, at £1,200 a-piece, so that the defence of Sydney could be put in something like reasonable order, so far as armament is concerned, for a very small outlay, which, however, the present Ministry do not seem to be prepared to make.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—What would the honorable member call a small outlay?

Mr. KELLY.—Six or eight of these guns might be secured, but probably ten would be better, and with an expenditure of from £8,000 to £10,000 on this armament, the defence of Sydney might be made fairly secure; and though it would not be as it should be, it would not be the scandal which it is at the present moment.

Mr. WILSON.—Would not the honorable member protect any other port than Sydney?

Mr. KELLY.—I am dealing with Sydney only in order to show, by the absolute unpreparedness of one city, the condition of all the others, as there is not one other in a better position than Sydney.

Mr. STORER.—Money was voted for the defence of Hobart last year, and the late Government would not spend it.

Mr. KELLY.—I have shown the position of Sydney so far as guns are concerned, but in the matter of men our position is even more scandalously unprepared. The men we have are good. The results of their firing have been good. They have devoted themselves cheerfully to the work they have had to do, and that work has been over and above their ordinary work as garrison soldiers. But there are absolutely too few of these men. I have asked questions in this House on the subject, and the answers that I have received to those questions prove conclusively that, even with the defective armament we have in Sydney, we have not enough men to man the guns we already have. It is a public scandal that such a state of affairs should be allowed to continue. The Prime Minister, in an interjection during the course of a previous speech of mine dealing with this matter, admitted that during the last few years he, at any rate, has known of our serious unpreparedness and lack in this respect. I do say that it is by no means a tribute to the honorable and learned gentleman's patriotism that he is prepared, now that he is in power, to allow this condition of unpreparedness to continue for a further period of twelve months. What is absolutely essential, so far as the personnel of the Sydney defences goes, is that we should have at least sufficient men to man the guns we already have, and an additional relief for our quick-firing guns. When honorable members are informed that probably one relief for the quick-firing guns could not work them for more than seven minutes at a stretch, they will recognise the supreme necessity for having more than one relief for those guns. Speaking in an ordinary sense, and not in a technical sense, the bald fact is that we have not men to man the guns we have got, and that this is a most serious state of affairs, and one which the House should not allow to continue. In the matter of guns we are deficient; and we have not enough men to man those we have. I propose now to deal with the question of the ammunition for the guns we have, and the possibilities for practice afforded to the guns' crews. In Sydney, it is a peculiar thing that these ineffective 6-pr. quick-firing guns, on which we have to rely as anti-torpedo-boat guns, have never yet been fired in practice. They point over the harbor of Sydney, and cannot, therefore, be used on account of the damage that might be done to passing vessels. We have no practice battery of light quick-firing guns in Sydney, as we should have, and as these guns cannot therefore be used in practice, they cannot be as effective as they otherwise would be when the time comes for their real use. The next point is that the only really up-to-date guns we have of heavier ordnance have never been used in practice. These guns are such that black powder cannot be used in them. To make use of them cordite ammunition is required, and it is a singular thing that this Commonwealth, which can afford to meet the expense of picnics all over the country, cannot afford to provide cordite ammunition for its modern guns to enable them to be used in practice for the crisis of war.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is not a very slight outlay.

Mr. KELLY.—I only wish the Government to provide 400 rounds for each gun, which will cost nothing like the expenditure which is proposed in connexion with the field artillery, an expenditure which cannot be made use of until the Imperial Navy and our coastal defences have failed. The Imperial Navy is the first line of our defences; the second line is our coastal defences; and, lastly, we have to fall back on our field forces. The Government are prepared, lightheartedly, to spend £70,000 or £80,000 on field artillery, although that expenditure is not so urgently required as is expenditure on ammunition for the guns of our coastal defences, the complement of which—the Navy—must have failed before the field guns can be called into use. I think that the defences of Sydney are in a worse condition than that of those of Melbourne. They certainly are worse off in the matter of light quick-firing guns, and the picture I have drawn is by no means overdone. It is, indeed, only an outline of the true position. The Committee should not tolerate the continuance of this state of things. Had I time, I could show that our submarine vote is such that the submarine mining force in Sydney has to devote itself to either the training of its men or the upkeep of its material; it cannot carry out both these essential services. In respect to guns, men, ammunition, and practice, the policy of the Government denudes the great city of Sydney and other large cities of the Commonwealth of that protection to which such important centres of population are entitled. It is clear that an island continent must depend for its defence on naval action. That fact was put clearly before the House in 1901—so that honorable members have no excuse for apathy in connexion with it—when the memorandum by the Colonial Defence Committee on the Defence Forces and Defences of Australia was printed for the information of the Parliament. This memorandum lays it down first that—

The maintenance of British supremacy at sea is the first condition of the security of Australian territory and trade in war. Such supremacy implies that no organized attack will be directed against any part of Australia, and that the maritime communications between Australian ports and the rest of the world will be kept free from sustained interruption.

The report goes on to point out the necessity that exists, in spite of this Imperial naval effort, for coastal defences against raids—

It is recognised, however, that while His Majesty's ships are engaged in destroying or disabling the enemy's squadrons they may not always be in a position to prevent raids by hostile cruisers on places of such importance as to justify, in the opinion of the enemy, the very considerable risks which an attack on them would involve.

This statement shows that although, while the Imperial Navy can dispute the command of the sea, Australia will be secure from invasion, yet we shall at all times be subject to the marauding visits of raiding cruisers, and goes on to point out that—

As such attacks reveal the position of the raiding vessels to the British ships, whose duty it is to bring them to action, they must necessarily be of a hasty and fugitive character.

There, in a nutshell, is the military position of the Commonwealth. We must rely on the Navy to save us from a national calamity, by which I mean the invasion or occupation of our territory. We must establish defences at all important coastal towns, first to free the Navy to pursue unfettered its operations upon the seas, and, secondly, to prevent any chance cruiser of the enemy from doing serious damage to our all-important and vital centres. It is, therefore, the duty of the Commonwealth Government to examine into the conditions and circumstances under which Australian naval protection is assured by the mother country's self-denying and practically unassisted efforts; to see whether the mother country will be able to continue bearing unassisted this burden; and to endeavour to arrive at some just basis of Imperial co-operation and defence which will, in time of war, insure that the whole Empire shall put forward its united strength for the good of all its members.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Is the honorable member in order in reading his speech?

The CHAIRMAN.—It is not in order for an honorable member to read his speech.

Mr. KELLY.—I should have thought that you, sir, could see that I am not reading my speech. I am naturally keeping to my notes, because I am traversing a many-sided subject, and I do not wish to be led astray into by-paths, or to deal out of their order with the various questions to which I am directing attention.

The CHAIRMAN.—I accept the honorable member's statement.

Mr. KELLY.—The first duty of this Government, and it is a duty which they can carry out without consulting any other part of the Empire, is to put our coastal defences in order. We have seen in the Treasurer's speech a reference to the necessity for doing so, but we look in vain through the Estimates for any earnest that the Government will act according to their expressed intention.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Estimates are practically those which were prepared by the preceding Government.

Mr. KELLY.—I am not blaming this Government for the present position of the defences of Australia; but it is clearly their duty to give an earnest of their anxiety to put the defences on a proper footing.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is what we are doing.

Mr. KELLY.—I am glad to have the Prime Minister's assurance that he will put these defences on a safe footing. To put the coastal defences of Australia in proper order will require the expenditure of a considerable amount of money. Mr. Goschen, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, once said—

Every Chancellor of the Exchequer for the last ten years has been burdened with the ever increasing burden of the old man of the sea. I do not complain of it, because, in the first place, I believe the expenditure to be necessary. I know that it is far more economical that we should incur it at a time when we have leisure to think out a systematized plan on which it can be made, than to defer works which we ought to do ourselves, to be attempted some day, perhaps too late, by our successors, and to allow to be passed votes of credit amounting to enormous sums, most of which might be too late for the object for which it would be required.

That I think is so clearly common-sense that this Parliament and the country will consent to act in the same way. Almost as much as the money, what is required for the Commonwealth is a proper appreciation of the way in which it is best to expend the money we have. I do not think for one moment that the money we are spending at present is spent with the best possible result, and in support of that view, I shall give a few instances. On the present Estimates—and I do not blame the Government for this—an amount is set aside for pom poms for our field forces; and the same amount would put in fair order some of our coastal defences, which is the branch that most wants putting right, and which must come into action before the pom poms can be ever required. Another illustration of how the money is not spent to the best advantage in defence matters, is one which will appeal to all honorable members who are concerned in votes. I refer now to rifle clubs—and I have myself told the clubs in my electorate that it is essential that our coastal defences shall be made efficient before we can consider grants for the third line of defence. There is, nevertheless, not the slightest use in voting large sums for rifle clubs on the supposition that those clubs may be afterwards used as a sort of general conscriptive land force, if we do not provide the members with uniforms. I am not asking the Government to provide these uniforms, until the more necessary work has been done; I am now merely pointing out that all the money spent on rifle clubs with that object in view will be wasted if uniforms are not provided. Without uniforms, the men would, if captured, be shot at sight as Franc Tireurs, and the knowledge of that, as all honorable members will recognise, would impair the usefulness of the rifle clubs if they were ever called upon for service.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Boers were not shot in that way.

Mr. KELLY.—The British did not so use the Boers, but other powers have not been so extremely humane as we were in South Africa. The history of the Franco-German war shows what treatment we must expect if ever we are brought into conflict with a European power. The needs of Australia, from a defence point of view, approximate very closely to the needs of every other section of the Empire. Each and all of the Possessions are bordered by and most easily attackable from the sea, and it is obvious that each and all must have the same defence; and that being so, they must all join together for a common effort. That fact makes it clear that unless some action is taken by this and the Governments of other self-governing possessions, there must eventually grow up within the Empire a series of separated local navies, none of which would be in a position to be combined for the common good, and all of which would be open to be crushed in detail by whatever power made a serious effort to gain command of the sea. There is a plain duty before the Government, and it is a duty which, if properly carried out, will make the existence of this Government a matter for congratulation by Australia in time to come, as a Government that initiated a new principle, and started a new epoch in the history of the Empire. The same naval historian I have before quoted, says—

Elements long estranged, but of the same blood, can in no way more surely attain to community of interest and of view than by the development of an external policy, of which the benefits and the pride may be common to all. True unity requires some common object around which diverse interests may cling and crystallize. Nations, like families, need to look outside themselves, if they would escape, on the one hand narrow self satisfaction, or, on the other, pitiful internal dissensions.

The Government have a double opportunity in this regard. The Commonwealth of Australia is divided, State from State; our local jealousies are becoming more embittered day by day, mainly, I must say, owing to the actions of the Commonwealth Governments, and partly to other causes. The development of an external policy—and what external policy could be so worthy as a policy of common defence for all?—will unite the several parts of the Commonwealth, until in time they become, not, as they are at present, six States banded together by a legal compact, but six States welded into one united people.

PAPERS.

MINISTERS laid upon the table the following papers:—

Memorandum by the Minister of State for Defence on the Estimates of Defence Department for the financial year 1905-6.

Notification of the acquisition of land under the Property for Public Purposes Acquisition Act, at Randwick, New South Wales, as an addition to the Rifle Range.

House adjourned at 10.49 p.m.

Senate.

Wednesday, 30 August, 1905.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

FIRST PARLIAMENT: MR. TOM ROBERTS' PICTURE.

Senator CROFT.—I desire to ask the leader of the Senate, without notice, whether the Government will arrange to have the Queen's Hall thrown open to the general public during such hours on Saturdays and Sundays as will give all sections of the community who may so desire, an opportunity to inspect the picture of the opening of the first Commonwealth Parliament?

The PRESIDENT.—I may say that an arrangement will be made for the opening of the Queen's Hall on Saturdays, Sundays, and Mondays.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I understand that the picture is exhibited in the Queen's Hall so that it may be viewed by members of Parliament, and that, subsequently, it will be sent to the National Art Gallery, where it can be seen by the public. Of course, the President and Mr. Speaker can make an arrangement for the picture to be seen in the Queen's Hall on the days mentioned by the honorable senator.

The PRESIDENT.—In further answer to the question I would say that I have received from the Prime Minister a letter to the effect that the picture will only remain in the Queen's Hall for fourteen days, and that during that period an arrangement will be made so that the public can see it on Saturdays and Mondays.

PUBLIC SERVICE CLASSIFICATION.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I desire to ask Senator Keating, without notice, when an opportunity will be given to continue the discussion on the classification of the Public Service. I understand that he stated previously that every opportunity would be afforded to honorable senators to give full expression to their views.

Senator KEATING.—I would like the honorable senator to give notice of the question.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Do I understand that the discussion is to be resumed on a date far ahead, and that the Commissioner will not have the benefit—if it is a benefit—of the views of those honorable senators who have not yet spoken on the subject?

Senator KEATING.—It was anticipated that the time given on Friday last for the discussion of the subject would be sufficient. As I intimated previously, it is not the desire of Ministers to prevent a complete discussion of the scheme, and if before to-morrow I can ascertain with any degree of certainty whether there are a number of honorable senators who will be ready to continue the discussion at an early date, I shall inform the Senate then what steps we intend to take to meet their wishes.

PAPERS.

MINISTERS laid upon the table the following papers:—

Notifications of the acquisition of land for defence purposes at Randwick, New South Wales, and, by exchange, of a site for a post-office at Murrin Murrin, Western Australia.

Memorandum by the Minister of Defence on the Defence Estimates for the financial year 1905-6.

SUPPLY BILL (No. 2).

Assent reported.

EVIDENCE BILL.

Assent reported.

SERVICE AND EXECUTION OF PROCESS BILL 1905.

Assent reported.

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES BILL.

The PRESIDENT reported the receipt of a message from the House of Representatives stating that it had agreed to the amendment made by the Senate in this Bill.

MAIL CONTRACT: WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

Senator PEARCE asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. In reference to the question asked on 23rd August re Mail Service on Great Australian Bight eastward from Albany, and the answer thereto, have the Commonwealth Government acted on the recommendation of the Postal Inspector, who reported on this question namely, that "the State Government should be approached on the question of subsidy"?

2. Will the Government take early action in the matter so as to arrive at an early decision on the matter to enable tenderers to be given full notice, and full competition invited?

Senator KEATING.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows:—

1. Yes, the report of the inspector has been communicated to the State Government of Western Australia through the Department of External Affairs.

2. All preliminary action has been taken, particulars of the tenders were advertised in last week's Gazette, and full competition invited. A decision will be arrived at when the alternative tenders are received and considered.

PUBLIC SERVICE: OUTSIDE INFLUENCE.

Senator PEARCE asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

In reference to the replies given by the Minister to the questions asked by Senator the Hon. H. Dobson on Thursday, 24th August, relative to Commonwealth public servants interviewing or writing to members of Parliament; does the Minister consider it to be a breach of the regulations referred to if—

- (a) A public servant acting as an official representative of a public servants' organization interviews a member or members of Parliament?
- (b) A public servant acting as aforesaid writes to members of Parliament on matters affecting the service?

Senator KEATING.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

The answers given had reference to the individual cases. The regulation is as follows:—

“Officers are prohibited from seeking the influence or interest of any person in order to obtain promotion, removal, or other advantage. Any officer who considers that his claims for promotion or consideration have been overlooked may write a statement of his claims to the chief officer, who shall forward without delay such statement with any remarks he has to make thereon to the permanent head, who shall transmit it to the Commissioner for consideration.”

What actually constitutes a breach must depend upon the circumstances of each case. It would, however, be a breach of the regulation for any public servant acting individually or as an official representative of a public servants' organization, whether by interview or letter, to seek “the influence or interest of any person in order to obtain promotion, removal, or other advantage.” The above regulation provides a procedure for redress.

TARCOOLA POST OFFICE.

Motion (by Senator MATHESON) agreed to—

That a return be laid on the table of the Senate showing the annual revenue collected by the Tarcoola Post-office from telegraphic business since it was opened.

LAPSED BILLS.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia —Minister of Defence).—I move —

That the report of the Standing Orders Committee relating to Lapsed Bills be adopted.

If honorable senators will look at the present standing order on this subject they will find that the principal alteration which has been recommended by the joint committee of the Houses is that when a Bill, originated in say, the Senate, and forwarded to the House of Representatives has not been finally dealt with there when the Parliament is prorogued that House cannot in the following session resume its consideration without a resolution from the Senate requesting it to do so. Precisely the same procedure is recommended when a Bill, originated in the House of Representatives is pending in the Senate when the Parliament is prorogued. Therefore, under the proposed new standing orders one House cannot proceed with the consideration of a lapsed Bill without the consent of the originating House. All the other recommendations are simply made to replace the present standing order, but in a more complete form.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—This report involves one or two considerations, which I think we ought not to overlook. We ought not to adopt this motion as a matter of form. One very grave element, as I think, should have direct consideration from us before we do anything. The present standing order enables a Bill, whose progress was interrupted by the close of the previous session, to be resumed on a resolution of the Senate or the other House—because the same practice prevails in either branch—at the point it had reached at the time of prorogation. The effect of that was to withdraw entirely from the House in which the measure originated, and from which it passed, all further opportunity of interference with that Bill, unless, of course, some amendment was made which required consideration at the hands of the other branch of the Legislature. So that, in point of fact, no opportunity was given for any possible change of opinion or reconsideration by the other Chamber, the necessity for which might have arisen in the interval between the prorogation and the resumption of the proceedings of Parliament. Then, again, it was a matter for debate whether a principle which was certainly at variance with the long course of Parliament Government in England, upon which our proceedings are founded, should be adopted. There can be no doubt whatever that some provision of this kind is very useful as facilitating legislation and saving, in many cases, a great deal of time.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Waste of time.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am not sure that we should call it altogether waste of time, because I am one of those who do not believe in hasty legislation; and the more opportunities are given for the consideration of important measures by Parliament the better. Such reiterated consideration does not by any means necessarily involve waste of time.

Senator MILLEN.—It often prevents the necessity for amending legislation.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not sympathize with those who constantly criticise and clamour against the proceedings of Parliament as a waste of time. I think that the best things are done very often, not on first, but on second thoughts. Therefore it is not an idle thing to say that we should not adopt, as a matter of course, any procedure that will unduly cut short the consideration of any measure. But while holding that view as a matter of principle, I freely admit that in regard to a large number of measures which are more or less uncontroversial, such a standing order is exceedingly desirable. In measures that involve matters of controversy it may also be desirable; but I gravely doubt, and always have doubted, whether a provision such as exists in our present Standing Orders was desirable, or ought to be applied generally to all Bills, and particularly to Bills of a highly controversial character. Although we do not allow our standing order relating to lapsed Bills to apply where an election has intervened, there are occasions, and there are Bills to which, perhaps, it might not be equally applicable. Take, for instance, changes of Government. You have, say, a Bill introduced in one House, and even passed through that House, under the leadership of a Government, some members of which may disagree with the Bill as a matter of policy, but may, nevertheless, from a natural feeling, prefer to let things take their course, the Bill being in the other Chamber; or, to use a common phrase, to "let sleeping dogs lie." They may prefer to let the Bill go through without feeling that they are taking that Ministerial responsibility in respect to it which they ought to take. The old standing order, it seems to me, did not remove the disadvantages of the course to which I have referred, and was objectionable in many respects. It was objectionable in regard to the point which I have already casually indicated, that it deprived the House in which the Bill originated of any opportunity for reconsideration, and of saying whether or not they were prepared to take the same course in regard to the measure as they took in the previous session. The new standing order which is recommended by the Joint Standing Orders Committee is a distinct and great improvement from that point of view. If honorable senators will look at the report of the Committee they will find that the position is changed. The House in which a Bill originated, and from which it had gone to the other branch of the Legislature, will have an opportunity, not in the ordinary way of dealing with Bills but by resolution, to say whether it desires that the Bill should be proceeded with from the point which it had reached in the previous session. That gets rid of the inconvenience—of the disability, in fact—thrown upon the House where the Bill originated, by the old standing order; it leaves the House still in possession of the power to say whether or not it wishes the Bill to be proceeded with at the point which it had reached at the time of the prorogation, and to declare if it does not wish to have it proceeded with in that way, that it shall be reintroduced. There is no doubt whatever that a very great improvement is made to that extent. But there is one class of Bills which I think we ought to have fully in our minds before we adopt this report without qualification. I refer to Bills for the appropriation of revenue or moneys. If Parliament desires that this procedure shall apply equally to Bills appropriating revenue or moneys, as well as to all other Bills, that ought to be distinctly in our minds now. The point should be raised, as I propose to raise it, whether it ought so to apply; so that at some future time it may not, when a concrete instance occurs, be raised as a point of order whether the standing order ought to extend to measures of that character. I think that it is a matter for congratulation that, through the good services of the Standing Orders Committee, we are able to discuss the matter quite irrespective of any measure just now pending; that we are able to deal with it as a question concrete as regards procedure, but abstract in that it does not concern any measure upon which feeling or judgment may run one way or the other. The point that I wish to bring under the notice of honorable senators is whether we are at liberty, by a standing order, to deal with such Bills in this way, having in view section 56 of the Constitution. The point was raised by Senator Turley some time ago in connexion with a Bill that was then in the hands of the Senate. My point is not whether we should not make Standing Orders regulating our own procedure, but whether we may by these Standing Orders, affect—either by way of repeal or by way of conflict—a provision of the Constitution, such as section 56. We must remember that the Constitution is an Imperial Act of Parliament. It is an Act of Parliament, above all others, in the first instance, approved by the people of Australia, so far as regards its substance, its provisions, and its form. But it receives its validity as a piece of legislation from the Imperial Legislature. When it was passed, there was, of course, no such standing order in our books of procedure as that which we are now considering. Such a standing order was not in contemplation by the Imperial Legislature. What was contemplated when our Constitution was passed, was that the passage of a Bill appropriating revenue or moneys should take place in one session. There was no other procedure in view. There was nothing to qualify or modify that parliamentary situation one whit. Section 56 embodies what, so far as the Imperial Parliament is concerned, was really a standing order. But it is no standing order of ours. It is a part of our Constitution. That is what creates the difference. In Todd's Parliamentary Government, volume 1, page 765, I find this statement as to the origin of messages regarding the appropriation of revenue:—

Hitherto it has been customary to permit Bills of this description to be introduced by private members, without reference to the Government; but this practice led to so much irregularity that, in the session of 1866, a new standing order was adopted, requiring the recommendation of the Crown to be given before the House will entertain any motion that will involve a charge upon the public revenue whether direct or out of moneys to be provided by Parliament. This order is intended to place the responsibility for such Bills, if not their initiation, in the hands of the Government.

That was the origin of the standing order as it exists in the House of Commons; and although in form, of course, a message from the Crown is a recommendation of revenue, it really is a means by which the Executive Government exercises its responsibility. In this sense it is a remnant of the constitutional doctrine that when the Crown wants money it has to come to Parliament, so to speak, cap in hand, and ask for it. It is not a reflection upon Parliament, nor does it involve any lowering of the powers and position of Parliament. It is rather a recognition of the control of Parliament, and the control of the Executive in regard to the voting and expenditure of public money. Thus no member of Parliament, in his private capacity, is entitled to ask Parliament to vote money without the authority of the Executive Government. This section of our Constitution really is an embodiment of a principle which, so far as I am aware, is not embodied in any other constitutional instrument of like standing and power. The same principle is embodied there, and the same idea that was intended to be given effect to, namely, that there should be a message before a Bill of that character is passed—that is, passed by either House. Before it is passed by the House of Representatives there must be a message. Then, after it leaves the House of Representatives and comes to the Senate, if it comes during the same session, the message received in the House of Representatives, in which the measure originated, holds good for both Houses, and there is a message antecedent to the passing of the Bill in each House, which satisfies the terms of section 56 of the Constitution. But if we apply the standing orders proposed to Bills involving the appropriation of public revenue or moneys, we shall require two messages in different sessions. I am not concerned to say whether two messages for one appropriation would be illegal, unconstitutional, or anything of the kind, but honorable senators will see that the fact that in such circumstances we should require two messages, which are not contemplated by section 56, shows that the proposed standing orders are in conflict with the object of that provision of the Constitution. It is quite clear from section 56 that only one message is contemplated. It is quite clear from that section, and from the history of similar provisions, that it is contemplated that such Bills as these shall pass through Parliament in one session.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Some of the States of Australia have legislated in a different direction, and probably the members of the Convention, in framing the section in question, had that legislation in their mind.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Perhaps my honorable friend will tell me what he is alluding to.

Senator GUTHRIE.—The Lapsed Bills Act of South Australia, for instance.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That has nothing to do with this. If section 56 of the Constitution is infringed in any way by our Standing Orders it would be equally so by provisions such as are contained in the Act of Parliament to which the honorable senator refers. We cannot alter the Constitution.

Senator GIVENS.—If a money Bill were reintroduced it would require another message, and what is the difference.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes, but it would be a new Bill.

Senator GIVENS.—It would be just the same old Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend must see that, while the purpose might be the same, it would be a new Bill, and as a new Bill it would go through all its stages in the ordinary way. The simple question for us is—Does this provision about Lapsed Bills come in conflict in any way with section 56 of the Constitution, or is it inconsistent with the spirit and intention of that section? If it is, are we entitled to give effect to the standing order as applied to Bills contemplated by that section? In my view every Bill appropriating revenue or moneys ought to be introduced with its message in the ordinary course before passing in the House of Representatives if it is introduced there, and should be passed through all its stages during the same session, and the standing orders before us ought not to be made applicable to Bills of that character. As a member of the Standing Orders Committee, I do not wish it to go abroad, or to be supposed for a moment that I agree that the new standing orders proposed are not inconsistent with the provisions of section 56 of the Constitution. I think they are. I should hesitate very much even if these standing orders were passed in voting for a Bill involving the appropriation of revenue or moneys in another session from that in which it was introduced in the other branch of the Legislature or here. We should certainly deal with the matter with our eyes open, and should not leave the difficulty to be a matter of the construction put on these standing orders. Therefore, in order that the question may be discussed I move—

That after the word "Bills," the following words be inserted:—"except a Bill for the appropriation of revenue or moneys."

Amendment not seconded.

The PRESIDENT.—In reference to this question, I wish to make a few remarks, not as President, but as Chairman of the Joint Standing Orders Committee. With respect to the point raised by Senator Symon, we should always bear in mind the intention and object of section 56 of the Constitution. That section takes away powers from Parliament, and increases the prerogatives of the Crown, by providing that Parliament cannot pass certain measures unless the Crown consents. I quite agree that is it a good section, and I am not saying anything against its object, because it gives to the Ministry of the day power over the expenditure of the Commonwealth. They are responsible for seeing that revenue and expenditure balance. I am, therefore, quite willing to admit that they ought to have the power given to them by section 56. But we must always bear in mind that that section is a curtailment of the powers of Parliament, and that being so, I do not think we should further curtail the powers of Parliament, except as provided by that section. Senator Symon has moved an amendment which has not been seconded, but the honorable and learned senator's speech is to the effect that we ought to except from the provision of the proposed new standing orders Bills for the appropriation of revenue or moneys. I gather from his speech that Senator Symon desires to provide that one House of Parliament shall not, under a lapsed Bills standing order, discuss a Bill introduced in the other House of Parliament in a former session.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Only in that particular case.

The PRESIDENT.—In that particular case, of course. I admit at once that I am not in sympathy with these standing orders concerning lapsed Bills. I hold that the greatest possible consideration should always be given to any proposed alteration of the law. I do not hold that it is a waste of the time of Parliament to consider or reconsider any Bill proposing an alteration of the law. In one of the old Greek statutes it was provided that any member of the Legislature who proposed an alteration of the law should do so with a halter round his neck, and that if the proposed Bill did not pass he should be hung. I think that is going a little bit too far. I am not prepared to go to that extent, but at the same time I do hold that we should have the greatest possible consideration of every proposal involving an alteration of the law. However, I am in this matter in a minority. I was in a minority in the Standing Orders Committee. The draft of the Standing Orders under which we were working made no provision with reference to lapsed Bills, and when a standing order for that purpose was inserted by the Standing Orders Committee, I voted against it. When the standing orders now proposed were approved I voted against them, and I believe I was the only member of the Joint Standing Orders Committee who did so. However, I bow to the will of the majority, and I shall be prepared to carry these orders into effect if they are adopted. I am willing to admit, and I do admit, that the new standing orders are a great improvement on the old standing order, because they provide that no Bill shall be passed without the concurrence of both Houses given in the same session. I am unable to draw any distinction between Bills which appropriate revenue and Bills which do not. I understood Senator Symon to say that Ministers who do not agree with a particular measure do not take Ministerial responsibility. I may be wrong, but that is what I understood the honorable and learned senator to say, and if I am right, I entirely disagree with him.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No, I did not say that.

The PRESIDENT.—I took the words down at the time, and I thought that was what the honorable and learned senator said.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What I said was that there might be Ministers who would not agree with a particular measure, and who would have no opportunity of dealing with it if it were proceeded with in another House.

The PRESIDENT.—Exactly. I say that if a Minister who disagrees with a measure joins with his colleagues in its introduction, he must take the same responsibility with respect to it as other members of the Ministry who do agree with it. The Ministry is a quasi corporation, and an individual Minister must bow to the will of the majority of his colleagues or resign. I say that any Minister who agrees with the policy of the Government to which he belongs in introducing any Bill and passing it, takes the same responsibility for the measure as other members of the Ministry, whether he agrees with it or does not. The point which Senator Symon made seems to me to be narrowed down to this: That if we pass these standing orders as recommended by the Joint Standing Orders Committee, it might sometimes be necessary to have two messages from the Governor-General. Why should we not? What objection is there to that? Suppose we did have two messages. All that they would amount to would be an indication that the Ministry of the day concurred in the expenditure proposed. All that section 56 of the Constitution requires—and this is the object of that section—is that it shall be clear that the Ministry concurs in the proposed expenditure. I do not think myself that two messages are necessary, but that may be a matter of opinion. There are only three possible meanings of the word "passed" as used in section 56 of the Constitution. It might mean finally passed by both Houses of the Parliament, but I understand that that is not contended by any one. It might mean passed by either House of Parliament; or it might mean passed by the House in which the Bill originated. I think it has the latter meaning. But suppose I am wrong, and suppose it has the second meaning, and that the Bill must be passed by either House. Then two messages will meet the case. I cannot see that from any point of view the objections submitted by Senator Symon are well founded. I think the Senate would do well to adopt the recommendation of the Joint Standing Orders Committee, although, as I have said before, I am not in sympathy with standing orders in reference to lapsed Bills. If we look at the practice in Great Britain, and at the Constitutions of the six States included in this Commonwealth, we shall find that so far as Great Britain is concerned, we can obtain no information, because the Standing Orders in Great Britain provide that the House of Commons shall not proceed with a measure appropriating revenue until after a message has been received—the word used is not “pass.” So that the message must precede the consideration of such Bills by the House of Commons. In four of the States, New South Wales, Tasmania, Victoria, and Queensland, the same terms appear in their Constitution Acts. They cannot proceed with a Bill without a message. The message is the first preliminary. Then, if we take the South Australian Constitution, we find—

It shall not be lawful for either House of the State Parliament to pass—

That is clearly indicating either House—

—until a message shall be received from the Governor recommending the House of Assembly to pass the Bill.

That is quite clear and definite. Neither House can pass such a Bill unless the Governor first recommends the Bill to the House of Assembly. If we turn to Western Australia, we find that in the case of that State, it is provided that “it shall not be lawful for the Legislative Assembly to adopt or pass,” this clearing indicating the particular House. I give these illustrations to show that the matter is definitely provided for in all the seven Constitutions to which I refer—in the case of the British House of Commons, and the six Parliaments of the State. It is quite clear that in the case of the Federal Constitution, the Drafting Committee—because this section was redrafted by that committee—in their desire for conciseness, perhaps, erred a little too much on the side of rejecting what they considered to be superfluous words. The Drafting Committee altered this section by leaving out the words “either House”; and if those words had not been left out, the matter would have been quite clear. However, whether we have to interpolate into section 56, the words “either House,” or whether we are not to do so, does not seem to make any difference. In the one case one message is sufficient, and in the other case two messages are required. But what does that matter? Why should not a second message be sent, which implies, or provides, that the Ministry in the second session concur in the expenditure. That is all that is required; that is the object of the section, and if that is done, whatever interpretation is adopted, we shall be acting within the intention of the Constitution in adopting these standing orders. I think that the criticisms of Senator Symon are not well founded. Of course, in that I may be mistaken, as anybody may be mistaken; but it seems to me that we ought to adopt the recommendation of the Standing Orders Committee.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—I am glad to hear, Mr. President, that although you were adverse to these standing orders originally, you are now of opinion that they had better be adopted, in view of the strong recommendations, not only of the Standing Orders Committee of the Senate, but of the Joint Committee that met the other day. I deprecate all proposals which, from time to time, have a tendency to delay legislation which is necessary. When a Parliament has been elected, I take it that the mere fact of a periodical prorogation should not be regarded as a reason for interfering with the progress of legislation that has been introduced; and I know that in the majority of the States that is the principle acted on. While it is well that we have had an opportunity to listen to Senator Symon and yourself on the constitutional aspect of the matter, I think that the question we have, first of all, to ask is—Does this proposal conflict with the Constitution in any way? If it does not conflict with the Constitution, the next question is—Is it a desirable procedure to adopt, although the men who drew up the Constitution had not this contingency in contemplation at the time? Both of these questions can, I think, be answered without any great difficulty. I am satisfied that, although this contingency may not have been contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, the recommendation is not in conflict with the Constitution, or beyond our powers. The fact that the wording of the section implies that only one message will be sent may be attributed to the general assumption that legislation will be completed in the particular session in which it is introduced. We know, however, that practically that cannot always be the case. There may be a Bill, for instance, which gives rise to a great deal of difference of opinion and conflict, and two or three months may be occupied in pushing it along by means of constant sittings. When that Bill comes to another House, there may be a strong minority who, being opposed to the measure, may prevent it from becoming law. Surely it would not be reasonable, under such circumstances, to say that the whole of the time that had been occupied in the other House in taking the Bill through all its various stages should be thrown away, and that there must be introduced another Bill which might give rise to the same trouble and conflict, more particularly when in the Chamber in which the Bill was originally introduced, there is still an opportunity, on a message being received from the other Chamber, to ventilate any difficulties that may have cropped up in the meantime. An opportunity is thus given for consideration, while at the same time there is no room for such an amount of fighting, as would render it impracticable to pass the measure. Personally, I would sooner see Parliament ultimately give a vote under such circumstances than have the measure destroyed by what those in favour of it might call obstruction. However much we may differ in opinion, we must recognise that Parliament, as representing the people, has a right to say whether a particular form of legislation shall pass. If a Bill were brought in towards the end of a Parliament, it would be unreasonable, in the case of a general election, to say that all that had been done in the previous Parliament should be ratified. The new Parliament, having come fresh from the people, and being, probably, imbued with the people's ideas of a particular measure, as they would be if it were an important one, should have an opportunity to reintroduce it and pass it through all its stages. But a mere prorogation occurring to-day, instead of a month hence, by which time probably the Bill would have been passed, should not be taken as a reason for rendering useless the work already done. I have always been strongly of opinion that a standing order of this character was desirable in the public interest, as well as in the interests of Parliament itself. I am glad to find that the standing orders as submitted have certain safeguards which did not surround the previous standing order. I am pleased to welcome standing orders which will prevent the possibility, as it appears to me, of an injustice being done to either House or to the country generally with regard to legislation under consideration. The point as to the messages, I regard as rather an interference with the prerogatives of the State; but, after all, we proceed on the theory that these are the moneys of the Crown, and that the Crown desires us to vote them.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is a mere recommendation, not an order.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—And the recommendation is made at the request of the Ministry of the day?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — And the Ministry is responsible for the recommendation.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—And, therefore, I do not regard the recommendation as in any way an interference with our rights and prerogatives. The course proposed is simply a means of safeguarding our rights, because it makes somebody responsible. If any foolish or wrong recommendation is made, those persons who are responsible for it ought to suffer for trying to lead Parliament astray in the payment of moneys which belong theoretically to the Crown, but really to the people, to whom we are responsible.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—The points put by Senator Symon were raised in the Standing Order Committee, and thoroughly debated; and the Committee, by a large majority, decided that they were on perfectly safe grounds in making the recommendation contained in the report. At the meetings of the Standing Orders Committee, Senator Symon, in an equally vigorous fashion, voiced the protest he has made to-day, and outlined what he considered to be the chief objections to the course proposed. I have not been present to-day to hear all that the honorable and learned senator said, but I take it that he took practically the same stand which he took in the Committee.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Substantially the same.

Senator PEARCE.—Although I say it with bated breath, it seems to me that Senator Symon adopts a somewhat strained view of the section of the Constitution; and if we apply it to a specific instance, I think we shall be able to see the flaw in his argument. The instance with which the Senate is most familiar, is that of the Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie Railway Survey Bill; and if honorable senators will look at the procedure adopted in that case, and then read the section in the Constitution, they will find that practically that section was complied with in full. Of course, there is undoubtedly more force in the argument against this procedure, as connected with Money Bills, than as connected with ordinary Bills; in fact,

I do not think that Senator Symon advances his objections against ordinary Bills.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Hear, hear.

Senator PEARCE.—The Standing Orders Committee, with the safeguards they have embodied, give every power to both Houses, to conserve their rights in regard to Money Bills, and with those safeguards, I think the report might very well be adopted.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Motion (by Senator PLAYFORD) agreed to—

That the following new standing orders be adopted in substitution for the existing order (No. 234) relating to Lapsed Bills :—

“ 234A. Any public Bill which lapses by reason of a prorogation before it has reached its final stage may be proceeded with in the next ensuing session at the stage it had reached in the preceding session, if a periodical election for the Senate or general election for either House has not taken place between such two sessions, under the following conditions :—

(a) If the Bill be in the possession of the House in which it originated, not having been sent to the other House, or, if sent, then returned by message, it may be proceeded with by resolution of the House in which it is, restoring it to the notice-paper.

(b) If the Bill be in the possession of the House in which it did not originate it may be proceeded with by resolution of the House in which it is, restoring it to the notice-paper, but such resolution shall not be passed unless a message has been received from the House in which it originated, requesting that its consideration may be resumed.”

“ 234B. Any Bill so restored to the notice-paper shall thenceforth be proceeded with in both Houses, as if its passage had not been interrupted by a prorogation, and, if finally passed, be presented to the Governor-General for His Majesty's assent.

234C. Should the motion for restoration to the notice-paper be not agreed to by the House in which the Bill originated, the Bill may be introduced and proceeded with in the ordinary manner.”

COPYRIGHT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Debate resumed from 24th August (vide page 1432), on motion by Senator KEATING—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—By the courtesy of Senator Millen, who moved the adjournment of the debate on Friday last, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes while I make one or two observations on this Bill. It is always refreshing to get a Bill which rises above and is outside the stormy limits of party politics. I do not think that this is a Bill which ought to, or, indeed, can, raise any political or party animosity.

We may approach the measure from the same point of view as we should approach what we have called machinery Bills. There are three kinds of Bills with which this Parliament has to deal under the Constitution. There are those Bills which are known by the name I have just applied to them, namely, machinery Bills. There is a second class, which I may call Bills of uniformity—that is, Bills dealing with subjects which do not come within the ambit exactly of machinery Bills or of party politics, but are intended to secure uniformity of legislation on matters of public utility and public necessity. And there is a third class, which may be described as Bills of policy—that is, new Bills which are in the highest degree controversial. In machinery and uniformity Bills there may be much debatable matter as to details, but, so far as the principle involved is concerned, they involve no matter of controversy. If the time is opportune the principle we naturally adopt without much debate. At any rate, there is nothing in the principle which would induce any one to oppose the second reading of such a Bill. This Bill, dealing with copyright, if not machinery in the strict sense of the term, is at any rate within the second category of uniformity Bills like those relating to companies and bankruptcy, both of which, I hope, before many sessions are over, will be dealt with in order to prevent that conflict of procedure—a conflict that very often amounts almost to principle—which prevails in the diverse legislation of the various States. In regard to Bills of that character, we may disagree on details; but as a rule the principle is incontestable. This Bill has a further claim to my good will, in that it happens to be a Bill of the late Government, framed but not finally revised before they left office. In the third place, it has a special claim in that in it we are seeking to do what the Imperial Copyright Commission, who reported in 1878, declared to be an absolute necessity in relation to copyright, namely, to place the copyright law on something like a clear and intelligible footing. The main criticism of that very influential Commission, which carried on its labours from 1875 to 1878, was that, through the complexity and the number of the Acts of Parliament relating to copyright, we had merely a piecemeal method of dealing with the subject, and that if there was one body of legislation more than another which it was desirable to make clear, so that he who ran should read, if that were possible, it was the copyright legislation of England and of the Empire. This Bill is at least an effort—it was meant to be an effort by the late Government, and I take it that it is so intended by the present Government—to carry out that object, and secure for all the States a uniform copyright law which shall, as far as possible, give effect to the best views in relation to that legislation and effectual copyright up to date. The details of the measure can be very much better left to the stage of Committee; but I wish to say a few words about what the foundation of the law of copyright really is. I venture to put it in this way: That the system of copyright rests upon a recognition of the duty of Parliament and Government to secure justice to authors, and involves the recognition, on the part of Parliament and Government, of the justice of establishing a property in the fruit of a man's reason, intellect, and imagination. That, of course, cannot be given effect to—we know quite well it cannot without arguing on the subject—unless the fruits of a man's reason, intellect, and imagination are expressed. If a man's brain is applied to the construction of something which can be handled, which is tangible, then there is no difficulty, because the law says that is his property. If any one invades it, or interferes with it, or takes it away from him, the offender is liable to the penalty which would follow upon a course of that sort. But where you cannot weigh or measure, where that which you seek to make a property is imponderable, you must first define what the property is, and then protect the owner in its enjoyment. In the first instance however, you must define what the property is so that you are able to say that this particular thing which you have defined is, in the eye of the law, to be property, and that its author or creator shall be entitled to the value of it, to be ascertained by the labour he has bestowed upon it, plus that right which the law may give him to enjoy the creation of his own efforts for a certain period. There has been a very great deal of discussion as to whether there is any natural right of property whatever—whether all property is not the creature of law—and undoubtedly in relation to these fruits of intellect, reason, and imagination, there is no property unless, according to that which the law gives and defines. The result of that position is shown when you come to consider that a man's ideas involve the notion of a property. A man's ideas, so long as he has them, may be regarded at least as his natural property, but if they are communicated orally, without restriction, they may find a resting place in the hearts or the minds of his hearers. It may be good seed producing its fifty or one-hundred fold, or it may be bad seed, or it may be seed falling upon stony ground, but in either case, the ideas are parted with, because there is no enforceable right of property. In ancient times, the ideas of the philosophers were communicated orally in Athens, the eye of Greece, the mother of art and eloquence.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—By Socrates.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes; Socrates. We have all heard of the groves of Academe.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Plato taught there, but Socrates taught in the streets, anywhere he could.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The whole of the philosophers taught, and as regards that teaching, there was no possibility of establishing anything in the nature of copyright, except under some such provisions with regard to lectures, as is contained in this Bill. When, subsequently, Plato embodied the teachings of Socrates in his Memorabilia, there you had that which the law may define and say is the expression of the teaching—the mode of communicating the ideas—affixed in a certain form to which the law attaches the right of property, and which it protects by various means, that may from time to time be adopted. What we want, in order to lay a foundation for the law of copyright, is a permanent expression given to ideas for the instruction, the elevation, and the amusement of mankind. Once embodied in tangible form, then and then only, is it possible to secure the copyright, not so much in the ideas that are expressed as in the mode and form of their expression. That is, to my mind, essentially the object of copyright. If you have merely the illuminating sparks thrown off from a great intellect, "the thoughts," as it has been expressed, "that wander through eternity," you have no subject-matter on which the law can take effect. But when you have these thoughts expressed in a more or less permanent form, which the law recognises, then it is the object of copyright to protect the form in which the ideas are given expression to, rather than the ideas themselves. Property being created in that way, it enables the author to secure the right which his property should secure, and to obtain the reward of his labour. Every one must admit that that object is one of the most salutary that the human mind can contemplate. It is one which our sense of justice immediately tells us should be given effect to. But, in considering the provisions of any law dealing with the subject, we must bear in mind, that there are advantages and disadvantages; that we must not suppose that all that is left for us to do is to say that there shall be a particular form of property in products of the intellect expressed in this particular way, and that that property shall take a particular form for a particular period. We must look at the matter from each side. The advantages are that it enables a supply of good books to be kept up. We cannot have that supply of good books unless we provide some means of establishing a property in their authors. We cannot possibly have a supply of good books unless men of letters are liberally remunerated, or are placed in a position in which they can expect to be able to make a bargain for their literary wares, and receive a compensation which they may think fair and just. Of course, as Senator Keating pointed out, there are men who may write for fame and glory. In my belief there are few men, perhaps, who write simply for that reason. There are a greater number of men who write because they cannot help it—poets who write because, as Tennyson, I think, said—

I do but sing because I must;
I pipe but as the linnets sing.

One can hardly imagine Burns abstaining from writing his immortal songs from any consideration of the law of copyright, or whether copyright was to last for twenty or thirty years after his death, or was to expire when he died. We know, as far as we know anything of his life, that Shakespeare wrote not for fame and glory. In fact, he thought little or nothing of his own plays. He made his fortune out of his acting, and the conduct of the theatre to which he contributed those plays. We cannot imagine that many others

amongst the greatest writers in the English tongue wrote because of any feeling that there was a system of copyright which would enable them to be greatly remunerated. And after all, we must not forget that it is not the author who derives the greatest benefit from any system of copyright, and we must be careful not to place in the hands of others than authors the benefit to be derived from such system. It is the bookseller and the publisher, who may drive a hard bargain with the author for the copyright of his work, and who may, after the author's death, if you make the period of copyright too long, enjoy wealth which the Parliaments that legislated, and which the statesmen who proposed systems of copyright, intended to be for the author or his descendants. At one time, as Senator Keating very properly said, authors had to look a good deal to the patrons of learning—to the great and the noble. No one can say for a moment that authors should be obliged to look for that remuneration which their works should entitle them to receive to the great and the noble, or be mere dependents—as used to be the case 100 or 150 years ago—upon those who could give them a pittance from time to time, in recognition of their efforts. At the same time, we know well that these patrons of literature were indispensable, and did a very great deal, for which subsequent generations ought to be grateful, in encouraging and establishing the authors of the day in which they lived. There are great disadvantages in connexion with copyright, unless framed upon lines and within limits which are, as far as possible, just. In the first place, copyright is a monopoly, and like all monopolies, it is evil in essence. Therefore, we should be careful not to extend its operation one day or one hour beyond that which is absolutely essential, in order to secure the good that is intended. The point we should consider in giving such a monopoly is, how far it is necessary to go in order to secure the good we have in view. The difficulty is in fixing the period. Various periods have existed in English legislation on the subject. The periods of copyright differ in almost every country; and an evil, I venture to think, exists, especially in giving a posthumous monopoly—a period of copyright of undue length after the death of the author—rather than a long fixed period dating from the publication of the book intended to be protected. I myself should give, as I intend to propose later on, a fixed period, so that there might be an absolute certain basis for which the copyright shall apply, an absolute fixed and certain period upon which an author can bargain with his publisher for the remuneration to which he thinks he is entitled, and not a lengthened uncertain period which leaves him entirely in the hands of the publisher in respect of the bargain to be struck. For instance, there is no motive, as we must all feel, to increased exertion and effort on the part of an author in the production of his works by giving to that author's books a copyright of some thirty years after he is dead. Distance does not "lend enchantment to the view" of the author so far as this matter is concerned.

Senator WALKER.—In France the period is fifty years.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I cannot understand how it is that such long periods of posthumous copyright have been given. In the law that prevailed in England before the Act of 1842, there was a period of twenty-eight years of copyright. The Act of 1842 was passed in that year. The Senate has already been supplied with particulars of it, to which I shall refer in a moment. But in 1841 a Bill was introduced by Sergeant Talfourd, afterwards Mr. Justice Talfourd, giving a period of copyright extending for sixty years after the author's death; and, strangely enough, that Bill was strenuously opposed by Lord Macaulay. When we remember Macaulay's position in English literature, and the personal interest he had in the subject, his opposition to a copyright of sixty years after the death of the author must seem to be almost irresistible as a reason against the long posthumous periods. At any rate, we may well pause before giving a lengthened period after an author's death, when we remember the power and the keenness with which a principle of that kind was opposed by Lord Macaulay.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—In Japan the copyright is perpetual.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It used to be perpetual in England a good many years ago, but that was altogether destroyed by a decision of the courts. When Talfourd's Bill of 1841 was introduced, he proposed, as I have said, that copyright should extend for sixty years after the death of the author, instead of the old twenty-eight years, or the duration of the author's life, whichever should last longest. On the occasion of that Bill being considered by the House of Commons, Lord Macaulay gave a most interesting illustration of the pernicious results which would follow, and the little advantage to authors which would accrue from having such long periods of copyright. He took the case of Dr. Johnson, and I may read what he said, as it is just as applicable to this Bill in respect of the term proposed as it was to the Bill introduced by Sergeant Talfourd in 1841. Macaulay said—

Dr. Johnson died fifty-six years ago. If the law were what my honorable and learned friend wishes to make it, somebody would now have the monopoly of Dr. Johnson's works. Who that somebody would be it is impossible to say; but we may venture to guess. I guess, then, that it would have been some bookseller, who was the assign of another bookseller, who was the grandson of a third bookseller, who had bought the copyright from Black Frank, the doctor's servant and residuary legatee, in 1785 or 1786. Now, would the knowledge that this copyright would exist in 1841 have been a source of gratification to Johnson? Would it have stimulated his exertions? Would it have once drawn him out of his bed before noon? Would it have once cheered him under a fit of the spleen? Would it have induced him to give us one more allegory, one more life of a poet, one more imitation of Juvenal? I firmly believe not. I firmly believe that a hundred years ago, when he was writing our debates for the Gentleman's Magazine, he would very much rather have had twopenny to buy a plate of shin of beef at a cook's shop underground. Considered as a reward to him—

That is what every intelligent system of copyright ought to have first, and primarily and always in view—the reward to the author—the difference between a twenty years' term and a sixty years' term of posthumous copyright would have been nothing or next to nothing. But is the difference nothing to us?

Then on the other side—because the public have an interest in this; the public are entitled to have at the earliest possible period the benefit of a man's intellect thrown open to them at the cheapest possible rate—Lord Macaulay said—

I can buy Rasselas for sixpence; I might have had to give five shillings for it.

Because of course a monopoly enables the bookseller to levy blackmail—to say, "I will not print any more copies of this book, because I can keep up the price by not doing so."

I can buy the Dictionary, the entire genuine Dictionary, for two guineas, perhaps for less; I might have had to give five or six guineas for it. Do I grudge this to a man like Dr. Johnson? Not at all. Show me that the prospect of this boon roused him to any vigorous effort, or sustained his spirits under depressing circumstances, and I am quite willing to pay the price for such an object, heavy as that price is. But what I do complain of is that my circumstances are to be worse, and Johnson's none the better; that I am to give five pounds for what to him was not worth a farthing.

Lord Macaulay in that speech, and in subsequent speeches, elaborated the same thought very fully; but nothing could be more forcible and nothing more true than these remarks as applied to the undesirability of establishing a lengthened period of what he calls "posthumous copyright." There is another illustration of the disadvantages from the point of view that copyright involves a tax on readers to enable a bounty or reward to be given to authors. If you could by increasing the tax—that is, by extending the period of monopoly—increase the benefit to the authors, that would be a desirable thing; but the experience of authors, and the experience of life, and of the reading public, has shown that by increasing the tax you confer no increase of benefit on authors. My own personal belief is that by increasing the period—by having an uncertain period—you do not benefit the author; but by having a known and certain period you do benefit him. By having regard to the public interests you benefit authors. If you make copyright for the author's life, securing it by a definite term, as I shall suggest, you give to the author the highest possible benefit you can. If, on the other hand, you make copyright for a lengthened period, in the belief that you are to remember his posterity and keep them in affluence from the efforts of his mind—

Senator DOBSON.—As we ought to do.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We ought to do so if we can; but it is quite impracticable, because as a rule—there are contrary instances, no doubt—the work is sold and in the hands of strangers. It is published by strangers. By extending the period you confer no benefit upon the authors of the books, whilst publishers exploit the public for their own benefit. We know that that has been the result.

Senator MULCAHY.—It is business.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Of course it is business.

Senator KEATING.—That is largely due to the fact that, as a rule, authors know very little about copyright. It is also due to the uncertainty.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There is no uncertainty as to the law that exists now. The very fact that the report of the Royal Commission—which sat from 1875 to 1878—has never been acted upon, and its recommendations made law, is not to be got rid of by saying that Parliament had a great many other things to do which were of greater interest, and excited more concern than the question of copyright. But it is a significant fact that for twenty-seven years that report has lain dormant, and there has never been an agitation to embody its recommendations and proposed changes in the law of England in respect to copyright. If the old law of 1842, in regard to books—of course, there are many other things in relation to which changes have been made by later legislation, and to which I need not refer—which gives a period of forty-two years, or the life of the author, plus seven years, had been unjust or insufficient, it is not to be supposed that there would not have been some amendment. The report of the Royal Commission has lain dormant, although there has been a sufficient number of authors in the House of Commons, and of authors having influence with the House of Commons, and with Parliament generally, to have brought necessary changes about. But the fact that the report has lain dormant and the law has remained in operation, as it existed in 1842, shows that the period of copyright and the principle on which that period was fixed under that Act, was considered a good one, and has been effective for the protection of authors on the one hand and for giving the public the benefit of the production of good books on the other.

Senator MILLEN.—It fixes a period after the life of an author?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The period fixed is seven years. It does not go to the extent of thirty, forty, fifty, or sixty years, as was proposed in 1841, or of fifty years, as is now provided for in some continental countries. To show why that was adopted, to some extent as a compromise, I might mention that the Bill, introduced in 1842 by Lord Mahon, afterwards Earl Stanhope, provided for a copyright for the life of the author, and twenty-five years beyond. That was strenuously opposed by Macaulay, who said it was based on a wrong principle. He said, "You ought not to enlarge the uncertain period, but enlarge if you like the certain period," and it was at his instance that the twenty-five years after death was cut down to seven. Fourteen years more was added to the certain period of twenty-eight years that then existed, and forty-two years was enacted. So it was left at forty-two years, or, the life of the author and seven years, whichever term expired latest.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable and learned senator proposes to make it a fixed term, independently of the life of the author?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—So far as the period is concerned, I think that forty-two years is ample.

Senator WALKER.—Suppose a young man of twenty-five writes a book, and lives to be ninety years of age?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I should give him the benefit of copyright for his life. I should fix forty-two years after publication, or, for the author's life, whichever lasted longest. I think that would be perfectly just. I might say here that Senator Keating quite truly said that the thirty years was a suggestion merely of the Commission referred to, but it has never been adopted in England. It has never been the subject of legislation, and we, therefore, must exercise our own judgment as to what is fair and just, and we should not slavishly follow a mere recommendation of that kind, which met with the most strenuous opposition from one of the greatest authors of our time, both as to the period of sixty years and the lesser period of twenty-five years, as introduced in the Act of 1842. No doubt there are various elements to be taken into consideration. Young authors may not know the extent of their rights, but the difficulty is that, by this system of giving copyright for thirty years after an author's death, we are practically giving a totally unequal copyright to different works of the same author. For instance, if an author produces a work of which he secures copyright at twenty-five years of age, and lives to be eighty-five years of age, he has sixty years of his own life as copyright for that work, and then it is proposed under this Bill to add on to that thirty years more, which would give him a copyright of ninety years for that particular work. But if he produces a book in the maturity of his powers, say when he is about sixty years of age, he will only get fifty years copyright altogether—twenty-five years during his lifetime and twenty-five years after his death. That is not the basis on which it seems to me we should place an author in the position of fixing the remuneration for his labour. Then, too, the amount which a publisher gives bears no proportion, as a rule, to what he will draw from the work if his speculation is a successful one. He may buy from the youthful author, of whom Senator Walker speaks, and may make his fortune whilst the author may be starving. A singular illustration is given of that, which I may be forgiven for extracting from a later portion of Macaulay's speech. I refer to the celebrated case of Milton's granddaughter, and I give the illustration in the words used by Macaulay. He says—

If, sir, I wished to find a strong and perfect illustration of the effects which I anticipate from long copyright, I should select—my honorable and learned friend will be surprised—I should select the case of Milton's granddaughter. As often as this Bill has been under discussion, the fate of Milton's granddaughter has been brought forward by the advocates of monopoly. My honorable and learned friend has repeatedly told the story with great eloquence and effect. He has dilated on the sufferings, on the abject poverty, of this ill-fated woman, the last of an illustrious race. He tells us that, in the extremity of her distress, Garrick gave her a benefit, that Johnson wrote a prologue, and that the public contributed some hundreds of pounds. Was it fit, he asks, that she should receive, in this eleemosynary form, a small portion of what was in truth a debt? Why, he asks, instead of obtaining a pittance from charity, did she not live in comfort and luxury on the proceeds of the sale of her ancestor's works? But, sir, will my honorable and learned friend tell me that this event, which he has so often and so pathetically described, was caused by the shortness of the term of copyright? Why, at that time, the duration of copyright was longer than even he at present proposes to make it. The monopoly lasted not sixty years, but for ever. At the time at which Milton's granddaughter asked charity, Milton's works were the exclusive property of a bookseller. Within a few months of the day on which the benefit was given at Garrick's theatre, the holder of the copyright of Paradise Lost—I think it was Tonson—applied to the Court of Chancery for an injunction against a bookseller who had published a cheap edition of the great epic poem, and obtained the injunction. The representation of Comus was, if I remember rightly, in 1750; the injunction in 1753. Here then is a perfect illustration of the effect of long copyright. Milton's works are the property of a single publisher. Everybody who wants them must buy them at Tonson's shop, and at Tonson's price. Whoever attempts to under-sell Tonson is harassed with legal proceedings. Thousands who would gladly possess a copy of Paradise Lost must forego that great enjoyment. And what, in the meantime, is the situation of the only person for whom we can suppose that the author, protected at such a cost of the public, was at all interested? She is reduced to utter destitution. Milton's works are under a monopoly. Milton's granddaughter is starving. The reader is pillaged; but the writer's family is not enriched. Society is taxed doubly. It has to give an exorbitant price for the poems; and it has, at the same time, to give alms to the only surviving descendant of the poet.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator, I am sure, will not overlook the growing practice of book publishers paying a royalty on every book sold.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — No doubt that is so, but even in that respect we will have to consider the duration which ought to be given to the copyright. If there is a copyright for a long period of years, for the author's lifetime, we have some certain basis of computation. He and his publisher will be placed more nearly on an equal footing, in their means of determining what the profits of the venture may be, and the price which the author should receive for his work. If the whole copyright is sold, and it is not merely a question of the payment of a royalty, the author will get the benefit of a fair bargain on a basis which can, perhaps, be approximately estimated, while it could not be approximately estimated if we fixed an extended period of thirty years or fifty years after an author's death. In view of these considerations, I propose to ask the Senate to fix, as I have said, a definite period of forty-two years after publication, or for the author's life, whichever lasts longest. Of course any period is liable undoubtedly to a certain amount of abuse. We know the well-known instance of Mr. Ruskin, whose copyright, of course, extended during his life under the existing law, but who for a great many years prohibited the republication of his books. The result was, as we all know, that they went up to a perfectly fabulous price, and were unprocurable, except by wealthy men. Now, after his death, when the copyright is at an end, the public who value Mr. Ruskin's books—works of most pelucid English—have an opportunity of getting them at a comparatively small price, as any one will find on application to the booksellers of this city. Still that is a disadvantage which we cannot get rid of, and which might or might not be incidental to the justice which we seek to do in giving an author a copyright at least during his own life, but fixing it definitely so that there shall be none of the posthumous copyright to which so much exception is taken, and which leads to very much evil and disad-vantage. I hope we shall be able, in this Bill, to insert a fixed period, instead of a provision for the period of an author's life, with so long a posthumous period as thirty years beyond. There are only one or two other matters to which I desire to refer. I should like to see a definition in the Bill as to what is meant by publication. Some doubt exists on that subject in relation to books published for private circulation—books published at the instance of subscribers, and issued only to subscribers, who must subscribe for the whole set, and so on, and books published in the ordinary way, and thrown open to the purchasing and reading public.

Senator PEARCE.—Does not the definition in the Bill cover the ground?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think it does. It does not seem to me to be quite clear enough. It deals with the offering of the book for sale, but one might offer for sale a book published for private circulation. It depends who offers it for sale, and I think some words should be introduced which would indicate the offering for sale without reference to the author. That is a matter which can be better considered in Committee. Then there is another very important subject, which must be looked at in going through the Bill in detail. I hope nothing will induce the Senate to hastily pass this Bill as a mere matter of form, as something which we do not understand, or as a technical measure which we should take entirely upon trust. A measure of this kind should have the fullest consideration given to every line of every clause, so that we may have every possible explanation of the views of the jurists and text-writers who have dealt with the subject, and no provision be inserted unless as the result of the deliberate wisdom of Parliament. That is particularly important, because, as the Minister in charge of the Bill has pointed out, the Imperial Copyright Act is in operation in Australia, and any provision in this Bill which conflicts with that law crumbles into dust, unless we have some Imperial measure, such as has been adopted in Canada, giving legislative effect to it. It must never be forgotten that, irrespective of the local law, this Imperial Copyright Act is in operation in Australia, and that every Australian author who publishes a book here is entitled to the benefit of that law. Whatever we may legislate—for instance, as to the period—

if it be inconsistent with the Imperial law, it can have no effect until ratified by the Imperial authorities. It is, therefore, incumbent upon us to be particularly careful that we do not impinge on, or conflict with, that Imperial law. I am sure that the Minister, when we come to deal with the Bill in detail, will assist us on each clause, and guide us as to how far it may be affected by, or how far it, in its turn, affects the existing Imperial legislation. At any rate, I ask the Minister not to hastily push this Bill through Committee, because it is pre-eminently a Bill for caution and not for haste. The object is one of the highest to which we can direct our attention, namely, to protect the fruits of a man's intellect—the results of the effort of his brain—as distinguished from the efforts of a man's hands in constructing tangible articles which we can see and deal with as ordinary property. Although the object is a great one, the mode of carrying it into effect is difficult; and we should take every possible opportunity to consider and investigate each provision we propose to introduce, that we may place on the statute-book, not merely a measure which will achieve the purpose we all have in view, but a measure in such a form that it will be a credit to Commonwealth legislation.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—It was a great privilege to hear the addresses of Senator Keating and Senator Symon on this Bill. I do not propose to speak at any great length; but there are one or two points to which I am justified in drawing attention. The States have certain rights, which, it is desired, shall be preserved in this measure. For instance, the New South Wales Copyright Act of 1879 stipulates that a copy of every book first published in that State must be delivered to the Public Library and the University of the State within two months of publication on a penalty of £10.

Senator MILLEN.—Is there any reason for that law?

Senator WALKER. — Mr. H. C. L. Anderson, Registrar of Copyrights in New South Wales, has drawn the attention of the Premier of that State to the necessity to preserve this right; I mention that fact for what it may be worth. If the same principle were carried out throughout the Commonwealth, each Parliament, Public Library, and University would want a copy, and, as there are seven Parliaments, four Universities, and six Libraries, each author would require to give seventeen free copies of his work. As pointed out by Senator Keating and Senator Symon, if we pass a Bill that conflicts with the Imperial Act, we shall require the King's consent to our measure. I intend to present a petition—embodying what was represented in the petition which to-day was ruled irregular—pointing out that the authors of Australia are placed at a great disadvantage in relation to America. Australian authors cannot have their books copyrighted in America, unless they are simultaneously printed there, whereas American books may be freely imported into Australia under the Imperial Copyright Act. It may perhaps be interesting and instructive to read one or two extracts from a letter written by Mr. Anderson on the point to which I first alluded. Mr. Anderson says—

The privileges at present enjoyed secure to our Public Library complete files of all country newspapers (about 340), and a copy of everything, large or small, that is published in the State. It saves an expenditure of at least £500 or £600 per annum, and it is obviously necessary that a State Library should contain files of all newspapers published in that State, and all its general literature; and if these were not supplied to the library under the terms of the Copyright Act of 1879 they would have to be paid for. The newspapers of 100 years ago are our greatest treasures for historical students to-day, and the same will probably be true in the future.

Further, the State Copyright Act of 1879 provides for the registration of copyright in "designs," to which it gives protection for two or three years, and it is a provision that is largely availed of. No such protection is given in the Federal Bill. The result of the Bill, if passed in its present form, would be, on proclamation being made by the Governor-General, to take the administration of the whole of the State Act, so far as it relates to copyright, out of the hands of the State authorities, and vest it in the Commonwealth. Consequently, the State authorities would be no longer able to register copyright in "designs," and it would seem that the Federal authorities would have no power to register "designs" either. As a result, new designs would be left unprotected in the future, failing new State legislation in that direction.

I notice that in the Bill simultaneous publication means publication within fourteen days.

Senator KEATING.—That is provided in clause 5.

Senator WALKER.—When we get into Committee, I have several little points to bring forward, but I shall not detain honorable senators now, further than to congratulate Senator Keating and Senator Symon again on their interesting and instructive addresses.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—The person who wrote the letter from which Senator Walker has quoted, overlooks the fact that this Bill does not touch the question of designs. The Constitution gives the Commonwealth power to legislate on copyright, patents, inventions, and designs, and trade marks. We have already passed a Bill dealing with patents, and there is at present a measure before another place dealing with trade marks. The Bill now under consideration deals with copyright, and I take it that it is the intention of the Government to, at some time or other, introduce a measure relating to designs. At present, however, so far as designs are concerned, Mr. Anderson's fears are unfounded. I find some difficulty in criticising the Bill, because of what I take to be an innovation. Previously, when we have had measures dealing with such subjects, there have been marginal notes indicating the sources of the various clauses, whereas in this Bill there is an absence of any such information. That makes it difficult for honorable senators to compare the provisions with existing legislation. We have to do all the foraging for ourselves.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There are fourteen different Acts besides the report of the Royal Commission to compare with the Bill.

Senator PEARCE.—Senator Keating in introducing the measure, indicated that it is largely based on the report of the Royal Commission. It would have been helpful to honorable senators in the case of a highly technical measure of this description, if some indication had been given as to what portions of the Bill are based on the report of the Commission, and what are based on existing legislation. We should then have been able to see how far the Bill clashes with, or takes away, existing rights in the States. There are one or two clauses in which this difficulty arises in very acute form. One of the first points that struck my attention was the definition of "artistic work," which, according to the Bill, includes—

(a) any painting, drawing, or sculptor; and

(b) any engraving, etching, print, lithograph, woodcut, photograph, or other work of art produced by any process, mechanical or otherwise, by which impressions or representations of works of art can be taken or multiplied.

An important question here arises. I do not know whether my reading of the law is right, but it might be possible, by obtaining copyright for a lithograph, or similar work, to use it practically as a trade mark, and so to obtain under this Bill what could not be obtained under a Trade Mark Act. It is a common practice to use a lithograph or an engraving as a trade mark; and if a person may take out a copyright, he will be under no necessity to register under the trade mark law. Under the latter he could register for only fourteen years, whereas a copyright may be obtained for a life time, and thirty years afterwards. In America it has been found necessary to make provision for this particular contingency, and I have given notice of an amendment on the point. The Act of Congress, relating to patents, trade marks, and copyright, was approved on the 18th June, 1874. Section 3 is as follows:—

That in the constitution of this Act the words "engraving, cut, and print," shall be applied only to pictorial illustrations or works connected with the fine arts, and no prints or labels designed to be used for any other articles of manufacture shall be entered under the copyright law, but may be registered in the Patent Office. And the Commissioner of Patents is hereby charged with the supervision and control of the entry or registry of such prints or labels, in conformity with the regulations provided by law as to copyright of prints, except that there shall be paid for recording the title of any print or label, not a trade mark, six dollars, which shall cover the expense of furnishing a copy of the record, under the seal of the Commissioner of Patents, to the party entering the same.

There are subsequent sections to carry out the intention to prevent the copyrighting of these particular pictures, or works of art. It seems to me that some such provision is necessary in this definition of "artistic work," to prevent a person copyrighting things which might be called works of art, but which are really to be used as trade marks. The Bill provides that copyright shall subsist for thirty years after the death of the author. That is, I think, altogether too long. Of course, the argument is brought forward that the author has the same right to protection for the product of his brain as has the author of a patent. Under the patent law a patentee enjoys the right for fourteen years, and in certain circumstances he can extend the period. But I fail to see why we should give copyright, not only to an author for his life-time, but to somebody else, for thirty years after the author's death. I indorse what Senator Symon said on that subject, but the amendment he suggested to substitute forty-two years might create almost as great an evil. If, after copy-righting his work, an author were to die, the copyright would subsist for forty-two years, that is, for twelve years longer than it would under the Bill as it is framed. It seems to me that the honorable and learned senator might do better by adopting the term of the author's life, and a shorter term after his death, or by abolishing the latter term. By giving copyright for forty-two years, irrespective of the length of the author's life, we might bring about all the results which the honorable and learned senator depicted, and perhaps intensify them. Clause 33 is a very interesting one, and induces me to call attention to the danger of the practice of omitting the marginal note from a clause. This is the clause which gives copyright in cable news to newspapers. On reading it one might almost be led to think that it merely carries on existing legislation. But so far as three States are concerned, and also, I think, as regards the United Kingdom, it is an innovation. The laws of Queensland, New South Wales, and Victoria give no statutory copyright in cable messages or news. After the news has been published, any person is free to republish it. So that as far as those States are concerned, the clause proposes to give to the owners of press messages therein a monopoly which they do not hold under their copyright law. Under State law copyright is given for forty-eight hours in Tasmania, for from twenty-four to thirty-six hours under circumstances in South Australia, and for seventy-two hours in Western Australia. In Great Britain, too, there is no copyright in such news. Can any reason be shown why, in the States where copyright in cable messages does not exist, it should be given? Had a marginal note been attached to the clause, it would, I think, have given rise to strong discussion, and drawn attention to the fact that we were conferring a right in three States which did not previously exist. Take clause 51, which deals with the liability in respect to the use of a theatre. It is so vaguely worded as to be somewhat dangerous. It commences in this way—

Where a dramatic or musical work is performed in a theatre or other place in infringement of the performing right of the owner of that right, the person who permitted the theatre or place to be used for the performance shall be deemed to have infringed the performing right, and shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.

It goes on to provide for the imposition of a penalty. A person who proposed to stage a play might incur great expense on rehearsals and scenery, and a rival, for the purpose of damaging him, might choose to stop the performance of the play. If he wrongfully did so, a penalty is provided, but it is altogether disproportionate to the harm and damage which he might have done. It would not be the first time that it was done. We should be very careful not to frame a law which would practically offer an incentive to men to do that sort of thing. The penalty to be imposed upon a person who takes this course without just cause, is £20. One has only to consider the great cost which a theatrical proprietor is put to in staging a play to recognise that a penalty of £20 would not be at all commensurate with the injury which might be done to him by a person who took advantage of this provision to stop its performance.

Senator KEATING.—I have here the draft of a new clause to provide that where a notice is given, and is not bonâ fide, by one who is not the owner of the performing-right, or agent, to make it an offence punishable by imprisonment.

Senator PEARCE.—That would be better, and I am glad that the necessity for the stringent amendment has been recognised by the Government. With these few exceptions, the Bill seems to be one which will be of service to the fine arts and to authors. I had hoped that Senator Keating or Senator Symon, being lawyers, would have explained how it comes that this Bill makes provision for the operation of the common law of the United Kingdom. It seems to me to be an innovation.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Where does the Bill do that?

Senator PEARCE.—Clause 7 says—

Subject to this and any other Acts of the Parliament, the common law of England relating to proprietary rights in unpublished literary compositions shall, after the commencement of this Act, apply throughout the Commonwealth.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That clause is altogether unnecessary, because the common law applies, unless it is changed by legislation.

Senator PEARCE.—Senator Keating pointed out that in passing the Bill we had to remember that the common and statute law of the United Kingdom, and two copyright conventions, applied to the Commonwealth. In connexion with not only this subject, but also navigation, the question will arise as to how far we are entitled to legislate, and as to how our law will stand if it clashes with Imperial law. Supposing that there is any doubt on the point, is it advisable to put in this Bill a clause which seems to give away the position, so far as the superiority of our law is concerned? I was under the impression that we had power to legislate exhaustively on the question of copyright; but it would seem that our power is limited. If that is the case, I should like some lawyer in the Senate to point out how far we can deal with these questions, because, according to my reading of the Constitution, our power is not limited where we are given exclusive jurisdiction on any subject.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—It is a pity that Senator Keating did not introduce this measure at an early part of Thursday's sitting, when he might have been able to furnish more information than he could give when he began his speech at a late hour. No doubt, he curtailed his remarks very considerably, owing to that fact.

Senator DOBSON.—I thought it was a model second-reading speech, dealing with principles only.

Senator DE LARGIE.—A number of important points on which we have a right to expect some information were not touched by Senator Keating, because, as I thought, he made his speech late in the evening. I should have liked to hear better reasons given for the introduction of this Bill than have been given. I am in favour of the idea of having a Copyright Act, but at the same time it should have been made clear that there is a pressing necessity or a call from the country for a law of this kind. I know of no such demand having been made. I have not heard of any meetings being held. Of course, in some parts of the Commonwealth there may have arisen a demand of which I have not heard. So far, the necessity for the introduction of this Bill has not been satisfactorily explained. Senator Keating did not mention whether it is to be administered by the Patent Office, or whether a new office is to be created for that purpose. If a new office is to be created, it will involve considerable expenditure. Before I can support the second reading, I desire to know what the cost of administration is likely to be. If we are to be asked to pass measures which involve great expenditure, and for which there is very little call from the country, I can easily see that the Federal expenditure will increase by leaps and bounds, and that there may be some reason for the oft-repeated cry about extravagance. I hope we shall be told by Senator Keating what the cost of administering this measure will be, and whether we shall be justified in incurring that expense. I can understand that a great many officers will be required to administer its provisions, and that is why I think that the Minister might very properly have furnished better reasons for its introduction. I do not know that it is likely to benefit very many persons in Australia. I am of opinion that an Australian author of any standing will consult his interests best by bringing out his book in the United Kingdom, where there is a much larger reading public to appeal to, than there is in Australia.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is what is done. There is no urgency for this measure.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Any author who has acquired a standing will no doubt recognise that the market in which he can make the most of his work is the United Kingdom. If he looks to his own interest—which we can reasonably expect that he will do—he will have his work published there. That seems to me to be another reason against the passage of this Bill at the present time. Of course we look forward to a time when we shall have an array of writers in Australia whose works I should like to protect, just as I should like to protect the works of any other workman, because, from my point of view, a writer is a man belonging to a profession which requires a certain amount of encouragement and protection, and if we can give it without any great hindrance to the public I see no reason why we should not do so. There is some difference of opinion as to whether a measure of this kind is an advantage to literary men. Some literary men have expressed the opinion that copyright laws are not in their interest. Professor Dicey holds the opinion that the rights of literary men are best conserved when they have the utmost freedom so far as concerns their productions. There are others who view the matter from quite the opposite standpoint. For instance, Herbert Spencer declared that there was no reason whatever why a writer should not have the full benefit of any original idea that he might give to the world, and that he should have first and foremost the full value derived from his literary productions. The fact that two such eminent authors as Professor Dicey and Herbert Spencer—and I could mention others—entertain opposite views, shows that literary men are not in agreement as to the requirements of a copyright law. The principle underlying copyright may be sound in itself, but in a young country such as ours I question whether we shall be consulting the public interest by passing such a Bill. For many years the United States had no copyright law in the same sense as this. The result was that in America books for which £1 would have had to be paid in the United Kingdom could be purchased for about 2s.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Who suffered from that?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not know that any one suffered.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It was piracy.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The result was that a very much larger number of books were sold, and that publishers had a larger market.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We have passed a Customs Act which prohibits the importation of such American reprints.

Senator DE LARGIE.—That may be an argument against what I am saying; but at the same time it is worthy of consideration whether we shall consult the public interest by passing such a Bill. It has been held that a great deal of the enlightenment and up-to-dateness of the American people is due to the fact that for so many years they have been able to purchase books cheaper than the rest of the world could do. And owing to the fact that books in America are so cheap the public buy them, and have them in their homes, instead of having to borrow them from libraries.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does the honorable senator know that books in America, with the exception of pirated books, cost a great deal more than is the case in England?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I have no information on that point. It may be so; but we know that in this country books of a high class are quite out of the reach of the poor man, although they are purchas-able for a very small sum in America. There can be no two opinions as to whether it is to the advantage of the public to be able to buy a book for 2s. or for £1. I wish to say a word in reference to the clauses of the Bill affecting newspapers. I should like to know from Senator Keating whether a writer for a newspaper, working for wages, will have the benefit of protection for articles which he publishes whilst employed in that capacity? Will the copyright belong to the writer or to the man who employs him? I do not see where that is made clear in any part of the Bill.

Senator DOBSON.—If a newspaper proprietor paid a man a couple of guineas for a leader, I should say that it would belong to the newspaper.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I wish to have some information on the point. Another consideration is that under this measure copyright can be secured for cabled news. At the present time, so far as Australian newspapers are concerned, cabled news is not original. It is culled from the newspapers of the old country, and simply wired out here. If news of that kind can be copyrighted, it seems to me that an injury will be done to the public. We are well aware that certain arrangements exist amongst newspaper proprietors in Australia, and that there is a very close ring or corporation. They keep out any other newspapers whom they chose to exclude. The consequence is that country newspapers, or small weekly journals, brought out in the cities, which may desire to get information, or to enter this newspaper ring, are excluded, because of the great expense they would have to incur if they attempted to obtain cablegrams for themselves. The principal newspaper proprietors have kept the ring as a close preserve. Are we going to help these rich newspapers to boycott the country newspapers, as they have done in the past? If there were any originality about the cabled news, the case would be different; but, as a matter of fact, it is nothing more than scissors and paste work. No originality can be claimed for it by those who cable it to this country. We should, therefore, hesitate before we give to any one a title of copyright in news of that kind. If no provision is made to leave the door open for other newspapers to participate in the agencies that exist, I shall feel compelled to vote against any such protection being granted to newspaper proprietors. This is an important matter, about which Senator Keating will, I hope, be able to enlighten us when the Bill gets into Committee.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I notice from this Bill an absence of marginal notes, telling us from what source the clauses are taken. We have often found such notes of great service in the consideration of Bills. I am, however, informed that many of the clauses have been taken not from English Acts, but from Bills prepared as the result of various conventions and conferences on copyright. Those Bills, as Senator Symon tells us, have not yet been placed upon the statute-book of Great Britain. I understand that we shall have copies of them before us in due time. With regard to clause 7, as to which Senator Pearce spoke, I understand that it has been inserted simply to clear up doubts which otherwise might arise. The common law with regard to the matter as applicable to New South Wales was taken from the English common law as it existed when the State of New South Wales was founded. When subsequent States were founded, it may be that the common law of England, as altered by various decisions, was followed. In order to settle doubts, this clause was put in, to make the common law applicable in all cases, subject to the provisions of this measure. I have nothing further to say about the principles of the Bill, which were admirably stated by Senator Keating in his very able second-reading speech, upon which I desire to congratulate him.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—I also should like to compliment Senator Keating on the very informative speech which he made in moving the second reading of this Bill, and also on the very interesting historical résumé which he gave of legislation in connexion with copyright. He covered a period of about 400 years; and Senator Symon in his very able speech this afternoon drew on his extensive repertoire of information for illustrations of events that occurred over 2,000 years ago. They were all apposite, and helped to illustrate the importance and the difficulties which surround this measure. The Bill is a natural corollary to or complement of the Patents Act. The works of both author and inventor are the result of mental energy, the one directed to art and literature, the other to applied science. In both cases those who have created works of value are undoubtedly entitled to have some special privileges with regard to the remuneration derived from them. But there is a considerable difference in the extent of time to which we are giving exclusive privileges, in the case of an ordinary patent and in that of a copyright. A patent is allowed to continue for fourteen years; a copyright under this Bill for thirty years after the death of the author. While I am not prepared at the present moment to say what action I intend to take on this matter, I think it is well worthy of consideration whether we should not somewhat limit that time in the interest of the great mass of the public who are desirous to obtain works of literature, and who in many cases cannot obtain those works unless they are published in what are termed cheap editions. When this Bill was introduced, the thought occurred to my mind: "Why is such a Copyright Bill necessary, seeing that an Imperial Act applies to the whole of the British Empire, and also that the decisions arrived at by the Berne Convention of 1887 and the Paris Convention of 1896 protect the holders of copyright in the British Empire and in the various countries that were parties to these conventions?" The reason, I think, was stated by one of the speakers in the fact that the British Acts are somewhat vague, and there is a multiplicity of them. There are, I think, some seventeen Acts dealing with copyright on the British statute-book, and there is a great deal of doubt in the minds of people concerned as to their powers under those various Acts. This Bill can only be considered as a compliment to the British Act, and in consolidating the laws of the various States of Australia in one Australian Copyright Act, we shall possibly succeed in reducing the expense of registration, and may enable people to obtain copyright with greater facility. But it seems to me that any person who desires to obtain copyright, after this Bill is passed, will be able to do so in any State, either under the Imperial Act or under the Commonwealth Act, and if this measure is assented to by the Imperial authorities, in both cases the copyright acquired will apply to the whole of the British Empire, and will cover the privileges secured under the Berne and Paris conventions. I do not wish, at this stage, to say anything further, but in Committee I hope to be able to propose some amendments for the improvement of the measure.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I have a word or two to say on the Bill, but I shall not occupy the time of the Senate at any length, because there is very little to be said on the second reading of the measure after the admirable speech delivered by Senator Keating.

Senator MULCAHY.—Do not give the honorable senator too much jam.

Senator GIVENS.—I shall not give him any more jam than I think he deserves. I think he made a very good speech, notwithstanding some opinions which have been expressed to the contrary. I desire to draw attention to the fact that it will be an act of supererogation on the part of this Parliament to pass this Bill in its present form, inasmuch as it will not supersede the Imperial Act, and will not therefore be necessary. Authors in Australia, or authors outside, who may publish their works in Australia, may choose to secure copyright under the Imperial Act and ignore this measure altogether. I do not hold with the idea that the Commonwealth Act should be subservient in the smallest degree to the Imperial Act. Under sub-section XVIII. of section 51 of our Constitution, which is itself an Imperial Act, we are given power to make laws, amongst other things, with respect to copyrights. That power, I hold, is not limited in any way by any Act which the Imperial Parliament may choose to pass, or by any Imperial Act already in force, in so far as future copyright is concerned. I find that by clause 62 of this Bill it is expressly provided that the Imperial Act shall remain in force in Australia. Any one who registers copyright under the Imperial Act may do so, entirely irrespective of our law. Of what use will it be to pass this Bill if we are going to have two laws on the subject in force in Australia? I shall move an amendment in connexion with clause 62 when the Bill gets into Committee, because I consider that we have definite and unlimited powers of legislation with regard to copyright in the Commonwealth. I fail to see why we should make our law inferior or subservient to the Imperial Act, when the Imperial authorities themselves do not claim that we should do anything of the kind. It is quite correct that any rights hitherto acquired under the Imperial Act should not be interfered with by our law, but to say that in future the Imperial law should apply in just the same way as if we had not passed any Commonwealth law would, in my opinion, be absolutely ridiculous. If that is to be the case, we had better not waste time in passing this Bill. Clause 7 of the Bill provides that the common law of England shall apply throughout the Commonwealth, "subject to this Act." I have no objection to that, provided it is recognised that the common law of England shall apply where it is not in conflict with our law, and that where it is in conflict with our law on the subject it shall not apply. I think that clause 62 should be framed in the same terms, and that where the common law or statute law of England on the subject is in conflict with our Commonwealth copyright law our law should prevail. In common with most other persons, I am firmly convinced that an author or inventor has as much, if not more, right to the product of his brains, ingenuity, or industry than any individual has to any other form of property. I think that he has a greater right, inasmuch as the product of his brains, ingenuity, or industry is something of his own creation which cannot be said of a great deal of property the right to which is fully recognised by this and other Parliaments. For that reason, I gladly hail this attempt to recognise such rights by law. At the same time we should be exceedingly careful to see that any rights which we may give under this Bill shall not limit the rights of other people, and shall not interfere with the welfare of the community. Every author or inventor should remember that he is not the absolute originator of the book which he writes, or the machine which he invents. He is the heir of the accumulated knowledge of all the ages. His product is therefore not entirely his own, inasmuch as he has been enabled to avail himself of the help of the accumulated knowledge of all the people who have gone before him, and it is quite possible that if he had not stepped in another person might have produced an equally valuable work, or an equally entertaining and instructive book. I therefore think that to give a man for a very lengthy period the exclusive right to the publication of a book, whether it be a valuable scientific or a very interesting literary production would be to a certain extent to impose a tax on knowledge. I think that is something which even authors themselves could scarcely claim. If an author is given the right to the exclusive publication of his work during his life time, and for a reasonable term of years thereafter, or in the alternative for a fixed period of years, that is all he can reasonably expect. For instance, under the English law there is provided a fixed period of forty-two years, or during the author's life, which ever period is longer.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—For the author's life, plus seven years.

Senator GIVENS.—That is so, and I think some arrangement of that kind would be better than the provision in this Bill for copyright for the author's life, and thirty years. I am inclined to think that the period allowed by the Imperial statute is too long. If a man and his family have the benefit accruing from the right to the exclusive publication of his work while he lives, and until such time as the members of his family reach the age of twenty years, that is about all that can reasonably be required, and then publication should be free to all. If this Bill be passed as it stands, a man might publish a valuable work at twenty-five or thirty years of age. As a matter of fact, most of the great works have been published by comparatively young men. Chatterton published a volume of poems long before he was twenty years of age. Byron also was a distinguished poet before he had reached the age of manhood.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Burns died at thirty-seven years of age.

Senator GIVENS.—Byron died when he was thirty-six years of age, and we know that a great many writers published valuable works at an early age. Under this Bill a man who publishes a valuable book when he is twenty-five years of age, and who lives to the age of seventy-five years, is given for himself, his heirs, and those to whom he may assign his property, an absolute copyright of that book for seventy years—that is, for thirty years after his death. That period is altogether too long, and I think a reasonable limit of time, in addition to a man's life, should be fixed, or, in the alternative, a reasonable fixed period. I shall move in that direction when the Bill gets into Committee. Again, with regard to the publication of news, it is a well-known fact that, so far as Australia is concerned, newspapers have arranged a sort of combine, or ring, for obtaining news from abroad, and unless the proprietor of a newspaper accedes to the terms of those forming the ring, it is impossible for him to be supplied with news, unless he goes to the expense, which is entirely prohibitive, of having a news agent abroad himself, and getting news separately cabled to him for his particular use. I think this Parliament should do nothing to assist a combine of the kind I have mentioned to become more harsh in its operations. In some of the States, at the present time, a much shorter period than the twenty-four hours provided for in this Bill is allowed for the exclusive copyright in the publication of news. If a newspaper published in Melbourne in the morning is given six hours' copyright of its news, that should be quite sufficient, because no other newspaper could publish that news, after the expiration of six hours, and continue to call itself a morning newspaper. For instance, if the Age were to come out with an exclusive item of news in its first edition, published at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, the fact that it would have the exclusive right to the publication of that news for six hours afterwards would render it impossible for any other newspaper to copy it until nine o'clock that morning. Of what use would that news be then to the Argus, or to any other morning journal?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The evening newspaper could copy the news.

Senator GIVENS.—Certainly it could; but of what use is stale news in an evening newspaper? We often find news in the evening newspaper published in Melbourne which we do not find in the newspapers published on the following morning. I contend that six hours' copyright would be ample protection for newspapers. Suppose, on the contrary, that an item of news is first published in an evening newspaper, the first edition of which is published about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. It would be 9 o'clock in the evening before it could be copied by any other newspaper. By that time the news would be useless to any newspaper proprietor who contemplated piracy. I therefore contend that six hours is ample; after that period the news should be public property, available for country newspaper proprietors and others.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I should not give five minutes in the case of a close corporation.

Senator GIVENS.—I should allow a reasonable time for copyright in exclusive items of news.

Senator HIGGS.—Supposing there is an exclusive ring?

Senator MCGREGOR.—Yes; a ring which will not allow any one else to join.

Senator GIVENS.—There should be some way of getting at such a ring, and I should do all I possibly could to get at them. It is further proposed in the Bill that a lecturer shall have a copyright in his lecture for the same lengthy period provided in the case of an author of a book. It is quite a common practice for lectures to be fully reported in a newspaper, and, if the subject be particularly interesting, to be copied in part by other newspapers. I desire to know whether the proprietors of the newspapers which thus copy portions of a lecture, will be liable for a technical breach of the copyright law? The Bill seems to be very far reaching in this respect, and would, doubtless, affect people who in no way desire to offend against the law. It will be necessary to scrutinize the measure very carefully in Committee, so as to make it consistent with the protection of the author and the welfare of the public. Publishers in the early stages of copyright law, at any rate, have reaped the main advantages of it, as compared with the authors. At the present time, publishers buy copyrights at very small prices, and if the books subsequently become popular they get a rich return, while the authors very often have to go hungry; in fact, some Australian authors are extremely hungry at the present time. To my knowledge, publishers have, in more than one case, made handsome profits out of copyrights bought at an exceedingly low figure; and some arrangement should be made to prevent an author exercising that absolute freedom of contract which publishers so much favour. Some of the profit, at any rate, should be reserved for an author, notwithstanding any sale he may make; he should not be allowed to give away or part with the whole of the rights conferred by the Act. So long as a publisher may possess an assigned right in a particular work, so long will he clamour to buy such rights at an infinitesimal price. Authors have at all times been a struggling class, and publishers have taken advantage of their position and shamefully sweated them. In other directions, we have legislated somewhat effectively, I believe, to prevent sweating, and I do not see why the same protection, or as much as is possible, should not be extended to the struggling author who has hitherto not enjoyed too much of the good things of life. The principle of the Bill is good, and I shall be glad to see it pass the second reading, and to do what I can to amend the provisions in Committee.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I should like to say a few words in answer to the criticisms which have been directed to particular clauses of the Bill. I am very glad to recognise that the disposition of honorable senators who have addressed themselves to the subject is one that indicates a desire to pass an effective and creditable Copyright Bill. Senator Symon, in speaking of the term of protection which it is proposed to confer on authors, and which he desires to alter, showed that he was animated by a very strong desire to place on our statute-book copyright legislation that will be, as he said, a credit to Parliament. Senator Walker, in the course of his remarks, referred to a letter in which Mr. Anderson, of the Public Library, Sydney, pointed out that, under the Copyright Act of New South Wales, certain publications must be supplied to that library. I may say that there is no desire on the part of the Government, in introducing this measure, to take away from that or similar institutions in the Commonwealth any of the rights or privileges which they at present enjoy. After the Bill was introduced, and before the second reading was proposed, I was approached by a representative of the trustees of the Melbourne Public Library, and asked whether the effect of the measure would be to deprive that institution of certain publications now received under the State copyright law.

Senator DOBSON.—I suppose the Minister proposes to treat all public libraries alike?

Senator KEATING.—The treatment of public libraries in this respect is a matter for the States themselves. Those rights and privileges are enjoyed by the libraries under the operation of State law, and I do not think that any provision in the Bill before us will deprive them of any such rights and privileges.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I am afraid it will.

Senator KEATING. — It will still be competent for the States to provide by legislation that the publications in question shall continue to be supplied to the libraries. That is not a matter which necessarily comes within the purview of copyright legislation; but, in order that there shall be no doubt whatever, I am having some amendments prepared for insertion in clause 8 to provide that this Bill shall affect the copyright laws of the States only in so far as copyright itself is concerned. That will insure that the States, in the connexion referred to, will not be interfered with, and may continue to enjoy their rights and privileges as though the present Bill had not been passed, and their own Acts remained in force.

Senator DOBSON. — If a State has no Public Library, this Bill will not confer the privilege?

Senator KEATING.—It is proposed to leave the matter entirely to the operation of States law.

Senator DOBSON.—Could a State afterwards provide that a Public Library shall be supplied with such publications?

Senator KEATING. — Yes, as States provide at present. The supply of these publications to public libraries and other institutions is not made a condition of copyright.

Senator MILLEN.—Why should we use a Federal law to enable these institutions to levy toll on authors?

Senator KEATING.—We are not doing so; we are simply providing that the provisions of this Bill shall affect States Acts only so far as copyright is concerned.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Would it not be better to provide that a certain number of copies of publications shall be sent to the Copyright Office for distribution amongst those institutions?

Senator DOBSON.—That would be a better way.

Senator KEATING.—It is not for us to make such a provision in regard to the public libraries of the States. I am not debating the merits of the proposed amendment just now, but merely indicating that the matter received consideration between the first and second readings of the Bill, and that I propose to submit an amendment to remove a doubt about the operation of the existing States laws. Senator Pearce addressed himself to clause 7, and asked whether it was not curious we should enact that the common law of England shall apply in the Commonwealth. Clause 7 provides—

Subject to this and any other Acts of the Parliament, the common law of England relating to proprietary rights in unpublished literary compositions shall, after the commencement of this Act, apply throughout the Commonwealth.

The rights in respect of unpublished literary compositions are not copyrights.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The compositions are the personal property of the writer.

Senator KEATING.—That is so; it is a case of the common law in regard to manuscripts.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is it necessary to enact the common law?

Senator KEATING.—When a manuscript has been published it may be subject to copyright at common law or statutory copyright; and it is obviously necessary that we should have the common law of England, subject to this Bill, applying throughout the Commonwealth. Senator Pearce thinks that the definition of "artistic work" may be construed so widely as to enable a label to be copyrighted and practically used in the place of a trade mark. When we come to the discussion of that point, we shall have an opportunity to narrow down the definition if it be too wide, though I do not think the discussion will reveal that to be the case. As to the remarks of Senator Pearce and Senator Givens, on the question of cable news copyright, the present position is that in Tasmania the copyright continues for forty-eight hours from publication, while in New South Wales the copyright is for twenty-four hours from publication, but not more than thirty-six hours from the receipt of the cable; that is to say, an owner of a newspaper has no exclusive right to cable news after thirty-six hours from its receipt. In Western Australia, the period of exclusive use is seventy-two hours. I do not know whether in Western Australia, or in the other States, this right is conferred by separate Act, but that is the case in Tasmania; indeed, the only copyright statute in the latter State is the Newspaper Copyright Act. If there be no provision in the Bill with regard to the term of copyright of such news, it seems to me that the Tasmanian Act will remain in full force there.

Senator PEARCE.—In the other States not mentioned, there is no copyright in news.

Senator KEATING.—There is no statutory copyright; what rights there may be in this respect at common law have not been determined, so far as I know. Senator Pearce also referred to clause 54, which deals with the power of the owner of the performing right in a musical or dramatic work to forbid performance in infringement of his right. To deal with this point, I am having prepared a clause which will provide that if a person falsely represents that he is the owner of a copyright or performing right, or that he is the agent of any such owner, he shall be guilty of an offence, the punishment for which shall be imprisonment. Of course, a person has every right to give such notice if he has reasonable cause to believe that some one is going to infringe his right. Senator de Largie says there is no demand on the part of the public for any legislation of this kind, and he does not clearly realize why it is necessary. In Great Britain the copyright statutes are of the character I described when I quoted from Mr. Scrutton's excellent little work on the law of copyright. There is no harmony in them; they are, as he says, ill-drawn; they leave a considerable amount of doubt as to what are the rights of authors and those whom they purport to protect. In addition to Imperial legislation operating in Australia, we have Copyright Acts in the different States conferring different terms of protection, and subject to varying conditions. To some of these laws I referred in my opening speech. It is desirable that we should have a harmonious and uniform system of copyright law for the six States. Again, owing to the defective state of the law, a considerable amount of piracy has taken place in times past. We have endeavoured by the Customs Act to prevent the importation of pirated reproductions of a copyrighted work, but we have not always been as successful as we wished to be. When we reach the clauses in Committee, I shall be able to give Senator de Largie and others illustrations of how persons who have been the owners of copyright, particularly in artistic works, have been victimized in Australia by the way in which pirated reproductions of their works have been brought in and sold at a very small value. I do not think that Senator de Largie need apprehend that the administration of the measure will be so expensive as to constitute a burden on the general revenue. It may be provided by regulations in connexion with registration that such small fees shall be paid as will to some extent tend to balance the revenue with the expenditure. The honorable senator also asked a question in regard to copyright in articles supplied to newspapers or magazines by a paid writer, and on that point I direct his attention to clause 22. The other criticism came from Senator Givens, and dealt with the operation of Imperial legislation.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Which office is going to administer the Bill—the Patents Office?

Senator KEATING.—Most likely it will be administered by the Department of Trade and Customs. As Senator Givens indicated his intention to bring up in Committee the matters to which he referred, perhaps it will be better to reserve their discussion until that stage is reached.

Senator WALKER.—The Minister does not propose to provide for copyright in designs.

Senator KEATING. — No, that will form the subject of a separate Bill. I hope we shall have the opportunity of bringing in that Bill during the present session, and getting it put through, so that we may complete the scheme of legislation on which we entered when we passed the Patents Bill.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a second time.

In Committee:

Clause 1 agreed to.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—In moving—

That the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again,

I wish to indicate that I heard the representations made by some honorable senators in discussing the second reading. I think it might facilitate the consideration of the measure if some information of the character they referred to were supplied to them. Originally it was my intention to have a memorandum prepared on this highly technical Bill, which would help honorable senators to understand its provisions. Before the consideration of the Bill in Committee is resumed, I shall endeavour to get such information supplied to them as will enable them to properly approach its consideration.

Senator MILLEN.—Will the honorable and learned senator fix a date, so that those honorable senators who may not be in Victoria when the memorandum is distributed will have an opportunity of seeing it before the consideration of the Bill is resumed?

Senator KEATING.—I shall endeavour to get the memorandum ready for honorable senators by to-morrow.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I am very glad that the Minister has adopted this course.

The CHAIRMAN.—A motion to report progress is not debatable, and if this debate is to be continued it must be understood that it does not establish a precedent.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I did not rise to debate what the Minister said, but rather to ask a question, because even to a lawyer the subject of copyright is not a familiar every-day one. It is a good many years since a copyright case has been tried in my State. I was going to ask the Minister if the particulars in the memorandum he proposes to prepare will refer to the different clauses on which he thinks information is necessary, in order that we may be able to apply to their consideration a reasonable appreciation of the very complex and multifarious legislation that exists?

Senator KEATING.—Yes.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Perhaps the Minister will intimate when he is likely to bring the measure on again in Committee?

Senator KEATING.—On Wednesday next. Question resolved in the affirmative. Progress reported.

Senate adjourned at 5.39 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 30 August, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the Chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITIONS.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON presented five petitions from certain residents of South Australia, praying that stringent legislation be enacted to prohibit the importation and sale of opium for smoking purposes within the Commonwealth.

Mr. HUTCHISON presented seven similar petitions from residents of South Australia.

Mr. GLYNN presented four similar petitions from residents of South Australia.

Petitions received.

Mr. CHANTER.—Referring to the point of order taken by the honorable member for Kennedy yesterday, in regard to a petition presented by the honorable and learned member for Wannon, I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, if you have yet arrived at a decision in the matter?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I said that I would look through the petition, and if I found that it was one which should not have been received, would report the fact to the House. I have looked through it, but as I did not come to the conclusion that it should not have been received, I have no report to make.

CONDUCT OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILKS.—I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question in regard to the following paragraph, which has appeared in the Melbourne Age.—

The Federal Labour Party is prepared to support the Prime Minister in any measures he may see fit to take to secure speedier progress with legislation in the House of Representatives. If the Opposition resents the application of the new 11.30 p.m. closing time rule, members of the party are willing to assist the Government by providing relays to form a quorum during any all night sittings which may become necessary. Labour members freely say that Mr. Deakin must be prepared to fight the organized obstruction of the Opposition without mercy for the rest of the session if he is to see legislation now in suspense passed into law. The policy of "graceful concession" must be frankly abandoned when dealing with the Cooks, Wilks, or Sydney Smiths.

Is there any foundation for the statement that the Prime Minister has made, or is making, such an arrangement with that section of his supporters, known as the Labour Party, who are acting as galley slaves to this Government, and who are so desirous of repressing the right of criticism and the free discussion of political measures?

Mr. DEAKIN.—On behalf of the House, I take exception to the phrase which the honorable member has applied to a section of it, which is indefensible in regard to any party. The paragraph referred to was published without my knowledge, and the statement it contains is news. The honorable member for Corangamite has publicly alluded to possibilities of the same kind, but I do not attribute it to him. So far from desiring to take advantage of any arrangement to suppress criticism, I agreed with the honorable member for Dalley last evening that at 10.45 p.m. I would accede to the request of a member of the Opposition, whom he named, that progress should be reported. I was, therefore, surprised when the honorable member for Darwin rose to speak, but when he informed me that he could not conclude his speech before 11.30 p.m., felt that I could not refuse to him a courtesy which had already been promised to a member of the Opposition.

Mr. WILSON.—The suggestion that I have given to the Age the information on which the paragraph referred to is based is without foundation. That journal is not in the habit of coming to me for information, nor would it be likely to publish any information that I might give to it. The remarks which I made recently outside were made on my own responsibility, and without consultation with any member on this side of the Chamber. I was not present on Friday last, when the Prime Minister made an announcement as to the future conduct of business, but I read in the press that he had said that he intended to force members to sit late, and I replied that, if that was to be done, I would be prepared to meet force with force.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—If an understanding has been arrived at between the Prime Minister and the honorable member for Dalley, that a member of the Opposition should open the discussion on the Budget this afternoon, I am ready to give way.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The understanding was only in regard to the hour of adjournment last night.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Referring to the answer given by the Prime Minister yesterday that "exemption certificates are not generally used in connexion with British subjects," I would like him to state what steps must be taken, either in Australia or in Great Britain, by an employer who wishes to bring here labour under contract, or by an employé who wishes to come here under contract? Where must such steps be taken?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It was intimated, when the first case in connexion with the Act arose, that the proper course to follow in such instances would be to send the terms of the proposed contract to the Government, while the proper Department to address, either within Australia or from beyond the Commonwealth, would be the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. WILSON.—I learn from a paragraph in one of this morning's newspapers that it is the intention of the authorities of the Church of England in South Australia to import a Bishop from England. I should like to know, for the information of the public, what proceedings must be taken by them to provide for his introduction?

Mr. CONROY.—In view of the importance of this subject, I ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared to amend the Act, so as to make it clear that passports are not required by British subjects coming here, and that its provisions apply only to men coming out under contract to fill the places of others on strike.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Whenever the amendment of this or any other Act is intended, it will be a matter of Ministerial policy which will be duly communicated to the House.

RUSO-JAPANESE WAR.

Mr. CROUCH.—Seeing the importance to us as a Pacific Power of the war in the East, I ask the Prime Minister if he is able to announce to the House the receipt of any official communication in regard to the declaration of peace between Japan and Russia, which is alleged to have been concluded?

Mr. DEAKIN.—There is no official information. If there were, it would have been my duty to convey it to the House. I am informed, however, that the assertion is made by the cable correspondents who serve almost the whole of the Australian press that peace has been officially declared. If that intelligence be true, and there is good reason to believe that it is, no more welcome news has reached this Commonwealth for many months past. The cessation of this sanguinary and costly war will be hailed with the greatest satisfaction by peoples all round the world, and nowhere will the restoration of friendly relations in the East, and the developments which we trust will follow the declaration of peace, be more hopefully hailed than in the Commonwealth.

QUARANTINE AND LIGHT-HOUSES.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Have the Government considered the advisability of taking under the Constitution powers in regard to the control of quarantine, light-houses, &c.? If so, do they propose to do this at an early date?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The matter is under consideration, and, if time will permit, will probably be submitted this session.

EXPORT OF AUSTRALIAN HARVESTERS.

Mr. ROBINSON asked the Minister of Trade and Customs, upon notice—

Whether he will inform the House how many "Stripper Harvesters" of Australian origin have been exported from 1st July, 1904, to 1st August, 1905, and to what places?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In reply to the honorable and learned member I have to state:—

Number exported (1905), 252. Destination—Argentina, Algeria, Cape Colony, Italy, Tunis.

Prior to 1st January, 1905, no separate record was kept of the imports and exports of stripper harvesters as distinct from agricultural implements, therefore no particulars can be given for the year 1904.

NEW SHORT SERVICE RIFLES.

Mr. CROUCH asked the Minister representing the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. In the new short service rifles issued to the Light Horse, is it true that these have no "cut off" to the magazines?

2. Is it safe to issue rifles under such conditions?

3. Were these rifles sent in this condition by the British War Office; and is it further true that no bayonets have been supplied with these rifles?

4. What action does the Minister of Defence propose to take under the circumstances?

Mr. EWING.—I have been supplied with the following answers:—

1. Yes. The Department in this are following the lead of the War Office. In the Imperial service the "cut off" is only provided for the short rifle for use by the Naval Force.

2. The "cut off" is provided so as to temporarily convert the magazine rifle into a "single loader," and not for purposes of safety.

3. (a) Yes; the rifles were sent out from the War Office without "cut offs."

(b) No bayonets were ordered as it is proposed to make use of our large stock of triangular bayonets by having them locally converted into a "rapier" bayonet. Designs are now under consideration.

4. It is proposed, for the present, to follow the Imperial practice.

HORSHAM-WARRACKNABEAL TELEPHONE.

Mr. ROBINSON asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether he is aware that telephonic communication between Horsham and Warracknabeal was authorized some considerable time ago?

2. When is such communication likely to be established?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2. Communication by the condenser system was established on the 8th of July last, and reported to be satisfactory. Since then some difficulty has arisen, and it has been reported that conversations are not now practicable. The matter is re-

DEPORTATION OF KANAKAS.

Mr. R. EDWARDS asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. Whether his attention has been directed to a judgment recently delivered in Canada by Mr. Justice Anglin to the effect that no British Colony could exercise extra-territorial rights with regard to the expatriation of aliens without direct authority from the Imperial Parliament?

2. Will the Prime Minister take steps to ascertain if this is a correct inference to be drawn from Mr. Justice Anglin's judgment?

3. In case that it is so, would the Commonwealth legislation respecting the deportation of kanakas be indirectly influenced?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. There are newspaper references to a judgment by Mr. Justice Anglin, who is a Judge of a Provincial Court, but no report of the judgment has yet been received, and I therefore cannot say what its effect is.

2. The authorized report will probably be received in due course.

3. In any case, the differences between the Constitution of the Dominion and that of the Commonwealth are so great that it does not follow that the Canadian decision would apply here.

BUDGET.

In Committee of Supply (Consideration resumed from 29th August, vide page 1625), on motion by Sir JOHN FORREST—

That the item, "President, £1,100," be agreed to.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY (Darwin).—I am sorry that there should have been any misunderstanding with regard to my action in requesting an adjournment of the debate last night. I can assure honorable members that I did not speak to any one on the subject, except the honorable member for Dalley, to whom I intimated that I should like to speak to-day, if an opportunity presented itself. I did not consult the Prime Minister, or ask him to afford me any advantage over other honorable members. I take my chance just the same as any one else, and I hope I shall never ask for any privilege that I am not prepared to extend to others. I desire to congratulate the Treasurer on the manner in which he presented his first Budget. We have been accustomed to have the Budget presented by the right honorable member for Balaclava, who is regarded as a Treasurer quite out of the ordinary. Therefore, it is a great mistake to compare the Budget of any other Treasurer with those to which we have become accustomed. The right honorable member for Balaclava has been in the habit of presenting to us our financial affairs in wonderful detail, as well as in the aggregate, whilst the Treasurer has upon this occasion given us great aggregation. I like a man who sees hope in everything, and I detest those who look to the past, and worry themselves about what happened a thousand years ago. I am glad that the Treasurer has given a word of cheer to the whole financial world as to the position and prospects of Australia. The right honorable gentleman laid great stress upon the necessity for bringing more population into Australia. I would ask, however, whether it is desirable that we should have in this great country hopeless, starving, miserable millions, such as are to-day almost a curse to Europe and America. This is one of the great questions of the age. Before we bring more people from the older countries of the world to Australia, we should amend our land legislation. When there are fifteen or twenty people waiting to utilize one property, the property-holders exercise too much power. If, upon a small island, with a population of 10,000 or 15,000, the whole of the land were owned by two or three men, the land-holders would own the people just as completely as the slave-owners owned the niggers on the plantations before the great civil war of the United States. Coghlan, at page 1,017, says:—

It will be seen that the unemployed comprise a considerable section of the community. No information is available regarding the number in Queensland, but in the other five States of the Commonwealth there were 50,644 persons—42,882 males, and 7,762 females, who had been unemployed for a week or more at the date of the census. These figures represent 3·6 per cent. of the total number of workers, and are but little in excess of those for the same Colonies in 1891, when the total was 50,319, consisting of 43,497 males, and 6,822 females, the proportion of the total number of workers being 4·3 per cent. Although the number of the unemployed in 1891, as stated above, was 50,644, it must not be considered that all these persons were without employment, as a fairly large proportion of them consisted of workers temporarily incapacitated through sickness or accident.

Should not our politicians see that the 50,000 people out of employment are provided for before we bring any more people here. That is my objection to further immigration at present. If we introduced large numbers of people here to crowd our cities, we should bring about conditions similar to those which now prevail in New York, London, Glasgow, Chicago, Liverpool, and other large cities. In a speech which he delivered at San Francisco on 3rd April, Rider Haggard said:—

We face yellow peril now. The crowding of slums of large cities breeds race suicide, and then Mongol hordes will sweep over us. The East has not the evils of the Occident.

I would urge that before we become charitable to people abroad, we should look to the interests of our people at home. I could take the Treasurer into many parts of the city of Melbourne, and show him hundreds of men and women who are virtually on the brink of starvation, who do not know where to obtain their next meal or their bed for the coming night. The Premier of Victoria, who, in my opinion, is the best Premier Victoria has ever had, and who is showing that he is endowed with brains and with profundity as well as rotundity, is doing everything possible to relieve the unfortunate unemployed. If it is desired to increase the population of Australia the Government should take possession of the large landed estates. I do not mean that the land should be confiscated, but that such legislation should be passed as would convince large land-holders that the property they hold was intended for the sustenance of human beings rather than of sheep. We should endeavour to induce the various States to pass such laws as would compel land-holders to utilize their properties to the fullest possible extent, or part with their holdings. I do not believe in confiscation, but, at the same time, I do not approve of land-holders exercising power to which they are not entitled. A great deal has been said on the question of raising revenue. It appears to me that under the party system of responsible government, too much power is wielded by Ministers, as compared with other members of the Legislature. In all questions relating to the finances brought before the House we have the benefit of the product of the brains of seven men, instead of the product of the brains of the whole of the members of Parliament. Surely seven men cannot, unless they include in their ranks a modern Napoleon or an Alexander Hamilton, possess more brains than the other members of this Parliament. The curse of responsible government is that Ministers bring down such a policy as their environment suggests, and, apparently, no one else is in our case in a position to propose any other means of raising revenue than the Customs and Excise duties. The Treasurer says that the people of Queensland have in their pockets the money which has been lost by the Queensland Treasurer owing to the operation of the Federal Tariff. I can assure the right honorable gentleman that the people of Tasmania wish that they had in their pockets the money lost to the revenue. Suppose that Queensland or Tasmania had a number of factories employing 40,000 or 50,000 persons, the money paid to the operatives would be placed in circulation and contribute to the prosperity of the community, whereas the money saved under the conditions referred to by the Treasurer lies useless in the pockets of a few. Now, referring to Defence matters, it appears to me that we are spending altogether too much money. Our expenditure amounts to 6s. or 7s. per head of the population of the Commonwealth, and I would ask what we are frightened of? We are fighting phantoms. If, as some people fear, Japan has designs upon Australia, should not we, a mere handful of 3,000,000, be absolutely helpless against them? Yet we are spending hundreds of thousands of pounds annually upon forts, military accoutrements, and useless trappings, to guard ourselves against invasion by a power which is now friendly to the nation to which we belong. In fact, only lately, Great Britain withdrew her fleet from the Eastern seas. Since France became the friend of England, the latter Power has withdrawn her fleet from the Eastern seas, being content to absolutely trust her ally Japan. Yet, day after day we hear, not alone military men in their gilt braid and spurs and their peacock feathers, but also members of Parliament and business men, talking about Japan conquering this country. In so speaking, they are actually inciting Japan to attempt the conquest of Australia. Japan is the ally of this country, the ally of England, of France, and of America, and these nations are all trading with each other. They are selling their goods to each other. They are doing business of all descriptions with each other, and are not talking about attacking each other's country.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—We shut out the Japanese.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Nations can do as they choose in their own country. No white man can own a piece of land in Japan. I know of various companies which sought to establish themselves in that country, but they could only erect buildings and own property through the medium of Japanese. A nation within its own territory is a sovereign entity, and that entity can pass laws to suit itself. Japan has enacted legislation to suit her own people, and under those laws no white man can own property there.

Mr. WILSON.—He can go there as a visitor.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The Japanese can come here as visitors. My objection is that we are spending enormous sums of money upon military defence—upon guns which will be obsolete within ten years.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable member gets his boots cleaned every morning, and yet they are dirty before nightfall.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The honorable member can get his boots cleaned three or four times a day, but a worker like myself cannot do so. I maintain that if we set out looking for trouble we shall find it. If the biggest prize-fighter in Melbourne were to walk down Bourke-street to-morrow with a chip on his shoulder, he would find somebody ready to knock it off. I am surprised that in Australia, which possesses greater resources than does any other country in the world, persons should be continually talking about its conquest by some foreign nation. I object to such statements, and I protest against the proposed expenditure upon defence.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable member say that there is no need for us to make provision to defend ourselves?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—There is not the slightest reason for so doing.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I suppose that we are to sponge upon England for all time?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—For thirty years in America I heard the statement made that England intended to invade that country. Every morning some newspaper would announce that the British fleet had been seen off Newfoundland, and that British troops might be landed upon American soil at any time. Naturally, the people were worked up to such a pitch that nearly every Yankee used to sleep upon his Winchester rifle. I object to the waste of money that is proposed upon the Defence Department. It is utter waste. Instead of spending that money in accoutrements and in nonsense that is really injurious to the Commonwealth, it should be spent upon the encouragement of closer settlement.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I thought that the honorable member believed in insurance.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I believe in peace, in commerce, and in justice.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And in insurance.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—That is included in the matters I have mentioned. If the sum which it is proposed to expend upon defence were handed over to the States Treasurers for the purpose of enabling them to place people upon the land, the railways of the Commonwealth would pay. I say that we should pension off our military men. Let them come and dance with the young ladies of the town, and enjoy themselves. But we should waste no more of the taxpayers' money upon these military phantoms, which are conjured up for the specific purpose of creating a scare which does not exist. Great Britain has confidently withdrawn her fleet from the Eastern seas—according to American newspapers—and is willing to trust Japan and France, her allies. America has not yet withdrawn her fleet from Manila, but now that peace has been concluded between Russia and Japan she will doubtless do so. I claim that it is not necessary to waste money upon the maintenance of an army in Australia.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Are the Americans going to blow up their ships?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—They are not going to blow anybody up, because there is no necessity for them to do so. I contend that we are mad upon the question of war in Australia. Ever since I landed here, some sixteen years ago, I have heard of nothing else. Some years ago I was in Tasmania when it was generally declared that a Russian fleet intended to effect a landing there. Now, the Russian fleet is at the bottom of the sea, and I would suggest to the Treasurer that we should limit the expenditure upon defence for a period of twenty years, and gradually retire our military officers.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is the honorable member voicing the views of the caucus?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—No; I am speaking entirely for myself. Everybody is aware that my honoured chief is very strong upon defence matters. In fact, he has gone a bit mad upon that question, just as most honorable members have gone crazy upon the subject of war. The Treasurer has stated that the scheme for arming our Military Forces and equipping them with the most modern rifles—and it should be remembered that the most modern rifles now will be antiquated in a couple of years—will cost £520,000, or $2,600,000. I well remember when the old shot-gun was in use.

It had to give way to the Winchester rifle, which in its turn has been superseded by improved weapons. I would not object, if it were necessary, to a proposal for the foundation of a navy, or—if honorable members thought it better—to entering into a contract with the British Government, under which a greater number of Imperial ships would be stationed here to defend Australia, should it ever become necessary to do so. If honorable members think it incumbent upon them to waste money upon some kind of military or naval business, let them do as I have suggested. But I shall enter my protest against this expenditure, even if I am the only member of the Labour Party to do so. I now come to the question of the sugar bounties. Whilst I intend to vote for the Government proposal in this connexion, I shall do so very reluctantly, because I am satisfied that the bounty will not cease at the end of five or six years. No honorable member ever knew a man to relinquish a good thing.

Mr. KENNEDY. — Would the honorable member do so?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—No, I never did. I have never known any man or woman to sacrifice a good thing. It is when they grow tired of bad things that they desire to get rid of them in order to obtain good things. The little State of Tasmania is called upon to contribute her proportion of the sugar bounty. There is no doubt that the Colonial Sugar Company will derive the most benefit from the Government policy in connexion with the sugar industry. The gentlemen who are interested in that company bloat about drawing-rooms, and enjoy themselves at the expense of the potato grower of Tasmania. With regard to the sugar bounty, I know that some members of the Labour Party are in favour of it.

Mr. McDONALD.—It is not a party question.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I feel exceedingly doubtful as to the policy of the bounty, and if I finally made up my mind to vote for it, I should do so with very great misgiving. I now come to the question of the Braddon blot. What is it? It is a sort of constitutional machine for the destruction of the rights, powers, and privileges of Commonwealth representatives in Parliament. Why do the States desire to continue the operation of a section in our Constitution which carries its own condemnation upon its face? Why did we federate? Why was the union formed? When a man enters into partnership with another individual he does so from a desire to better his financial position. The States having entered into a partnership, I contend that the strong should bear the burdens of the weak. I desire to be perfectly candid. Prior to Federation the States were a segregation of wrangling political nonentities. That condition of affairs has now passed away, and we have become a great continental nation—a nation of partners and of friends. We have removed all the artificial barriers which existed between the States. That being the case, the Braddon blot should be removed from our Constitution, and the Treasurer of the Commonwealth should not be compelled, when he requires a certain amount of revenue to assist the necessitous States, to raise four times the sum that is requisite to give effect to his desire. Under existing conditions, the Commonwealth Treasurer is absolutely hobbled, handcuffed, and shackled. What would honorable members think if the Treasurer of the United States were compelled to consult forty-eight States and two territories, or forty-six States and four territories, before he could advance £1 to assist Colorado, Nevada, or any other State of the American union? That is exactly the position in which the Braddon blot places this Parliament to-day. I claim that the whole of the Commonwealth revenue should be placed in one general fund, and that the necessitous States ought to receive advances from that fund, although not more than the amount to which they are legitimately entitled. There ought to be no such thing as an endeavour to make some States bankrupt. But that is the position in which the Braddon blot will place us. A broad-minded Treasurer like the right honorable member for Swan should have the courage to inaugurate a truly Australian policy, under which, instead of pouring millions into the coffers of a State that did not require the money, he would say, "This revenue shall be distributed as the States need it for their development." The money should be distributed proportionately, and on reasonable lines. I am opposed to the Braddon blot, because it is based on injustice. The Commonwealth will never be able to establish a system of old-age pensions, or to consider any financial proposal calculated to be really beneficial to the people of Australia, while the Braddon blot remains in the Constitution.

— King O'Malley.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—It is the salvation of the smaller States.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—We hear again the voice of the provincialist. I regret that such a remark should have been made by the honorable member for Franklin, because he generally shows the possession of a broad mind. But, after all, the influence of environment is remarkable. I am thankful that I was born in a great continent—that I breathed the air of the white mountains of New Hampshire and Vermont. When one lives under such conditions, he has broader ideas than have others.

Mr. WILKS.—Why did the honorable member leave that country?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Because of the Scriptural injunction to go into the world and preach the gospel unto the heathen. I am also opposed to any extension of the bookkeeping period, for I regard it as another fraud on the Commonwealth. It served a useful purpose at the outset, because it induced some of the antiquated, fossilized relics of the dark ages who then occupied positions of prominence, and were frightened of their own shadows, to support the union. Something had to be done to encourage the States to come in, and the bookkeeping clause was devised to that end. I remember a time, in the history of Canada, when Sir John Macdonald would have been mobbed by the people if an opportunity had occurred; but the day came when Canada gloried in the movement in which that distinguished man took so prominent a part. Every man who proposes something that is out of the beaten path—something to which the crowd is unaccustomed—is regarded as a faddist or a fool, and it is not until after his death that the people realize, as a rule, that he had brains. I come now to the question of the transfer of the States debts. I must confess that I was amazed to learn that the right honorable member for Balclava was in favour of the Commonwealth taking over the whole of the debts of the States. I cannot help recalling to mind what was done by the Dominion of Canada in this direction. Why should the European holders of the bonds, stocks, and Treasury bills of the States, who invested their money on the strength of the guarantee of the various States, be allowed to come in, and obtain the guarantee of the Commonwealth that will put millions into their pockets, while, at the same time, they do nothing to enable the Commonwealth to meet future obligations? Let us consider the question for one moment. According to the Treasurer, the States debts now amount to £234,000,000, and of that amount no less a sum than £32,000,000 has been borrowed since the establishment of the Federation. If ever there were "Jubilee plungers," or bettors on the credit of the States, those who have been responsible for the public loans raised since the inauguration of the Federation may be justly described as such. And yet these men speak of the extravagance of the Commonwealth. As a matter of fact, the Commonwealth is only an infant in its swaddling clothes as compared with the States which have raised £32,000,000 within the last four years. States debts amounting to something like £23,000,000 will fall due in the course of the next few years, and I absolutely agree with the suggestion made by Mr. Speaker, when a member of the Federal Convention. I believe the Legislatures of the various States should pass enabling Acts giving the Commonwealth power to negotiate for the redemption of their loans as they fall due. That power should be given to the Commonwealth without delay, so that the experience of Victoria some eighteen months ago, when she had to pay an enormous bonus in connexion with a conversion loan, may not be repeated. If the underwriters concerned had been Hottentots, or cannibals, they could not have attacked the people of Victoria more savagely than they did on that occasion. It is better to eat up a man, than to eat up all that he has, and yet that is what the financiers did in the case of Victoria. The power to negotiate for the redemption of State debts, as they fall due, should be extended to the Commonwealth, and as soon as that power has been vested in the Commonwealth Government, negotiations should be entered into with a view to give effect to it. Is there one State in the union which could ascertain to-morrow the names of the holders of its stocks? With the exception of South Australia, there is not. Most of the States Treasurers of days gone by feared that they had not the ability to negotiate the necessary loans, and they accordingly farmed out the work to banking companies in England. The banks in turn farmed it out to underwriters, who sold these stocks to various investors. The underwriters know who are the holders of the various stocks of the States, but, as I have said, the Treasurers of the States, with the exception of the Treasurer of South Australia, do not.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Is that a matter of much moment?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY. — It is a matter of great importance, as I shall be able to show. If the honorable member were doing business with men all over Australia, would he not find himself in an awkward position, if he left the whole of the financial side of his business to be attended to by a bank? What would be his position if, as his bills fell due, he was told by the bank, "We cannot tell you who are the holders of your bills"? If he could see the holders of his bills and tell them personally of the security he was able to afford them, he would do much better than he would if he had to depend upon the intervention of a third party. To the everlasting credit of the right honorable member for Adelaide, be it said that, as Premier of South Australia, he intrusted the Agent-General with the work of inscribing the stock of the State—a work hitherto done by the banks. When the Agent-General of South Australia sends out the warrants for the payment of interest on State loans, he is able to say who are the holders of the bonds and stock. Many of the one-time Treasurers of other States, who handed over the floating of loans to various banking institutions, have gone to their graves covered with honour as State financiers; but if such a system can be described as financing, then it is the easiest thing in the world to become a financier. Let me give another illustration of the difficult position in which the States have been placed by the adoption of the practice to which I have referred. The Age and Argus are powerful, well-conducted journals, but if their proprietors farmed out their daily distribution and the collection of advertisements, they would be unable to ascertain what was the reason for any falling off.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—They do farm out their distribution, to a great extent.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—That is so; but they closely supervise the work. I know of a case in which the publishing department of one of the newspapers called for an explanation from a lady agent, because it appeared that the opposition paper was securing an increased circulation in the district in which she carried on business. In order to give the holders of States bonds confidence in the Commonwealth we should first of all carry the motion, of which I gave notice some time ago, providing for the imposition of a direct unimproved land tax. I have carefully considered the matter, and have ascertained that we could, by this means, raise from at least £1,200,000 to £1,500,000 per annum. Before we talk of taking over the debts of the States, the interest on which, according to the Treasurer, exceeds the whole of the revenue of the Commonwealth, we ought to prove to investors in Great Britain and Europe that we have the means to meet Australian bonds and stocks as they fall due, if they are not prepared to enable us to float conversion loans. That means is to be found in the imposition of a direct unimproved land tax. I would exempt the small land-holder.

Mr. WILKS.—Why should he not bear his share?

Mr. JOHNSON.—If an exemption were proposed the scheme would be destroyed.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I am a great believer in the system of small holdings. Have honorable members ever heard of a man who was willing to fight for his boardinghouse-keeper? Have honorable members ever heard of a man who would shoulder his rifle for the sake of defending his boardinghouse? I do not think they have. But we all know that a man will fight for his wife and children, and his own little home.

Mr. MCWILLIAMS.—I thought the honorable member wished to nationalize the land.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—So I do; but the trouble is that I cannot induce honorable members to seriously consider the question. Some honorable members accept an invitation to dinner at one of the big clubs, where they hear various statements made about the Labour Party, and then come back with unfriendly feelings towards that party. As a matter of fact, the Labour Party is a thinking body—it does not think by proxy.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member is the only member of it who has been able to say a word with regard to the Budget statement.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—We propose to have a little to say on the Budget now. My suggestion is that the Commonwealth should impose a land tax and a heavy absentee tax on the incomes of the slanderers and defamers of their country's name, who live in Europe, and to whom the Treasurer referred in his Budget speech. The following motion, of which I gave notice during the sittings of the first Parliament, contains my proposition:—

That in view of the facts—

1. That during many years the Governments of the several Australian States have been prodigal floaters of loans on the English money market, with the result that at present the six States are loaded with the dead weight of a foreign debt to the enormous amount of over £215,000,000—a sum which requires over £7,800,000 to meet the interest bill.

Our debt is now £234,000,000, and the interest on it over £8,000,000 a year.

2. That no provision exists among the States (with the exception of South and Western Australia) for a practical sinking fund for the redemption of this huge debt.

3. That it is absolutely necessary to establish a fund similar to that in existence in Western Australia in order to rehabilitate the credit of the States—most of the profits produced by this borrowed money having gravitated into the pockets of the large landed proprietors in the form of unearned increment, in consequence of the expenditure on public works.

4. That it is advisable, in the interests of the States and Commonwealth, that large estates should be cut up into small holdings for bond fide settlers on perpetual leases, thus preventing the emigration of our healthy, able-bodied young men to foreign countries, in consequence of their being unable to secure homes in the land of their birth.

This House is opinion that the Government should introduce a Bill for the purpose of imposing a graduated land and absentee tax, on the following unimproved capital value basis (no taxation being imposed on improvements, however costly):—

1. (a) Land of the unimproved capital value of £2,000, or less, to be exempt from taxation.

(b) Land over the unimproved value of £2,000, and under £20,000, to pay ¼d. per £1.

(c) Land of the unimproved value of £20,000, and under £40,000, to pay ¾d. per £1.

(d) Land of the unimproved value of £40,000, and under £75,000, to pay 1d. per £1.

(e) Land of the unimproved value of £75,000, and under £100,000, to pay 1½d. per £1.

(f) Land of the unimproved value of £100,000, and under £150,000, to pay 1½d. per £1.

(g) Land of the unimproved value of £150,000, and under £200,000, to pay 2d. per £1.

(h) Land of the unimproved value of £200,000, and under £250,000, to pay 3d. per £1.

(i) Land of the unimproved value of £250,000, and under £300,000, to pay 4d. per £1.

(j) Land of the unimproved value of £300,000, and under £350,000, to pay 5d. per £1.

(k) Land of the unimproved value of £350,000, and under £400,000, to pay 5½d. per £1.

(l) Land of the unimproved value of £400,000, and above, to pay 6d. per £1.

2. Absentee landed proprietors to pay double the amount of the foregoing rates.

3. A portion of the proceeds to be utilized for the purpose of establishing a system of national old-age pensions, and the balance to be placed in a reserve fund to partially redeem the several State loans as they fall due.

4. That this motion, when carried, be an instruction to the Attorney-General to prepare the necessary measure. When this becomes law it will shift the incidence of cruel taxation from the backs of the small holders to that of the Monopolistic Boodle Bludgers who have turned the people's heritage into a sheep-walk.

We can raise from £1,200,000 to £1,500,000 annually, and I suggest that the Commonwealth should secure a piece of property in the heart of London, and on it erect a building which will cost in all between £200,000 and £300,000. At the present time, the Governments of the various States have offices for their Agents-General all over London—some of them near the Parliament Buildings at Westminster, away from the business centre of the city, where no one ever goes. The office of Agent-General should, in my opinion, be abolished, and general agents should be appointed in their stead. An Agent-General should be a thing of the past, because everything now is hard, progressive, cruel, murderous business. The Commonwealth could dig down deep, and have great basements, and sub-basements, on its property, where the wine-growers of Australia could store their wine. Then in the building they could provide offices for the general agents of the six States, and on the top storey they could have a show room for the exhibition of the produce of the States, with the States' tag on everything, the remaining space to be let. Unless a nation advertises to-day, just as individuals do, it must go to sleep, and become covered with blue mould; and the best way in which we can effectively advertise is by making patent the substantial potentialities of Australia, by the means I suggest. In the Commonwealth building would be lifts or elevators to climb up or down, and there could be a restaurant in which nothing but Australian wine, and food prepared from Australian commodities, would be sold. If this seems too socialistic a proposal, the Government could lease the right to conduct such a restaurant, and persons would soon be found to tender for it. By renting the various rooms in the building, we should get an enormous income. If we borrowed £300,000 at 3 per cent., on interminable stocks or bonds—and stocks are better than bonds, because the latter have coupons attached which are a nuisance—we should have to pay £9,000 a year in interest, and a good landed investment in London is supposed to pay at least 7 per cent.

Mr. CONROY.—The man who could point out safe investments of that kind would make thousands.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY. — Seven per cent. can be obtained from investments in property in the heart of cities like London, New York, Chicago, and even Melbourne. Seven per cent. would give us a return of £21,000, while 6 per cent. would give a return of £18,000 a year. Out of that the municipal rates would have to be paid; but it would be unnecessary to insure the building, because the Commonwealth is stronger than any insurance company. I wrote to the Under-Treasurers of the States, to ascertain what each State pays for rent in London, but the only reply I have yet received came from the Under-Treasurer in Tasmania, who said that that State pays £275. Of course, Tasmania is a small State, and if we estimate the average amount paid by the States at £500 or £600 each, or £3,000 in the aggregate, I do not think we shall be far wrong. That at once meets half the interest charge. I would insist on the High Commissioner having absolute power in connexion with the inscribing of the stock issued, and would allow him to float his loan at any period when he was likely to get money cheaply. Having the stock on his books, the Commissioner would know by whom it was held, just as an insurance company knows who are its policy-holders, and could make it his business on occasions to see the larger holders, or to write to the smaller holders, offering them inducements to continue to hold the stock in the event of our loans falling due. At the present time, because of the stories in circulation about a certain institution, many persons are frightened; but their fears vanish when one sees them, and tells them that things are all right. Unfortunately, the great multitude is carried away by clamour and rumour, and is ready to sell its stocks, or dispose of its investments, to save itself from what it thinks threatened disaster, but the rich man who keeps his fingers on the financial pulse of the world knows what is happening, and buys the stock, doubling the value of his investment in a few months. The Commonwealth should not delay to erect, in the heart of the city of London, a building which would be a monument to the business ability of the people of the country, and would enable their produce to be properly exhibited to the people of Europe. About every year or two there are celebrations of one kind or another in London, and the Commonwealth building would, on such occasions, be crowded with sightseers, who would gain a knowledge of what we have to offer to emigrants, and would spread the fame of our resources. I find from official records that the land of Australia is valued at £373,679,000, and the improvements on it at £375,515,000. The incomes drawn from investments by persons non-resident in Australia amount to £8,350,000, and £400,000 is spent annually by Australians residents in Europe. Of the first-mentioned amount, £2,565,000, or nearly 4 per cent. of the total incomes in the State, apart from the interest paid upon State debentures, is drawn from New South Wales; £1,600,000, or 3 per cent., is drawn from Victoria; £1,100,000, or 5½ per cent., from Queensland; £375,000, or 2½ per cent., from South Australia; £2,300,000, or 13 per cent., from Western Australia; £360,000, or 4½ per cent., from Tasmania. The incomes drawn in the Commonwealth represent a total of £179,000,000, and the incomes in New Zealand represent a total of £38,967,000. £8,750,000, or slightly over 5 per cent. of the total of the incomes derived from private concerns in the Commonwealth, is drawn by non-residents. These people, who enjoy all the social advantages of living in the centres of art and culture, should, I think, be made to specially pay the Commonwealth for policing their properties. It is not fair to the residents of Australia, who rear their families in the country in which they make their income, that no distinction should be made in matters of taxation between them and persons who live in Europe. It is hard for an Australian Treasurer, owing to his environment, to present a policy which will have the effect of treading on the toes of absentees, but, I think, it is time that some action was taken in this direction. The Treasurer did not say one word with regard to the establishment of a Commonwealth Bank of issue and deposit. This is a very important matter. We are, to-day, living under a banking system that Sir Robert Peel gave to the world in 1844 or 1845. No improvements have been made during all the years that have elapsed, and it seems most remarkable that, whilst changes are being made in all other kinds of economic institutions, whilst wonderful improvements are being effected in the methods of the production and distribution of wealth, and whilst the remotest nations of the earth are being brought into closer connexion by the magic touch of commerce, and whilst the whole industrial and commercial world is passing through a process of evolutionary transformation, no change should be made in the antiquated and obsolete system of currency, which has been in existence for the last sixty or seventy years. The currency being the very life-blood that circulates through the veins of the nation, I was glad to hear the honorable member for Brisbane address the House on the subject of establishing Commonwealth currency, although I could not altogether appreciate some of the features of the system which the honorable member advocated. Under his proposal, the State would receive from the banks only one-third of the value of the notes issued to them in gold, and the banks would have to pay only 2 per cent. interest on the other two-thirds of the total face value of the notes. I understood, further, that the banks would be in a position to get back their gold upon returning the paper currency. I should think that a better return to the State would be secured if the banks were required to pay 2 per cent. interest on the full value of the note issue.

Mr. CULPIN.—But the State would hold the banks' gold to the extent of one-third of the value of the notes issued.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Yes, but unfortunately the banks could get the gold back upon returning the notes, and I do not like giving anything back once I have got it. I do not think that any great profit is to be derived from the issue of paper money, but that system has great advantages, in so far as it engenders confidence in the State. Moreover, if a State bank of issue were established the power now enjoyed by a monopoly consisting of a few private bankers would be vested in the State. At present bankers frequently encourage booms by urging people to borrow money when it is plentiful, and they bring about the collapse of such booms by calling upon their debtors to pay them at a subsequent stage when money becomes scarce. If the State had the control of the issue of paper money it would refuse to increase its note circulation in order to assist a boom. If there were a prospect of a boom the State bank would commence to cancel its circulation, and this would have a discouraging effect upon those who were disposed to over-speculate. On the other hand, in times of great trouble, the State bank could increase its circulation, through the agency of the post-offices. It may be urged that no one would have confidence in a Government bank, but Coghlan points out that the States savings banks had a wonderful boom at the time of the bank crisis in 1893, because the people had confidence in them. If we had a Commonwealth bank of issue it would be able to do business with farmers and producers, who, however, would not be granted overdrafts unless they deposited securities in the forms of deeds, bills of lading, bills of exchange, bonds, or bills of sale. The result would be that the State bank would encourage the small producer and the small business man. Unfortunately, the present banks of issue unconsciously help big men, who can come to them and borrow thousands upon depositing their deeds. The enormous profits made by the Australian banks is at the expense of the whole people who have to pay the interest, discounts, and exchange. Both the borrowers and bank employees are sweated to fatten the shareholders, as shown by the following table from the Australasian Banking and Insurance Record of 20th January, 1905, from which I will read some figures:—

* 14th April, 1902; 13th April, 1903; and 12th April, 1904.—† Dividend on Preference Capital.—‡ After deducting amount carried to the credit of the Special Assets Trust Co.—§ 31st December, 1902, 1903, and 1904.

After all it is only that portion of the bank deposits represented by the savings of the workers, or the surplus accumulations of commercial and financial organizations, which is available for investment. The balance, which constitutes by far the larger part of the deposits, represents only an expansion of credit, and is never available for investment of any permanent character. It is a common blunder to regard bank deposits as money in the banks, whereas they are principally composed of credits in a ledger. When a banker lends a customer £10,000, he takes the customer's promissory note, and credits his account with the proceeds. The transaction increases both the deposits and loans by £10,000, but does not add anything to the money in the bank. Even when the customer operates by cheque on the credit it does not necessarily follow that the money in the bank is reduced, for his cheques either go to the credit of other customers of the bank, or they find their way into other banks, and become an offset by similar transactions. This credit of £10,000 produced by the banker discounting the promissory note of his customer, performs all the functions that actual money can perform, and practically adds £10,000 to the resources of the commercial community while it is extant. If the credit has been judiciously given, the note will be redeemed when due by the customer accumulating a sufficient credit balance in his bank account to redeem the note. The transaction will reduce the banks assets and deposits by £10,000, but it will not increase nor diminish the money in the bank. In only a small proportion of the financial transactions thus accomplished by credit will actual cash be demanded, and against this the banker must retain a certain percentage of his deposits in cash reserves. If the credit be foolishly given to a worthless speculator who cannot pay when the money is due, or make satisfactory arrangements, then the bank loses the amount, because its resources are reduced by £10,000, while its liabilities remain the same. In the difference between redeemable and irredeemable credit rests all the difference between good currency and bad currency, between good banking and bad banking, between good investment securities and bad investment securities. Thus the increase of bank deposits is due more to an expansion of credit than to an increase of actual money in the banks, or of funds in search of investment. In like manner, when deposits decrease it is a contraction of credit, rather than the withdrawal of money from the banks. In 1893 there was far more money in the banks of Australia than in 1892. Yet the deposits were millions less on account of the contraction of credit primarily due to the crisis, the loans, and other credit assets being relatively reduced. This borrowing, banking, and rate of exchange question need not frighten us. Many years ago the Baring Brothers loaned to the South American Republic because the rate of interest was much higher than in America or Australia. When the rate of interest is higher in Australia than elsewhere, the financiers and capitalists will lend the people here money instead of buying foreign commercial bills, causing less demand for bills, and therefore lowering the rates. If rates of interest are higher in other countries, there will be a greater demand for commercial bills or other exchanges on foreign countries with the object of getting the benefit of such high rates. If the interest rates for money are lower in other countries than here, Australian financiers would borrow money in their markets, and loan it here, thus increasing Australian indebtedness to foreign countries, and on the falling due of these loans there would be an increased demand for exchange to pay them, resulting in higher rates. The fluctuation in the rate of exchange is due to many causes. If the value of the commodities exported by Australia greatly exceed the value of the commodities imported during a certain period, the large balance due to us from other countries would, if there were no other international transactions to offset them, cause the lowering of the price of exchange here for the reason that there would be less demand for remittances to foreign countries, since it is always the difference between the debits and credits that is remitted. On the other hand, if we owed foreign countries more than they owed us, exchange would be higher by reason of the increased demand for it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Is the honorable member in favour of the conversion of the States debts?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I am in favour of the Commonwealth taking them over gradually. I claim that we should acquire power from the different States to go upon the money market, and to buy up these loans long before they become due.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—How can we do that?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—We can do it when the stocks are being sold.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Where shall we get the money?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—We can get it by imposing a land tax.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Can we obtain £200,000,000 in that way?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—No. There is not £200,000,000 falling due at the same time. As a matter of fact, we have £22,000,000 worth of loans maturing within the next five years. I believe that the Commonwealth should be given the power to at once commence negotiations in respect of those loans. I claim that if we imposed a land tax, and if we had £5,000,000 in the Commonwealth Treasury we should experience no difficulty in regard to renewing our loans.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Does the honorable member favour the abolition of the State land taxes?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I would like to see a uniform land tax imposed all over Australia. A tax of a penny in the pound would realize £1,500,000 a year. The bonds of the Commonwealth, backed by the States, are surely worth more than State bonds would be, unbacked by the Commonwealth. Ninety per cent. of the business of the world of to-day is openly done by credit, and the other 10 per cent. is transacted by other forms which are equivalent to credit.

Mr. CONROY.—How does the honorable member define "credit"?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I define it as confidence. Credit and confidence go hand in hand, and if we had a million pounds extra coming in annually, the people in England would have confidence in us. The lands of the Commonwealth are valued at £373,000,000. That value has been imparted to them by the working people of this country. Let us impose a tax upon these lands, and show the English bond-holders that we are able to pay off a portion of our indebtedness; then we shall experience no difficulty whatever in gaining renewals to suit our own convenience.

Mr. CONROY.—If we passed a law raising the price of land tenfold, can the honorable member, as a sound protectionist, say how would it act, seeing that the money would still be kept in the country?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I say that protection and a land tax go hand in hand.

Mr. CONROY.—That is to say, that all taxes are good.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Every honorable member who has had any business experience must know that whenever he has had a mortgage upon his property, if he has offered to pay off a portion of it, he has experienced no trouble in procuring an extension. Our English bond-holders occupy a position precisely similar to that of mortgagees.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable member should not make a mistake. If our bond-holders have a good investment, naturally they will stick to it.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Has the honorable member noticed that the bonds of one State in the Commonwealth, which mature in about four or five years, are now quoted at £88 per £100? I say that the Commonwealth could purchase those bonds and establish a sinking fund. If 1 per cent. were paid into a sinking fund, the Treasurer, through the High Commissioner, would be in a position—as that fund increased—to watch the state of the money market, and to take advantage of it in the same way that any other purchaser does.

Mr. CONROY.—Is the Treasurer to engage in gambling?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—That would not be gambling. The States go into the open market and offer their stock for sale.

Mr. CONROY.—The Treasurer is to collect the funds of our citizens and wait for an opportunity to purchase State bonds.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The Treasurer would receive a certain amount from land taxation each year. He would be paying off the States debts, and thus relieving them of a terrible burden. Everybody recognises that if the Braddon blot were removed from our Constitution, and the Commonwealth had £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 of a surplus above what is required to help the States, the Commonwealth Treasurer would be in a very different position from that which he would occupy if he had to face a deficit each year. Credit is the most potent economic force of the age, and credit rests upon confidence. The whole financial fabric of the world to-day virtually rests upon credit. How much gold is there in circulation in England or Australia? We have not £10,000,000 worth of notes, gold, and silver in circulation in the Commonwealth, and yet we are doing a business equal to £94,000,000 annually.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We have £22,000,000 of gold on deposit.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I am speaking of the amount in circulation. How much gold is there in circulation in England? Mr. J. Wilson Harper, speaking of this aspect of the matter, says:—

Gold plays an important but subordinate part. The extensive use of credit bills, promissory notes, and bank notes, has far more to do with the maintenance of our monetary system. If it had to completely rest on gold it would soon crumble to dust.

According to Mr. Clare, the whole stock of legal tender does not exceed £126,000,000. His remark has reference to the United Kingdom. He adds—

From half to two-thirds of this amount is in actual circulation among the public, £50,000,000 or £60,000,000 being available for banking purposes.

Mr. McLeod says—

There are about £110,000,000 in actual coin in the country, and credit to the amount of £10,890,000,000 rests upon that.

Dean Farrar estimates the entire capital at £12,000,000,000, and says that £235,000,000 are yearly invested and saved. Mr. Laver states that the chief London banks, exclusive of the Bank of England, hold cash in hand to the extent of £27,000,000, and that a debt of £227,000,000 rests upon that sum. The estimate made by the Committee of experts who recently issued their report on Indian currency is much less than those just cited; but coming from such financial authorities, it may be accepted on the whole as most accurate. It is stated that—

In the United Kingdom the amount of gold and silver available for purposes of currency is uncertain, but the Mint estimate of the gold in circulation is £91,000,000, of which the amount in banks, including that in the issue department of the Bank of England, and in other banks against which notes are issued, is stated to be £25,000,000.

The report further explains that the gold held by the issue department of the Bank of England, and that held by—

The Scotch and Irish banks, in respect of notes issued beyond the authorized limits, cannot be looked upon as an integral portion of the currency, since it cannot be used at the same time with the notes that are issued against it. But the amount is included in the sum of £91,000,000.

If that enormous volume of business is done on a credit basis, of what are we afraid in Australia? Turning to Coghlan, page 801, we find the statement—

The savings banks are on a very different footing, being, to a greater or less extent, under State control, and otherwise safeguarded, so that they enjoy public confidence.

If the savings banks enjoy public confidence, because they are guaranteed by the Government, would not the people have confidence in a Commonwealth bank of deposit and issue?

Mr. CONROY.—It would depend on the way in which it was conducted.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Let me illustrate my point. When a city suddenly springs up for which an adequate water supply has not been provided, what is the first step taken by those in authority? They fix upon a catchment area. Then they build a great dam or reservoir into which the water is directed. Mains are next laid from the reservoir to the city, storage basins being excavated along the line, and by means of service pipes the water is conveyed to every household, and the whole city is supplied. I hold that there is not a sovereign or a half-crown piece that was not dug out of the earth by some working man or working woman. There was no property in the Garden of Eden—there was not a dollar to be found there; and every pound that is necessary to pay off the national debt must be earned by the working men of Australia. If that be so, why should not the savings of the workers flow through the various post-office savings banks into a Commonwealth Government national bank, and be utilized for the benefit of the workers of Australia? To-day the wealth of the world is flowing from the pockets of the workers into those of great organizations of private gentlemen who boss the wealth of the earth. These gentlemen have made their wealth out of the labours of the workers of the world, and the Labour Party is determined to introduce a new system under which not a dollar will be taken from those gentlemen; but under which they will be unable to take a dollar that they do not earn.

Mr. KELLY.—Will members of Parliament secure a proper allowance under that system?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I am glad that the honorable member has reminded me of that point. To the everlasting discredit of the Government and their predecessors, be it said, that the function for which they came into office—the function of feeding the people—has never been fulfilled. Honorable members are to-day receiving a starvation allowance—an allowance that is absolutely disgraceful. If we do not believe in the principle of payment of members, let us wipe it out: but if we are to have payment of members, the allowance should be commensurate with the duties to be discharged. If honorable members received an allowance of £600 or £700 a year, it would be unnecessary for them to engage in private business. I hold that no man can conscientiously attend to his Parliamentary duties and at the same time control a private business. A member of Parliament must either resign his seat or let his business go. The Government should pay no regard to press criticism. Thank God, the newspapers do not run this Parliament; and if the Ministers are afraid to tackle this question seriously—if, like other Governments, they are simply waiting for something to turn up—they will in time be turned down. I fought the last general election on the public statement that I favoured an allowance of £1,000 a year, and I hold that there is no justification for giving members of the Parliament only £400 per annum simply because the Constitution sets forth that such shall be the allowance “until the Parliament otherwise provides.” The right honorable member for East Sydney has often admitted that he made a great mistake when, as a member of the Federal Convention, he moved to amend the clause in the draft Constitution Bill providing that the allowance should be £500 per annum.

Mr. PHILLIPS.—Then why does not the right honorable member seek to rectify his mistake?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—How could he possibly rectify it when his Government had only a majority of one? The Government have a substantial majority, and most honorable members of the Opposition would support a proposal by them to increase the present allowance. I am prepared to vote for an allowance of anything up to £600 a year.

Mr. KELLY.—Would the honorable member vote for nothing over that amount?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I do not think it would be fair to ask for more. I appeal to the Government not to be scared by newspaper criticism, but to have the pluck to bring in a Bill providing for an increased allowance. In conclusion, I have only to say that I thank the Treasurer for having administered a much deserved castigation to those treacherous men who were beggars when Australia found them, and who, having become millionaires, visit Europe from time to time, and denounce the land that made them. But let them go. Australia, with its mountains and its valleys, its hills and its dales, its rivers and its plains, its harbors, its villages and its cities, its lovely women, and its champion racehorses, still remains. Let these men go. Australia—with its music, sad and thrilling—with its cosy homes, its winters of mildness, and its summers of healthfulness—where bloom and flourish the finest specimens and virtues of the British race, still remains.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I do not know whether, after the poetical outburst of the honorable member who has just resumed his seat, the Committee will be willing to come down to the prosaic walks of life with which a Budget speech and a Budget debate are usually associated. But there are a few remarks which I should like to make, first, in connexion with the finances, and, secondly, in connexion with that portion of the expenditure of the Commonwealth which relates to our defences. So far as one can judge from the inquiries that could be made during the period which has elapsed since the delivery of the Budget speech, a pronounced feeling of apprehension has been caused by the Treasurer's remarks. The public mind is alarmed, and not without reason, at the general tone of the speech.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Where is the public mind situated?

Mr. McCAY.—It is not situated solely in the right honorable gentleman.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable and learned member mean everywhere—all over Australia?

Mr. McCAY.—I mean everywhere, all over Australia; with the exception, perhaps, of those realms in which the right honorable gentleman holds, or held, exclusive sway. I think that the public have reason for alarm in the attitude adopted by the right honorable gentleman, who is supposed to be the custodian of the finances of the Commonwealth, and to watch over its expenditure, so that no extravagance and no unnecessary outgoing of the public funds shall take place. But the right honorable gentleman told us, in effect, that in future the States must expect to get back not more than the statutory three-fourths of the net Commonwealth revenue to which they are entitled under the Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—My predecessor told them that at Hobart, in even plainer language than I used.

Mr. McCAY.—The right honorable member for Balaclava stated that the expenditure of the Commonwealth would inevitably grow until that result happened; but he did not announce the fact in tones of triumphant exultation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not say any more than he did.

Mr. McCAY.—The right honorable gentleman said, in the tones of one who rejoiced in the fact, that the Commonwealth expenditure would be increased.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Although the honorable and learned member sits in opposition to the Government, he need not be unfair.

Mr. McCAY.—No; and I have not been so.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think that the honorable and learned member is unfair.

Mr. McCAY.—The right honorable gentleman wishes to be both a member of the Government and a member of the Opposition, to direct the operations of both parties. If he succeeds in doing that, everything will go to his satisfaction. His attitude in regard to finance is well known. We have heard him say in this Chamber, when speaking of expenditure, "Pooh, what is a million?"

Sir JOHN FORREST.—My reputation for economy and good management will stand against that of the honorable and learned member, if he has any.

Mr. McCAY.—I have always been compelled to practice economy.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I mean as an administrator.

Mr. McCAY.—The spectacle of the right honorable gentleman claiming credit as an economical administrator is one to make both gods and men laugh.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the honorable and learned member goes to the State whose affairs I administered for so long he will ascertain what the people there think of me.

Mr. McCAY.—I remember hearing the right honorable gentleman say in this Chamber, when a question arose as to the anticipation of parliamentary appropriation, "When I wanted a few hundred thousand pounds, I took the money, and spent it." Economy! There must be a special definition of the word in the political dictionary of Western Australia.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There is no quicker way to become popular than to spend money.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member for Corinella has recently been to Western Australia, and should, therefore, know what I did there; and should be a good judge of my actions.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not know if the right honorable gentleman proposes to allow me to say the few words I wish to say with a comparatively small number of interruptions. Notwithstanding his long parliamentary experience, no one is so impatient under the mildest criticism and the gentlest of suggestions as he is. He has not a reputation for economy.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member should give us facts, and not fiction.

Mr. McCAY.—I am trying to do so. The right honorable gentleman has not a reputation for being economical. He tells us that that reputation is entirely undeserved; that of all mortals he is distinguished for his economical aspirations, efforts, and results.

Mr. KELLY.—Is that why there were no defences in Western Australia?

Mr. McCAY.—That may be the reason why the Commonwealth is now paying so large a sum for the construction of new works and buildings in Western Australia. The right honorable gentleman is so economical that he left it to the Commonwealth to undertake this expenditure. No State in the Union is, rightly or wrongly, benefiting so much by the practice of charging new works and buildings to the Commonwealth on the population basis, as is the State of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I deny that; I take exception to that statement.

Mr. McCAY.—Apparently nothing I can say will satisfy the right honorable gentleman. When I said that he was not economical he complained; and now that I am saying he was economical, and am pointing out these results of his economy, he is still complaining.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member says that Western Australia is gaining more advantage than any other State. Western Australia has to pay as well as to receive.

Mr. McCAY.—No doubt the right honorable gentleman refers to the special Tariff of that State.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No. Western Australia pays a good deal towards the sugar bounties.

Mr. McCAY.—The State pays in accordance with its population; but it gets a bigger proportion of the general expenditure of the Commonwealth on works and buildings than does any other State.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I question that.

Mr. McCAY.—The cost of the defences of Fremantle alone more than eat up Western Australia's contribution to the £400,000 which is to be spent on new works and buildings.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—How much has already been spent at Fremantle?

Mr. McCAY.—Up to the present time a few thousand pounds. The right honorable gentleman, in the Estimates of which he has charge, has a little item of £45,000 or so, to be expended there. He tells us now that he does not think the Braddon provision should be extended when its operation has expired.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—When did I say that?

Mr. McCAY.—Apparently the right honorable gentleman forgets what he said in the Budget speech. It is not that he had so much to say in that speech that he need have forgotten what it contains, because one of the complaints I have to make is that he told us very little indeed about the position of the finances.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have before me a report of my speech.

Mr. McCAY.—I have not committed the speech to memory, so that I cannot quote the exact words; but does the Treasurer deny that he indicated that he did not think the Braddon provision should be extended?

The CHAIRMAN.—The Treasurer will have an opportunity to reply later on to any statement made by the honorable and learned member, and that, I think, will be a better course for him to pursue than to reply now.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes; but when an ex-Minister criticises the Government he might be accurate in his statements.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The trouble is that he is too accurate.

Mr. McCAY.—Nothing I have said yet can be impugned on the ground of inaccuracy. I have endeavoured to do the right honorable gentleman the utmost justice. When he disputed the correctness of certain statements in regard to his conduct, I attributed to him an opposite line of conduct; but he still remained indignant, though one or other of my statements must have been correct. I am afraid it will be impossible for me to please him.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not wish the honorable and learned member to please me; I only desire him to be just.

Mr. McCAY.—I am thankful to the right honorable gentleman for the privilege allowed me of speaking on the Budget, whether my remarks please him or not. I repeat what I said at the outset, that the whole tendency of his speech is a promise to the Commonwealth that more money is to be spent. Do not we remember the tones of regret with which he announced that he was spending merely £400,000 upon new works and buildings? I do not remember his exact words, but he said in effect—and perhaps he will break through his usual practice, and correct me if I am in error—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—When the honorable and learned member proposes to criticise my conduct he should have the facts in his possession.

Mr. McCAY.—The right honorable gentleman pointed out that £400,000 was a small, almost a trifling, sum for this great Commonwealth to spend, even though it had to be obtained from revenue. That did not strike me as the utterance of a gentleman of an economical turn of mind. It seemed to me rather the remark of one who, rightly and properly, no doubt, sees great opportunities of doing great good by the expenditure of great sums of money; but who, not having great sums of money to spend, regrets the loss of those great opportunities for doing great good. That is an excellent and praiseworthy frame of mind. But the taxpayers of Australia, who understand the burdens, and do not always immediately realize the benefits, of expenditure, do not regard the situation with the equanimity with which he regards it. I have no great fault to find with the Estimates, particularly as they have the advantage of being to a large extent those of the preceding Government, and therefore display on the whole that due regard for economy which the right honorable gentleman's remarks do not seem to promise. It is true that they provide for a number of increases. There is, for example, an increase in connexion with defence expenditure. £51,000 more is to be voted for the naval subsidy. Last year, however, we paid only three-fourths of the annual subsidy, so that the remaining one-fourth was returned to the States. Then there is an increase of about £25,000 to provide for sugar bounties, in connexion with a policy on which the Commonwealth deliberately embarked, for at any rate a limited period, and those who believe in that policy should be glad to see that the amount claimed is increasing, because that fact signifies that the area of the cane-fields cultivated by white labour is extending. There is an increase of £120,000 on last year's works expenditure, of which some £50,000 is comprised in re-votes; and there are a number of large works, like the proposed telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney, to be undertaken.

Mr. POYNTON.—Is not that work to be paid for on a population basis?

Mr. McCAY.—All new works are to be paid for on a population basis, and I think that before we agree to them we should have some reasonable assurance that they will be remunerative. Then there is an increase of some £40,000 in the proposals for expenditure on defence. That is largely owing to necessary expenditure in connexion with the proper equipment of the forces, as to which I propose to say a word or two later on. It may, however, fairly be stated that in the Estimates about to be submitted for consideration there is no reasonable sign of extravagance or increased extravagance on the part of the Commonwealth. I have already pointed out that, as these are largely—practically wholly—the Estimates of the preceding Government, the last Administration and the present one must share alike in the praise or blame that may be bestowed in that connexion. It is the next Estimates that we view with apprehension, because it may be that the right honorable member for Swan will still be Treasurer when the next Estimates are framed and introduced—that is, if he still remains in Australia, and does not join that party which has been so violently reprobated by the honorable member for Darwin this afternoon. In an utterance like the Budget speech of the Commonwealth, one may expect to hear from the Treasurer some definite proposals upon the great financial questions that are agitating the public mind, and I do not know whether I shall be fortunate enough on this occasion to secure the concurrence of the Treasurer, when I say that, unfortunately, he gave us no definite information on any subject.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is a matter of opinion, upon which the honorable member has a perfect right to express his view.

Mr. McCAY.—I think I may be permitted, without being egotistical, to congratulate myself upon having said something that the right honorable gentleman permits me to say. In his Budget speech, he spoke about the sugar bonus. He told us in general terms that the bonus was to be extended, but he did not state for what period, and he was equally silent upon one or two other important details. It may be that the right honorable gentleman's association with the Prime Minister, who is frequently up in the clouds, has developed a little of the same nebulous state of mind in himself. He told us that we must increase our population. He gave us a glowing account of Australia, her resources, her wealth, her people, and her future, combined with the fact that we were not increasing our population, and he said that by assisting immigrants with cheap passages, advances from land banks, and grants of land from the States, we should be able to increase the number of useful inhabitants of Australia. He did not tell us how far, if at all, his arrangements with the States Governments had proceeded, or as to what negotiations, if any—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—How could I do that? What time had I to do that?

Mr. McCAY.—I do not suppose that the right honorable gentleman could have done so, for the very good reason that no negotiations had proceeded. A vague general statement such as he made, which has no practical work done in connexion with it, is not of very much use to the Commonwealth. When the right honorable gentleman did venture to express one or two opinions, and was asked whether he was announcing the Government policy, he said that the Government had not yet considered this or that subject. The complaint I have to make about his speech, rightly or wrongly, is of a twofold character, that, in the first place, it aroused alarm as to the probable future expenditure of the Commonwealth, more especially in connexion with the significant change which has occurred in the right honorable gentleman's mind with regard to the Braddon section, and, in the second place, on those great questions of public policy, upon which the country is entitled to have definite information with regard to the attitude of the Government, no word was forthcoming.

Mr. POYNTON.—Why did not the Government, with which the honorable and learned member was connected, tell us what they intended to do?

Mr. McCAY.—Because it was unfortunately cut short in the flower of its youth, just when it was about to submit a series of valuable proposals. We have our policy ready for future operations, and will unfold it when we have the opportunity we so much desired of asking the public to determine whether it is wholesome. The Treasurer also referred to the fact that Australia is being decried. We all agree upon that point, and, further, that it is being unjustly decried, but we must remember that we have given some foundation for the superstructure of decrial that has been built up. There is a little fire to cause the very large amount of smoke. Let us take the case, which occurred only the other day, of the groom who came from England to New South Wales. As I understand the matter, that groom was engaged to come from London to some inland part of New South Wales under contract to deliver horses.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was done under the Government with which the honorable and learned member was connected.

Mr. McCAY.—It was done by the Agent-General in London. The Act under which the certificate was issued was not introduced by the Government of which I was a member. I do not profess to know enough about the facts to be able to say whether this man required an exemption certificate, but I contend that the contract labour section of the Act affords reasonable ground for any ordinary business man to assume that such a certificate was essential to enable the man to proceed with the horses to his destination. At all events, if the business man concerned made a mistake, he erred on the side of safety in procuring a certificate.

Mr. POYNTON.—Did not the honorable and learned member vote for that particular provision?

Mr. McCAY.—I have no objection to the principle embodied in the section. It was adopted for two specific purposes, namely, to prevent men being brought into Australia under contract to work at less than the prevailing rates of wages, and under worse conditions than the ordinary—a most wholesome object—and to prevent employers from utilizing outside labour as a means of cowing their workmen with whom they might have a difference at a time of strike, or when a strike was impending. We may reasonably hope that, in view of the extension of legislation for conciliation and arbitration throughout the States, we shall not be much troubled with this form of industrial dispute in the future. At any rate, these were the main objects which the section was intended to serve, and I do not for a moment wish to prevent them from being maintained. I contend, however, that the section as it stands lends some colour—I do not say justly so—to the representations of those who are evilly disposed to Australia, and affords them an opportunity of making statements which are very damaging to us. I never concurred with a great deal of the harsh criticism that was employed in connexion with the six hatters' case, or with most of what was said in connexion with the Petiana case. I think that the great bulk of the criticism directed at our past legislation has been unjust and unwarranted, but there is just enough foundation for it to enable those who wish to do so to still build up a number of damaging allegations, and I should like to see it made clear by legislation or administration that white people who want to come to work here under prevailing conditions, and who are not brought here in order to confer an advantage upon one of the parties to a dispute, shall be able to do so. This should be done, so that we may not continue to leave ourselves open to the charges which have been made, however unjust and unfounded we may know them to be. I do not wish to see our legislation so modified as to prevent the great, important, and valuable objects to which I have referred from continuing to be carried into effect. It is largely a false impression that has been conveyed to the minds of the British public in connexion with that provision, an impression that Australia has passed class legislation instead of legislation for the good of the whole community. But legislation, such as the union trade mark provision, for instance, with all the implications that can be built upon it—as that provision stands, I think it is open to objection, but there are other implications that can be built upon it—afford just a sufficiency of foundation for the allegations made against us, to render them difficult to answer. These facts, together with the knowledge that the Treasurer and others are compelled, by the necessities of the political situation, possibly to subordinate their own individual views in matters of this kind, and to concur in the passing of legislation that they do not in their hearts approve of, render it difficult for those who have the welfare of Australia at heart, to do what ought to be done in order to keep the name of the Commonwealth in as good odour as we should like. I desire to say a word or two with regard to the book-keeping period in reference to which the Treasurer is reported in Hansard, at page 1213, as having said—

Unless some better arrangement can be made—That is beautifully definite—a most important qualification.

I certainly think that the only thing to do is to continue the bookkeeping period until the end of the operation of the Braddon clause.

The honorable member for Capricornia asked—

Do the Government intend to do that?

Then the Treasurer, with the caution that characterizes him, said—

I am not prepared to make a definite statement on that point.

He is not reported as having said “nor any other,” but he might as well have said it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is statesmanship.

Mr. PAGE.—It is like one of the statements of the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. McCAY.—When honorable members have to resort to tu quoque argument they are hard put to it. We have already taken a step in the direction of what we might call the true finance of Federation by charging all our expenditure in connexion with works and buildings upon a population basis. That is a step of which I approve in spite of the temporary disadvantage that results to one or two States that are more forward than others. I do not particularize the States for fear of interruption. I feel, however, that if the bookkeeping be continued either for the five years originally intended, or for a further term until the end of the period fixed for the operation of the Braddon section, or for any other period, and we make a sudden change at the end of that fixed term, from the bookkeeping to the other method, there will be great outcries. We have had a wholesome example of what can be done by proceeding gradually, instead of abruptly, in connexion with the Western Australian Special Tariff. The Tariff has been diminished year by year by one-fifth, and will disappear next year. There has been no great complaint in that connexion. The fears that were at one time expressed, that the finances of Western Australia would suffer, have not been realized, and it may be that the fact that the receipts have been greater than was anticipated has contributed to that result. In that case we have, by the use of a sliding scale, largely diminished the objection that would attach to making a sudden change, and it seems to me that we might with advantage adopt a similar principle in connexion with the transition from the bookkeeping system to the more truly Federal system of finance. It is quite true that the circumstances of Western Australia are different in this respect—that the adoption of a system of expenditure upon a population basis would affect that State to its detriment, much more materially than it would any other State. I am inclined to think that the Treasurer did not overlook that fact when he declared that in his opinion the bookkeeping period should be extended for a number of years. In this connexion, I think—and I speak not merely from my own impressions, because I have the advantage of knowing the mind of the right honorable member for Balaclava upon the subject, and we all recognise that his opinion is worthy of every consideration—that we should abolish the bookkeeping period gradually by adopting a sliding scale extending over five years. In view of the special circumstances of Western Australia, I should be quite satisfied—although she is getting advantages in other directions—to allow the sliding scale in her case to extend over a period of ten years. I feel convinced that some such method is the only one which will satisfy the public as a whole in exchanging the bookkeeping system for a per capita method. We cannot remain upon the bookkeeping basis for ever. So long as that system continues it cannot be said that we are truly federated. At the same time, we ought to make the change gradually, and, therefore, I suggest that we should adopt a five years' sliding scale in the case of all the States except Western Australia, with a somewhat longer period in the case of that State. I should now like to say a word or two in reference to what is called the Braddon section of the Constitution. I do not know whether the Treasurer entertains the view that that section should cease to operate at the period fixed for its expiry by the Constitution. As I have apparently misunderstood his remarks, I shall be glad to know his opinion upon the matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member will see my view of it by reference to page 1217 of Hansard.

Mr. McCAY.—The Treasurer stated—

I do not see that much good can result to the States by extending the duration of the Braddon provision. It may restrict the spending powers of this Parliament, but I cannot imagine that we shall do anything to injure the people of the States. They are our constituents, and to injure them would be to injure ourselves. This Parliament will neither injure nor ignore the people of the States.

That sentence means, if it means anything, that he is an advocate for not extending the Braddon section of the Constitution.

Mr. PAGE.—What else could it mean?

Mr. McCAY.—I do not know. When I said just now that the right honorable gentleman had expressed the opinion that the Braddon section should not be continued, he challenged the accuracy of my statement.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I said—as will be seen by reference to the same page—that my judgment led me in the direction of desiring to return to the States a fixed sum annually, and that, under such conditions, there would be no necessity for a continuance of the Braddon section.

Mr. McCAY.—That would be a most delightful system for the Commonwealth to adopt, but it would not be appreciated by the States Treasurers, because the population of Australia will grow—the Government anticipate that their policy will make it increase by leaps and bounds—whereas the Commonwealth contribution would remain the same.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I said that a fixed sum might be returned to the States, subject to periodical adjustments.

Mr. McCAY.—I understood the right honorable gentleman to propose the Canadian practice. We must recollect, however, that when that system was adopted in Canada the revenue from the sources from which we derive £7,000,000 annually was something less than £1,000,000. That is a very different state of affairs from that which obtains in the Commonwealth. We could make an arrangement in regard to £1,000,000 that we could not make in regard to £7,000,000.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—To this day the Dominion Government returns so much per head to the Canadian provinces.

Mr. McCAY.—The right honorable gentleman wishes to do away with the Braddon section. But I would point out that, whatever authority may spend the public money, be it Commonwealth or State, the same citizens have to pay. That fact should be remembered. I say that the people of Australia rightly regard the Braddon section as a check upon Federal expenditure. Fancy this Parliament with the restriction imposed by that section, or some other equally powerful restriction, removed from our Constitution! Fancy the saturnalia of Federal expenditure with the Treasurer as high priest! Even he would forget to be economical under such circumstances.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member will represent me as a very extravagant individual presently.

Mr. McCAY.—The taxpayers of Australia say that there must be some check imposed upon Federal expenditure. If we took over all the transferred departments which have not yet been established—leaving out of consideration our special sources of expenditure, such as the sugar bounty, the iron bonus, old-age pensions, &c.—by being somewhat extravagant we could easily expend very close up to our one-fourth share of the Customs and excise receipts. Even the right honorable gentleman himself might find it comparatively easy to achieve that result. But if anything like the remaining three-quarters of the Customs and excise revenue were available to this Parliament there would be a temptation to spend which we might find irresistible. We all know that in the case of Parliaments with large sums at their disposal there is a very great disposition to spend money. The spending decisions of any Legislature are nearly always limited by its spending capacity. A Parliament which, throughout a long period—in the face of pressure brought to bear in favour of expending a little money here and a little there—would virtuously resist the temptation, and return to the States sums which it is under no obligation to return, is such an anomaly in modern life that we need not seriously contemplate its continued existence. The fact that for some years past the Commonwealth has been doing this is due to the circumstance that our actions have been scrutinized with great exactitude, and have had bestowed upon them greater attention that has ever before been bestowed upon the actions of any Parliament. Moreover, we were morally bound to return to the States as much as we could, owing to the fact that we had fixed a limit which our expenditure was not to exceed; and in the early days of the Federation we felt it incumbent upon us to give a sufficient reason for every pound that we proposed to spend. But if we were released from the obligations imposed by the Braddon section, all the big schemes for spending hundreds of thousands of pounds in various directions—

Mr. WILKS.—By way of bonuses.

Mr. McCAY.—I believe in bonuses, so that I cannot sympathize with the interjection of the honorable member. I repeat that under such circumstances there would be a temptation to spend money which this Parliament would find irresistible. There must be some check upon our powers of expenditure, and the people of Australia feel that the effect of the Braddon section has been a salutary one. The fact that we have kept within its limits is no reason for doing away with all restriction, so that we can exceed those limits. The taxpayers regard that section as one of their best safeguards against unnecessary Federal expenditure. There are legitimate objects upon which we could expend large sums of money if we wished to do so. In this connexion I may instance the question of old-age pensions. Before I vote for that proposal, I wish to see where the money necessary to give effect to it is to come from.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I hope that the honorable and learned member does not infer from anything I have said that I wish to return to the States less than has been returned to them. I desire to give them as much as I can.

Mr. McCAY.—The right honorable gentleman means that he wishes to give them as much as he can spare, which is an utterly different thing.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does not the honorable and learned member think that in regard to the iron bonus—apart from the merits of the question altogether—we might inquire where the money with which to pay it is to come from?

Mr. McCAY.—The Commonwealth will be in a position to pay that bonus out of its one-fourth of the Customs and Excise revenue. We will not be required to spend £300,000 in one year. The Treasurer has said that in regard to the transferred Departments we ought to adopt the system of crediting and debiting balances. At first sight it seems to be common sense that we should merely account for differences, instead of crediting and debiting the whole amount. There is no objection to that from a bookkeeping stand-point, nor is there from the stand-point of the taxpayers, if we did not expend more than we are entitled to. But if we are merely to credit and debit balances, it is only the interest on the balances which will have to be appropriated out of the one-fourth of the Customs and Excise revenue to which the Commonwealth is entitled. On the other hand, if we credited and debited the totals, the matter would assume a very different complexion.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member would not impoverish the Commonwealth?

Mr. McCAY.—I do not wish the Commonwealth to have to look around for ways in which to spend money. I do not desire it to have so much money to expend that it will require to look round for a means of investment. If we merely credit and debit balances in connexion with transferred properties—the States debts remaining with the States, as they appear likely to do for some time—we shall have those properties vested in a new trustee—the Commonwealth. They will still remain the property of the taxpayers; but we shall have the States continuing to bear the interest upon the debts out of which those public properties were erected or acquired, out of their three-fourths of the net Customs and Excise revenue, and the Commonwealth out of its one-fourth share of that revenue will be called upon to bear only the expense of the debited and credited balances. That position would affect the States finances. The States would nominally receive back their three-fourths of the Customs and Excise receipts; but they would really be refunded the three-fourths of that revenue less these charges. Frankly, from the point of view of a member of this Parliament, and looking at the Commonwealth capacity and powers, I say that if I considered it fair to leave the interest charges with the States, and to debit and credit only the balances, it would be much more satisfactory to one's own feeling to adopt that course. But it would not be justice.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Whichever method we adopt, the interest upon the transferred properties ought to come into our balance-sheet.

Mr. McCAY.—The interest upon the balances would do so.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But we are tight up against our limit now.

Mr. McCAY.—I think that the transferred properties are worth about £10,000,000, and that the balances represent about £1,000,000. Consequently, if we debit and credit balances only we shall have to pay out of our one-fourth of the Customs and Excise revenue interest upon £1,000,000; whereas, if we debit and credit totals, we shall have to pay interest upon £10,000,000. Which is the fairer method to adopt, seeing that the States retain the debts, and the liability to pay the interest upon the loans, which have, to a large extent, been used in creating the assets that we have taken over?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If we use those properties, the interest upon them ought to come into our accounts.

Mr. McCAY.—I think so. It was the economical instinct of the Treasurer which prompted him to make the suggestion that he did.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—This House has to settle the matter.

Mr. McCAY.—But the Treasurer is the leader of the House in regard to financial matters, and I wish to know where he is leading us.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member agrees with what I desire to do.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The right honorable gentleman is leading us right into the Ministerial corner.

Mr. McCAY.—He certainly is not doing so, although he has gone there himself, leaving two or three of us behind. I cannot speak for some of my honorable friends on the direct Opposition benches, but the right honorable gentleman left the honorable member for Gippsland and one or two others behind as unnecessary encumbrances when he took the little journey to which I have referred.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member has changed his seat in the House.

Mr. McCAY.—People usually do when they get kicked out of their seats. I left my seat on the Government side to make room for the right honorable gentleman.

Mr. PAGE. — Whom did the honorable and learned member kick out in order to get possession of the Government benches?

Mr. McCAY.—I was sitting in direct opposition at the time of the overthrow of the Watson Government. There is only one other matter relating to the financial side of the Budget to which I desire to refer, and that is the question of the continuation of the sugar bounty. The bounty has undoubtedly done a great deal in the direction in which it was hoped that it would produce results. Four or five years ago the quantity of white-grown sugar produced in Australia was only one-fifth of that grown by black labour; but the estimate for the coming year is that white-grown sugar will constitute one-half of the total production.

Mr. MAHON.—Has not the quantity of black-grown sugar also increased?

Mr. McCAY.—That is so; but I am speaking of the proportion of white-grown sugar to black-grown sugar. Three or four years ago the output of black-grown sugar was about five times as great as that grown by white labour.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The point is, that the quantity of white-grown sugar is increasing, while black-grown sugar is not decreasing.

Mr. McCAY. — We have to remember that the estimate for the coming year is that the production of black-grown sugar will be only twice as great as that of the white-grown article. Previously, about 16 per cent. of the total production was white-grown, but now we have something like 33 per cent. of our sugar grown by white labour. The percentage shows an increase in favour of the white-grown article.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The estimate is about 40 per cent.

Mr. McCAY.—I am merely using approximate figures. We are now asked to renew the bounty. I am a protectionist, and I supported the granting of the bounty on protectionist principles, as well as on the ground that it would assist to secure a White Australia. There were other honorable members who, although free-traders, supported the proposal, because they believed that we ought to have a White Australia, and recognised that if we desired to bring about that result, we must be prepared to pay something for it. So far as one is able to judge from the facts, the bounty cannot be suddenly terminated, as now provided, on 1st January, 1907. Speaking as a Victorian, I say that there is no State in the Union which suffers more pecuniary disadvantage from the Commonwealth system of dealing with the sugar industry than does Victoria. Before Federation, Victoria had a revenue duty of £5 15s. a ton on sugar, and there was only a margin of 5s. per ton allowed by way of protection to the local refiner. Practically the Victorian duty on sugar was a revenue one. By losing a very considerable proportion of the revenue that she derived from that source, Victoria has been a financial sufferer, and has not received any corresponding direct financial gain. Still, she has no right to complain of that.

Mr. PAGE.—As the result of the present system, have not many Brisbane factories been closed?

Mr. McCAY.—I have just said that Victoria has no right to complain, because the sugar bounty is part of the protectionist policy of Australia, of which policy Victoria provides a considerable number of advocates; and it may be that she obtains indirectly some benefit from the system of refining now being carried on otherwise than it would have been. Nevertheless, as a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence—as a matter affecting the public revenue—it cannot be denied that Victoria is paying fairly heavily in this direction.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—And the fruit-growers of Victoria are paying fairly heavily for the system.

Mr. McCAY.—That is so. I am acquainted with a number of fruit-growers who live near me, and they may also be affected to some extent by the present system. It is clear, however, from the figures that have been quoted by the Treasurer, that the quantity of black-grown sugar is still far ahead of the white-grown article, and that if we suddenly terminated the bounty, much injury would be done to the Queensland sugar-growers. We should extend the bounty. I do not recollect whether the Treasurer mentioned the extension proposed by the Government.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—An extension of five years.

Mr. McCAY.—Human nature is human nature all the world over. That is so even of protectionist human nature, which is the purest form of which I know. If we extended the bounty as it stands for five years, it would be justly said at the end of that period, "The Parliament must not suddenly abolish it." It seems to me that we must once more resort to the device of the sliding scale—a device which has always proved successful in connexion with the introduction of changes. I notice that the honorable member for South Sydney suggested yesterday that the bounty should be extended on a sliding scale, and I think I am able also to say that the right honorable member for Balaclava holds the same view. If we extend the bounty—not necessarily for five years; I should be prepared to extend it for a further period, if that were essential—we must provide for its payment on a sliding scale, so that it will disappear automatically, instead of merely by the effluxion of time, or by the passing of an Act of Parliament. When a measure of that kind becomes necessary, the pressure that is brought to bear and the good case that can be made out for an extension make it exceedingly difficult to say "No." I again urge upon the Government that they should consider the advisableness of bringing, not only the book-keeping period, but the system of granting the sugar bounty, to a termination by means of a sliding scale. If it be desired to continue the bounty for another year or two at the present rate, because the growers have been led to justly hope for such an extension, let us enact that for two years it shall continue at the present rate, but shall then disappear by a sliding scale extending over five, or even seven years. If the bounty be diminished year by year, the force of the blow will not be felt by any one as it would be if the whole system were suddenly abolished. I commend this suggestion to the serious consideration of the Government, believing that it will provide the most satisfactory solution of the difficulty. I desire now to say a few words on the question of the defence vote and our defence policy. As honorable members know, this is a subject in which I have taken a deep interest for a long time, and to which I have devoted as much attention as I could possibly give to it. I am very sorry to see that the Estimates for the current year, as submitted, are less—although it is only by a thousand or two—than were the Estimates for the last financial year.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No alteration has been made in the Estimates as left by the honorable and learned member on retiring from office.

Mr. McCAY.—There is a considerable reduction.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Only by way of economies.

Mr. McCAY.—Perhaps the right honorable gentleman does not know how the reduction has been effected.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I shall be glad to know of anything of which the honorable and learned member may be pleased to inform me.

Mr. McCAY.—The right honorable gentleman knows a great deal, but he does not very often favour the House with all that he learns.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have already said that I shall be glad to hear what the honorable and learned member has to tell me on this point.

Mr. McCAY.—I shall tell the right honorable gentleman how the reduction in the Estimates, as I left them, compared with those now before us, has been arrived at. It has been achieved by two simple processes. There has been no alteration so far as I can see in a single proposed appropriation for stores, or in respect of one man in the force. The Defence Estimates, as I prepared them, made provision for 1,500 men more than were provided for in the Estimates of the previous year, at an increased cost of something like £6,000. This was possible only by the economies to which the right honorable gentleman has referred—by scrutinizing every item, from beginning to end, of the Defence Estimates, which is no light task, and by cutting off even a £5 note where that saving could be effected. I personally went through every item in the Estimates of my Department, and the proposal for an increase of 1,500, to a large extent in the forces of Tasmania, was the result of an arrangement which I thought would be satisfactory to that State, after the difficulty of a year or two ago. But the Government, while professing to make this increase in the strength of the forces without increasing the Defence Estimates, have really effected the so-called economies by saying that the increase shall not take place "until 1st January, 1906."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable and learned member say that we have done that?

Mr. McCAY.—The incoming Government did that.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—And upset all the arrangements which had involved so much trouble.

Mr. McCAY.—That is so; the Government proposal really means that, instead of having these men on 1st January, 1906, we shall not obtain them until about 1st May, 1906. It will upset all the arrangements made in Tasmania, in respect of which there was special reason for fair consideration. The other means by which a saving has been effected, so far as I can make out, is this—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—How much will be saved in this way?

Mr. McCAY.—When we are dealing with the Defence Estimates, I shall refer to that point.

Mr. WILKS.—Would the honorable and learned member speak of this as "financial dodgery"?

Mr. McCAY.—I should not.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does this saving apply only to Tasmania?

Mr. McCAY.—To all the States. Wherever a proposed increase appears on the Estimates, we see a foot-note setting forth that it is to date from 1st January, 1906.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Some weeks of the current financial year have already passed, and it seems that the Estimates will not have been finally dealt with much before January next.

Mr. McCAY.—Then the right honorable gentleman will be able to do this year what the Defence Department did last year. In the month of February I had a chat with my colleague, the right honorable member for Balaclava, who was then Treasurer, and we came to the conclusion that we could save £45,000 on the Defence expenditure. Having arrived at that decision, we promptly appropriated the £45,000 to make good arrears in the purchase of special warlike stores. But until these Estimates are at any rate authorized, the Department will not be able to move hand or foot in the direction of securing more men before 1st January next.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In any event, we shall not have much time to get ready before that date.

Mr. McCAY.—It takes time to get recruits ready for the ranks. But the Governments could tell the State Commandants to make their arrangements now.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We shall be able to get them ready by the 1st January.

Mr. McCAY.—When we begin to drill recruits for a partially-paid force, we must make arrangements to pay them in respect of drills.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We shall be able to make a start on the 1st January.

Mr. McCAY.—I hold that the economy which the Government propose will be economy at the expense of the efficiency of the Australian forces.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—How could the late Government have paid these men from 1st July, when the Estimates would not have been passed until some months later?

Mr. McCAY.—The increases would have dated from 1st July. Had there been no want of confidence motion moved against the late Government, I should have chanced the Estimates being passed, and, as soon as the Budget had been brought in and discussed, would have ordered the Commandants to go ahead and enlist these additional men.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Where would the responsibility of Parliament have come in?

Mr. McCAY.—Once the debate on the Budget has been concluded, there is considered to have been a general approval of the Estimates as a whole.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Not necessarily.

Mr. McCAY.—I think one might very well suppose that that is so, in connexion with proposals for the raising of troops.

Mr. KENNEDY.—We are now in the middle of the first half-year, and the Budget has not yet been approved.

Mr. McCAY.—I take it that, in spite of some of the long speeches that have been delivered, it will be approved before the 1st January next.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is suggested by the honorable and learned member that the Minister should commit the Commonwealth to certain expenditure, and then ask Parliament to ratify it.

Mr. STORRER.—There is apparently a desire to ruin the forces in Tasmania.

Mr. McCAY.—I can assure the honorable member that if the Estimates were passed as framed by me, they would go a long way to allay any cause of discontent in Tasmania. I make that statement with a full knowledge of the facts gained as the result of a visit that I paid to the State, and from personally meeting men of all ranks in the local forces. The other way in which the reduction has been made is this: Wherever an amount is set down for pay for attendance at drills, the estimated saving that will be occasioned by men not attending the drills which they must attend to entitle them to payment, is deducted, and, so far as I can ascertain, these estimated savings have been increased.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Very likely. I reduced the Estimates a little.

Mr. McCAY.—If the estimated savings have been increased, they have been unwisely increased, because the amount had already been reduced to the lowest margin proper.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It was done by the Department.

Mr. McCAY.—Then it must have been done on pressure by the Treasurer.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The reduction was desired by me.

Mr. McCAY.—It is desirable that the total estimate for the Defence expenditure should not much exceed the total actually expended during the year, because otherwise the calculations of the States Treasurers are thrown out.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member's present remarks do not suggest great extravagance on my part; they rather point to economy.

Mr. McCAY.—I have already explained that the Treasurer found these Estimates practically ready to his hand.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But I have reduced them rather.

Mr. McCAY.—The right honorable gentleman has merely cut down necessary expenditure here and there beyond the limit of safety. We, on this side, can forego a reputation for economy of that kind. We do not desire that such economy shall be credited to us.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—At any rate, I am glad to hear that we have not increased the Estimates of the late Government.

Mr. McCAY.—I had to reduce the Defence Estimates very much below what I would have left them at, if I could have had my own way; but that is the misfortune of every Defence Minister.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Will these Estimates upset the arrangement made by the honorable and learned member?

Mr. McCAY.—Only until the 1st January. They will postpone it. By the time everything was in working order, the Estimates would have been pretty nearly through Committee; but this prevents the arrangement from being begun.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think so.

Mr. McCAY.—I can assure the right honorable gentleman, from the practical knowledge of the working of the Department which I possess, that it does.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I disagree with the honorable and learned member.

Mr. McCAY.—That is a misfortune which I shall bear with such philosophy as I possess. I do not wish to discuss the details of the Defence Estimates to-day, but I desire to say a few words about what, in my opinion, the defence policy of Australia should be; to give reasons why a certain policy should be followed; and to show how far Australia is carrying out that policy. I have no quarrel at all with those who urge that our main defence should be on the sea. I agree entirely that our real defence against the permanent occupation of our country by any enemy is the fact that we are a part of the British Empire, and are protected by the British Navy. If by some misfortune we became separated from the British Empire to-morrow, we should be the helpless prey of any of the great powers, supposing that we had no one to come to our assistance. That is certain and definite. Our security depends on the existence and central control of the Imperial Navy, and upon the fact that, with central control, the Imperial Navy can be moved as a whole, or in parts, to the points of danger, where its naval supremacy may be threatened. So long as its naval supremacy can be challenged, the challenge can be met only by that single control. The efforts of an Australian Navy, unless it were equal in strength to the navies of at least the second-rate naval powers of the world, would be no substantial protection to the Commonwealth, apart from the navy of the Empire. We in Australia, as a portion of the Empire, are bound to recognise our obligations to it in connexion with naval defence. We do so at the present time by a contribution of some £200,000 per annum. Had we plenty of money, that would not be a contribution proportionate to the benefits we receive; but it is a contribution roughly proportionate to our capacity to pay. There are other methods of expenditure which are more urgent, not only from the Australian, but also from the Imperial, point of view, to which we should therefore resort before increasing our Imperial contribution, always remembering that we are not paying our fair share. Australia, although in one sense a source of weakness because of her remoteness from the centre of the Empire, may be made a considerable source of strength to the Empire. We are set here in the South Pacific, and the events of the recent Russo-Japanese war—I am sure that every one is glad to be able now to speak of it as recent—have shown that storm centres may arise in the Pacific just as they may arise in the Atlantic or in the North Sea. I am not going to discuss where the great war is to take place. There are different schools of thought on the subject; but it is clear, from what we have seen recently, and from the fact that foreign nations have acquired, and are acquiring, naval bases and fortified coaling stations in the southern seas, that Australia is no longer remote from the theatre of the world's wars, as we were half-a-century, or even a shorter period of time, ago. The increased rapidity of communication between distant countries which has come about by the use of fast steam vessels, has decreased our distance from the world's centres; but, in addition to that, as you, Mr. Chairman, pointed out recently in another debate, when we look at the map of the South Pacific, and see that we are within striking distance of the naval stations of various foreign powers, we must realize that Australia is no longer that outlying and, consequently, protected portion of the world that it once was. Our duty to the Empire is, in some respects, what the duty of the outpost of an army is, and demands that we should make these advanced positions safe. We should be able to say to the mother land, "On the high seas you must continue to be our defence for a considerable time to come, as you have been in the past, though our financial circumstances do not permit us to pay you in proportion to the benefits which we receive, nor do we think it strategically wise to substitute for the Imperial Navy an Australian sea-going navy under independent command. Still, so far as our shores are concerned, we are ready to protect our centres of commercial life." In Australia these commercial centres are practically all on the sea coast, and, so far as commerce is concerned, the country is one huge littoral, having practically no interior, because almost the whole of its trade is carried on close to the coast. We should be able to say to the Empire, "We will protect ourselves, so far as our commercial interests are concerned"—and these are Australian chiefly, and only indirectly Imperial interests—"and will provide what the Imperial and any other navy requires, secure naval bases to which it can resort whenever occasion demands." No fleet is of any use, be it the greatest fleet in the world, unless it can found its operations on secure bases. If there is one lesson which recent naval wars have taught—the Spanish-American war and the just-ended Russo-Japanese war—it is that fleets cannot operate unless they know that they have behind them bases to which they can retreat, and where they will be secure. We, in Australia, can make our naval bases secure. But we have not done so yet. So far as any blame is attachable to me for inaction in this matter during the short time I was in office, I am prepared to accept it. But we can do what I speak of. If any struggle, in which the Empire was engaged, was so great that British naval supremacy was seriously threatened, the Australian Navy which every penny of the Commonwealth revenue could raise and support, would not count very largely. It is only in the case of British naval supremacy being seriously threatened that our coasts would be likely to be denuded for a time of Imperial protection. That is a fact which we must always bear in mind, putting on one side a matter to which I shall now allude—the occasional raids that may be expected from escaping cruisers of the enemy. In the event of the whole of the British fleet being drawn away for a time to meet some great crisis, we must arrange to meet the possibility of an enemy's cruisers coming along our shores and raiding our towns. But if the crisis is so great that the whole of the British fleet must be called away, to meet it, I am inclined to think that the whole of the enemy's fleet will also be called away.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—An enemy's vessels could not get enough coal to enable them to come here.

Mr. McCAY.—Foreign powers are acquiring coaling ports in the South Pacific, and I can quite conceive of circumstances under which Australia's best defence would be to convey in transports our land forces, and make descents upon certain harbors in the South Pacific, which occur to all, and which I need not mention now. Such circumstances would provide an occasion on which Australian troops might well operate beyond Australia, not for Imperial defence, but for purely Australian defence, and such occasions must be borne in mind. That is one of the reasons, though there are many others, why we must have what is called a field force in Australia. But I do not wish to anticipate. We must provide not only for the security of our naval bases, and for the protection of our centres of commercial life, but also for the security of coaling ports for trading ships, and ships of war. We must provide secure harbors of refuge for the shipping that may have temporarily to shelter there. All these things not only can, but should be done by Australia, so that she may do her share in Imperial defence. I press this point because sometimes at the other side of the world, in the old country, and even on this side of the water, there are those who suggest that we should do away with all these means of defence, and rely solely on the Imperial Navy. That is a mistake. To develop Australia as a part of the Empire, the public must have reasonable security, a reasonable belief that they are reasonably safe against attacks that may be reasonably apprehended. That is a duty which we can perform. What kind of attacks, I ask, are we likely to have to meet? As I have already said, invasion by a large army for the purpose of permanently occupying Australia I put aside, not as beyond the bounds of our possibility to conceive, but as beyond the bounds of our possibility to meet, apart from Imperial protection. Although we could give an enemy a pretty lively time before he finally subdued Australia, he could take possession of our coastal settlements and could smash us up so far as our development was concerned. Still, I do not think anything of that kind is likely to occur; although our sole dependence against any such contingency is our Imperial connexion. Then we may have raids in greater or less strength, flying raids by sea attack only, or, what I venture to think is much more likely, flying raids by sea, accompanied by small land attacks. History has shown that in no cases have bombardments been anything to bother about; at any rate, not the short bombardments that an enemy's cruisers could indulge in on Australian shores, because they could not afford to throw away their ammunition. But, further than that, the best provision we could have against the bombardment of most of our Australian ports would be good fire brigades. I would sooner have a series of good fire brigades than a strong military force at the time of a bombardment. I have noticed that fears have been expressed that an enemy's cruisers might lie off, say, Manly, and bombard the city of Sydney; but, if I may be permitted to do so, I would advise the residents of Sydney not to sleep any the less soundly on account of that fear. All the damage that an enemy is likely to succeed in doing could be checked by the exertions of an efficient fire brigade, and very little compensation would have to be paid for chance loss incurred by the owners of private property. A bombardment by a hostile cruiser would not result in any harm worth speaking of. History tells us also that combined attacks on fortified ports by sea and land—by the front door and the back door—are the only effective operations. The honorable member for Wentworth expressed a fear lest an enemy's cruisers might come along carrying torpedo boats, with the idea of making a raid at night by the means of the smaller vessels. He argued, therefore, that our fixed defences should be placed in a satisfactory state. I would go further than he does, and say that our harbor defences ought to be made satisfactory, and that at some of our harbors fixed defences alone are not sufficient. In Port Phillip, for instance, we must have some floating defences in addition to fixed defences. I do not suggest that the Cerberus should be re-armed, although £2,000 has been placed on the Estimates for that purpose. That sum was included in the Estimates before I had left office pending certain investigation. Before I left office, I wrote a minute, stating that the investigation referred to had proved that the money should not be spent in that direction, but in some other manner.

Mr. PAGE.—Would the honorable and learned member vote against that appropriation being made?

Mr. McCAY. — Certainly. In the event of no other honorable member taking action, I shall move that the item be struck out. We must have our land defences, in which I include movable land forces, whether they be called field or garrison forces, as well as our fixed defences. Movable land forces would comprise infantry, mounted troops, field artillery, and various other corps, such as engineers, transport corps, army service corps, and so on. Fixed defences consist of big guns, and of quick-firing guns, the latter being required to meet torpedo attacks, twelve-pounders being recognised as the proper class of guns to use for the purpose. The fixed defences would also include something that we have not yet properly provided, namely, a proper electric light equipment, including movable search-lights and fixed beams. All these things will have to be done before we shall have fulfilled that elementary duty to the Empire and to ourselves of which I spoke at an earlier stage. Major-General Hutton when he was here two or three years ago propounded a scheme for the constitution of the best force for the purpose of defending the Commonwealth. I shall speak in round figures, because I do not wish to bother honorable members with details. He proposed that the land forces should have a peace strength of 26,000 men, and a war strength of 40,000. The 40,000 men were to be used as garrison troops and field forces. A number of criticisms have been directed against field forces on the ground that they are intended to be used to take part in Imperial wars elsewhere. That is an entirely new idea, and nothing of the kind is contemplated. In 1894, the States Commandants, in conference, recommended that garrison and field forces should be maintained. As a matter of fact, we have always had them, although they have not been so called. In 1901, the Commandants recommended the maintenance of field and garrison forces, and the Colonial Defence Committee has approved of the division into garrison and field forces. Although the Committee has been attacked by many persons, its opinion is worth a good deal. When he came here in 1902, Major-General Hutton advocated that we should have field and garrison forces, adopting a view that had been already approved as sound. I think that all those who expressed this view were right, and I believe I know the reasons that actuated them. Although the States of Australia are united in the Commonwealth, and although one of the avowed objects for which we were united was to perfect our defences, the fact of our political union does not alter the strategical considerations that have to be taken into account when arranging for the defence of Australia. We have an extensive coastline, our great cities are situated on the coast, and our population is small. Our great cities are situated at a considerable distance from each other, and as any attack that we may reasonably apprehend will be sudden but not lasting in its character, we must maintain as near to the possible points of attack—leaving out of consideration many minor places that will have to take their chances without having any provision made for their defence—

Mr. CARPENTER.—We shall need the transcontinental railway to enable us to do that.

Mr. McCAY.—That will affect only in degree and not in kind the point to which I am referring. We shall have to maintain comparatively near to our most vulnerable points forces sufficient, at any rate, to repel a first attack. After that we may rely upon reinforcements being despatched as the enemy's attack is developed. An enemy can choose his own point of attack. We cannot know at what point he will approach us until he has actually arrived there. Then when he develops his attack reinforcements will be sent to the aid of the forces stationed at that particular spot. That is why we must maintain near to our main ports, our harbors, our coaling stations, and our commercial centres forces of garrison troops, and also forces of greater mobility which can be moved readily from spot to spot, and which may be fairly called field forces. It does not matter what name is applied to these forces. We may call them the first and second lines of defence, the A and B forces, or we may use the terms, employed in the war-game, of red troops and blue troops. But by whatever names the forces may be known, it is imperative that we should have the garrison forces in the immediate neighbourhood of our most vulnerable points, and also movable forces which can be transferred from point to point as occasion may require. That is why we need a much larger force than, in one sense, our population would seem to demand. Some people say 40,000 soldiers, consisting of horse, foot, and artillery, would be more than sufficient to deal with any force they would be called upon to encounter. I entirely agree that we are not likely to have to meet 40,000 or even the half of that number of an enemy; but it is because the enemy can attack us at whatever point he may choose, and because we shall have to meet him in equal or superior force at whatever point he may land that we require a comparatively large number of men. We are compelled, for strategic reasons, to maintain that force. Now, I wish to speak of that other branch of our defences to which the honorable member for Wentworth chiefly devoted his attention, namely, our fixed defences. Upon that subject the honorable member speaks with a great deal of weight, because I confess that I have always felt that if I could meet his criticisms I should be able to go a long way in the right direction. The honorable member makes speeches upon our defences that are entitled to consideration by any honorable member who is interested in the subject. It is quite true, as was mentioned by the honorable member for Darwin, that armaments are continually changing; but the honorable member drew from that fact the novel conclusion that we should not have any armament. With that view I do not agree. He wishes us to wait until we reach the final result of the development of modern weapons before we proceed to arm our forts. I can assure the honorable member that when that time arrives he will have no further interest in weapons of any kind. Armaments are continually changing. Since the Commonwealth came into existence the whole idea—in the Navy at any rate—with regard to the calibre of big guns has changed. The 6-inch gun was a few years ago the main weapon used in naval armament, and was also the chief gun of position. That idea has now been entirely changed, and the naval authorities are beginning to regard 6-inch guns as already belonging to the past. The armaments of our forts at present consist mainly of 6-inch guns.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Those are the guns to be mounted at Fremantle.

Mr. McCAY.—There are to be two 7½ guns and two 6-inch guns. It is perfectly right that we should have 6-inch guns in addition to others, and there is a very good reason why 6-inch guns should be placed in position at Arthur's Head, instead of 7½ guns, because the fort is not big enough for weapons of the larger calibre. It is well understood that there must be a certain distance between the guns, and that the larger the guns the greater the space required. Ideas with regard to armament are continually changing, and if we were to keep on re-arming our Australian forts as developments occurred, to keep them up to date, probably reaching the stage at which we should require to purchase 12-inch guns, we should have to spend about £200,000 per annum upon big guns alone. We cannot possibly afford to do that, and, moreover, it is not necessary for the reason that our Australian forts are less likely than are the forts in any other part of the Empire to have to engage in long encounters with a hostile squadron. Any engagements will probably be short and sharp, whether they prove decisive or otherwise.

Mr. PAGE. — Surely the honorable and learned member does not mean that we should not have the best armaments.

Mr. McCAY.—Certainly not; but I contend that we cannot afford to spend all our money upon armaments for our forts to the neglect of other necessities. We must keep on re-arming our forts all round our coasts as opportunity offers. For instance, supposing we start at Fremantle, we shall eventually reach Sydney, and by the time we have finished at Sydney we shall probably have to recommence at Fremantle. That is exactly what is being done. Fremantle is being armed with reasonably good guns, and the fort there will be, for its size, the best equipped in Australia. It is being armed with mark 7 6-inch guns, and the very best and latest mark of 7½ gun. My intention was that we should pass by Adelaide because it is an open question how far forts in St. Vincent's Gulf are of any value. At any rate, 6-inch guns will do there, whilst they have only 6-inch guns in several other forts. The port that most requires an improvement in its defences is Melbourne, and after that has been attended to Sydney should be re-armed with bigger guns. We have one necessity at all our forts, namely, that the quick-firing armament against torpedo attack should be improved, and it is the duty of the Government to consider whether the necessary weapons should not be included in their purchase of special war-like stores. Major-General Hutton proposed to expend £525,000 in order to place the equipment of our forts upon a war footing. We thought at the time that that amount would cover everything. I wish that it would. Apart from anything mentioned in Major-General Hutton's scheme, I have a little list here, comprising items which involve an expenditure of £800,000.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Upon whose recommendation is that estimate based?

Mr. McCAY.—I take the responsibility for these figures.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They are not founded upon the opinions of any expert?

Mr. McCAY.—Oh, yes; there are expert opinions behind them. But I am putting these figures forward as my own opinions at the present time. Major-General Hutton's scheme involved an expenditure of £525,000. In 1903-4, £97,000 was spent under that scheme; in 1904-5, £138,000; and for 1905-6, it is proposed to expend £154,000. But in 1904-5, in addition to the items appearing in Major-General Hutton's scheme, £36,000 was expended upon things which were absolutely necessary, including £22,000 for material for small arms ammunition. Upon assuming office as Minister of Defence, I found that whilst we had a satisfactory reserve of small arms ammunition, and whilst, over a given period, we provided cordite for making good the ordinary consumption, we did not provide the shells in which to put the cordite, the caps to fire it, and the bullets. We therefore spent £22,000 upon those materials. We also expended £2,000 upon ammunition for the gun mounted at Hobart. Major-General Hutton's scheme did not include ammunition for all the field artillery, and a further sum of £7,000 was spent in that direction. Then there was an item of £5,000 for naval expenditure.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Major-General Hutton does not seem to have been too capable.

Mr. McCAY.—He did not include everything in his scheme; but it is only just to him to say that from a perusal of his reports one can discover what is wanted. He was a very capable man, and rendered great service to the Commonwealth. In spite of any differences that we may have had with him, there is no doubt that he started our defence system upon sound lines in many respects.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—He required just a little more tact.

[58]—2

Mr. McCAY.—I am not going to say anything derogatory to him. In 1905-6, it is proposed to expend upon matters which are not included in Major-General Hutton's scheme the sum of £27,000; most of it upon the two 7.5 guns at Fremantle, and the balance upon naval items. Honorable members will see that apart from the £525,000 involved in the late Commandant's scheme, there was spent last year, and is included in these Estimates, a further sum of £63,000. In one of his reports Major-General Hutton pointed out that no provision had been made for the ammunition supply column, which will cost £40,000. That column is absolutely essential to any force which may take the field. Then there is a certain quantity of big-gun ammunition required which will cost £70,000. We also need storage accommodation for the stores which we are purchasing, and this will entail a further outlay of not less than £40,000. All these matters were pointed out by the late General Officer Commanding. Then if our forces take the field, we shall have to provide them with blankets and clothing, which will cost £250,000. That expenditure, however, can be deferred until the emergency arises. Then we must recollect that our big guns in fixed defences are not placed there for all time. They must be replaced from time to time with more modern weapons, just as a rifle needs to be replaced. Then we want a number of other things, such as torpedo-boats in Port Phillip, booms, &c. Our electric light equipment will cost £13,000 or £14,000. We wish to retain our submarine mines till we have secured efficient substitutes for them in the shape of booms and torpedo-boats which are thoroughly equipped. In this connexion I may mention that the British Admiralty intends to abandon the use of submarine mines, but not until it has replaced them by torpedo-boats and booms. In order to re-arm the whole of our force with modern guns, we shall require to incur an expenditure of anything from £300,000 to £500,000, according to the extent to which we go. So that before we put Australia in the position of being able to discharge her duty to herself and the Empire—apart from the protection which is afforded by the Imperial Navy—we must spend some hundreds of thousands of pounds.

Mr. WEBSTER.—At what does the honorable and learned member estimate the total expenditure?

Mr. McCAY.—Leaving out of consideration the £250,000 for blankets and clothing, we should require to spend at least £600,000. Then, again, we need artillery ranges. Our field artillery will never be what it might be, with the men we have at our command, until we secure proper artillery ranges—ranges which extend, not over a couple of thousand yards, and upon which target practice may be had, but ranges over which the artillerymen can manœuvre. Artillery manœuvring is just as essential nowadays as is artillery firing practice, and we measure artillery ranges, not by acres, but by square miles.

Mr. WATSON.—In New South Wales recently the National Park was used for that purpose.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—At the end of the current year we shall have spent a large sum upon special armament.

Mr. McCAY.—The £600,000 to which I have referred is exclusive of the expenditure outlined in the whole of Major-General Hutton's scheme. If we spent every penny that is provided upon the current year's Estimates, an expenditure of £136,000 would still be required to complete that scheme.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If that amount were expended, would the items be non-recurring ones?

Mr. McCAY.—Not altogether. Some of those items will be continually recurring.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We are getting what we require gradually.

Mr. McCAY.—I am not proposing that we should expend the whole of the money in one year and out of revenue. Of course, I recognise that any Minister assuming charge of the Defence Department at the time of the year that Senator Playford took office, must accept the Estimates of his predecessor. Consequently, if any blame is to be attached to the Defence Estimates, it is attachable to me, and not to my successor, because they are my Estimates rather than his. When I joined the Reid-McLean Administration, I was faced with the position that Major-General Hutton's scheme was only half completed. As against that fact, there was an urgent necessity—it was a choice of evils, because we had not the money necessary to accomplish everything—for the instalment of the twelve-pounder quick-firing guns and the electric light at our forts. To effect these installations at all our forts would have cost about £70,000. We could not undertake that work at Sydney or Melbourne without doing similar work at Fremantle and Brisbane.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable and learned member means that it could not all be done at once.

Mr. McCAY.—It would require an expenditure of £70,000 to equip our forts with electric light and quick-firers.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Why cannot we undertake that work?

Mr. McCAY.—Simply because we cannot buy 30s. worth of material for £1.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable and learned member has stated that we could not undertake work at one place without carrying out similar work at others.

Mr. McCAY.—It is not impossible, but it is not desirable to do so. Further, we need to order guns in considerable numbers, because it takes as long to get two delivered as it does to obtain delivery of twenty, and a long period is usually occupied in securing their delivery. I repeat that when I assumed office the position in regard to Major-General Hutton's scheme was that nothing had been completed by the votes of 1903-4 and 1904-5. The votes proposed for the current year will, to a large extent, complete that scheme. For instance, the vote for accoutrements will complete the accoutrements for the field force upon a war establishment; that for saddles will complete the equipment of the light-horse upon a peace establishment; the vote for the field artillery will bring us within twelve of our total number of guns, and will complete the equipment of sixty out of seventy-two guns. In the same way, the vote for camp equipment will complete the equipment of the garrison force; and that for medical equipment will complete the equipment of the field force upon a peace establishment. Every one of these votes will practically complete some work which was already in progress. Now, if modern wars have taught anything, it is that it is not the largest army, or that imbued with the greatest patriotism, which wins, but the army which contains the best leaders, and which is the best equipped in time of peace. Finding the equipment of our forces nowhere complete, I felt that it was my business to get these things rounded off during the present year. I believe that we shall be far more likely to accomplish good in that way than by adopting any other method. That is why I preferred to undertake this work, instead of, for instance, mounting quick-firing guns to resist a torpedo attack. I did not want Australia to be cursed with a system of incompleteness by beginning a second work before the first had been finished. The provision made upon these Estimates will bring us to a point at which many of the proposals included in Major-General Hutton's scheme are practically complete, so far as equipment is concerned. We have not the money to accomplish everything in one year. My idea was that we should be able to say, "Now that this work is complete, we may turn our attention to another."

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—A great deal of that incompleteness is due to the omissions from Major-General Hutton's report.

Mr. McCAY.—It is not owing to anything, except that we could spend only a certain sum in each year. In the first year we could not finish any of the works outlined, and in the second year we could not complete everything. The Treasurer seems to entertain the idea that there is some magic in increasing the number of rifles. I have no desire to see the members of rifle clubs hampered in any way, but I ask the Government not to be induced to purchase more rifles whilst they have not sufficient equipment for the number of men whom our present stock of rifles would supply. We have in the Commonwealth magazine rifles for every man in the Australian forces upon a war establishment. There are 40,000 troops in the Commonwealth upon a war footing, 9,000 of whom do not require rifles, and we have 35,000 magazine rifles available, including 5,000 of the new service short weapon, as to the superiority of which there appears to be some doubt, although the War Office is adopting them, and they have been given to our light horse. We have the rifles to equip the forces on a war footing; but let us put them on a war footing in other respects before we think of buying stands of thousands of rifles. Let us have them all in time. Do you remember, Mr. Chairman, what Wolseley said of the American Civil War: that a completely equipped army corps of 35,000 men properly led could have won on either side. And yet we know that there were hundreds of thousands of men engaged in that war. We must have our forces completely equipped. A small completely equipped force is better than a large one incompletely equipped. To say, "Here are 10,000 men and 10,000 rifles; fill your pockets, men, with ammunition, and God bless you," would be to show an utterly mistaken conception of what is required. It is not from the possession of tens of thousands of trained half-equipped men that success will come; but rather from a thoroughly equipped force, whatever be its size. We have 40,000 men set up as the standard for the war strength of our garrison and field forces. Let us see that they are completely equipped before we do anything more.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The men whom we sent to South Africa did not have much training.

Mr. McCAY.—Quite so, and it was the lack of training which caused them to be less valuable than they would otherwise have been.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But still their services were valuable.

Mr. McCAY.—Undoubtedly. I am suggesting not that a man with a rifle is of no value, but that a completely equipped force is better than an ill-equipped one. It was those contingents which consisted of officers and men with little training that did harm to the name of Australia in South Africa, so far as the attacks upon it were justified. A disciplined, well-trained, well-equipped body of men, led by trained leaders, can do far more than can a much larger body of untrained imperfectly equipped men. With a small number of well-equipped trained troops, I should be prepared to meet, without any fear, a large body of undisciplined unequipped men, and I urge the Government to carry out the suggestion I have made. The next step to take will be to secure quick-firing guns and search-lights for our fixed defences.

Mr. KELLY.—We certainly need cordite ammunition for the quick-firing guns.

Mr. McCAY.—When I took office as Minister of Defence, I found that guns had been ordered without ammunition. That is one reason why I had to spend £7,000 on ammunition for the field guns, and also £1,800 on ammunition for the 6-inch gun for Hobart—although that gun was a transfer from South Australia. I ordered twenty-four field guns, as well as two or three big guns, and in each case I also ordered a proper complement of ammunition, so that when the guns arrived the ammunition should also be forthcoming. In estimating the price of a gun, it is necessary to include the cost of its proper complement of ammunition, and it is for this reason that I say that the twelve pounders will cost £2,000, instead of about £1,200 each. The proposed vote for special warlike stores was fixed at a certain amount. I need not say that the late Treasurer did not give me a free hand. I provided £180,000 for this purpose, and I trust that it will all be spent. If it is not expended on the items specified, I trust that the Treasurer, instead of seeking to actually save the money, will expend it on other stores—such, for example, as twelve-pounders for our fixed defences—that we can obtain from England. That would be the right thing to do. It must be remembered that these items do not come under Major-General Hutton's scheme. We also require a floating harbor defence in some of our ports. It may be that we shall require torpedo boats, as well as torpedoes to be fired from fixed positions on shore. We need booms, and possibly we may require submersibles or submarines, but I have very grave doubts on that point. I do not think that submersibles or submarines would be desirable adjuncts to our defences. They can be used only against a fixed mark, and an enemy is unlikely to stay long enough at any one spot to afford us that fixed mark. I do not wish to discuss at the present time any of the details of the Estimates, although no doubt a number of questions will be raised at the proper time, and I hope then to be able to say something about them. I have endeavoured to explain to the Committee why I think that the proper development of Australian defence is in the direction of providing a thorough equipment for our land forces, whose war strength is about 40,000 strong, and of thoroughly equipping our forts, with the addition of auxiliary floating harbor defences. This is essential to enable Australia to discharge her duty to herself and her duty to the Empire of which I spoke earlier this afternoon. Desirable as it will be to have some vessels for the protection, at any rate, of our coastal trade in time of emergency—and I would remind honorable members that if the contingency comes, these vessels to be of any service must be placed under the orders of the officer commanding the Imperial Squadron—if we wish Australia to launch out on what is called an Australian Navy, we must first complete the work I have indicated. The inevitable dilemma on the horns of which the advocates of a partial Australian Navy find themselves is that that navy must, when the pinch comes, obey the orders of one central authority.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Would the honorable member advise that we should not train our men for the navy?

Mr. McCAY.—The present Estimates provide for an increase of nearly 30 per cent. in the naval forces—for an increase of 200 on 600 or 700 men. I certainly wish to see our Australian sailors trained, but I desire to warn the Committee, if I may be permitted to do so, that, in view of the scheme which is now being developed, there is a definite object to be attained, and that if we leave that scheme to start on another, we shall not be able to complete it within a reasonable time. We shall not be doing our duty by abandoning a scheme which we can complete within a reasonable time. When we have our naval bases, our coaling ports, our harbors of refuge, and our centres of commercial and industrial life quite safe, so that from those safe points our fleet, or the Imperial Squadron, may move out to strike the enemy, secure in the knowledge of a safe point of retreat if it be required, and that our coastal shipping and our oversea trading vessels will be safe in harbors where they may temporarily lie up in case a great emergency arises—and it would only be in time of great emergency that this condition of affairs would arise—it will be our duty to see how we can best develop a navy of our own. But until Australia chooses to maintain such a navy that it can meet other navies without Imperial assistance, I shall decline to support a proposal in that direction. I shall decline to do without the Imperial assistance and the assurance that is provided by our living under the Imperial flag. But our harbors and our coastal and sea-borne commerce, and the commerce approaching our shores are proper objects for Commonwealth protection, so far as sea-going ships, cruisers, and so forth can insure their protection. That is the object at which we should aim. I appeal, however, to the Committee not to leave one thing unfinished to begin another. The proper development is that which I have outlined. No nation ever developed into a great maritime power without first making herself safe on land—without making a secure launching point from which her naval power might proceed.

Mr. POYNTON.—Is the honorable member going to make any suggestion as to ways and means?

Mr. McCAY.—I hold that we cannot do all this out of revenue, and I have strong objections to the Commonwealth becoming a borrowing community. I say frankly, however, that we need to get promptly into a proper position, so as to be able to develop Australian defence in the way that it ought to be. That cannot be done with the small sums that are available year by year for such a purpose. It seems to me, therefore, that the only way in which we can deal with the matter is to take the bull by the horns and to say clearly that we wish to secure a good start. We have not yet got it. Let us obtain the necessary money by the issue of, say, Treasury-bills, repayable in the course of five or ten years. I should certainly have this expenditure covered by the revenue of the next ten years at the outside. Let us acknowledge that there is a good deal that has to be done. I have not yet said much about the naval side of the question, but I do not wish it to be thought that I am hostile to the suggestion that we should have Australian-owned ships or Australian sailors. As a matter of fact, I am not. I am simply urging that these proposals should not be taken out of their order.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Has the honorable and learned member made any financial forecast?

Mr. McCAY.—Including the cost of supplies not yet ordered under Major-General Hutton's scheme, the outlay will be about £800,000. I think it is desirable that we should say frankly, "We will discount a bill for £800,000, or a smaller sum, if it be found possible. We will discount the bill, whatever it is, and pay back the money by instalments during the next eight or ten years." We should then have our defences on a proper footing, and would be able to continue on a less expenditure than would otherwise be necessary.

Mr. CHANTER.—Could we not make this provision by retaining the whole of our one-fourth of Customs revenue?

Mr. McCAY.—No; I have the taxpayer in mind. If we expended the whole of that revenue the States would have to make good the difference by some other means.

Mr. CHANTER.—The position would be the same if we borrowed the money.

Mr. McCAY.—But one may borrow £1 and repay it by ten instalments of 2s. each.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—If life and property need this protection the people must pay for it.

Mr. McCAY.—I am merely expressing my view that the taxpayers of the Commonwealth cannot afford to at once incur this expenditure; they cannot afford to pay £400,000 this year, and another £400,000 next year for any such purpose as special warlike stores and guns.

Mr. WEBSTER.—We might have secured these stores when we had a larger surplus to return to the States.

Mr. McCAY.—I then had no direct responsibility; but I always bear in mind the fact that it is the taxpayers themselves who have to provide this money, and that the Treasurer does not obtain it from some mysterious unknown stream. We have to take the bull by the horns, and recognise that we must spend this substantial sum within the next year or two. The only suggestion that I have to make is that we should provide the money by means of short-dated Treasury-bills—or whatever particular form of obligation it is proposed to incur—and redeem them by annual instalments out of the Commonwealth revenue. I should not leave these annual instalments to the mercy of the annual Estimates, but at the same time as the money was provided would pass an Act appropriating revenue for this purpose for a given time.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The guns would have to be replaced before the whole of the money was repayable. The honorable and learned member himself made that admission.

Mr. McCAY.—It will be unnecessary to replace the guns more often than at intervals of eight or ten years. What I said was that if the idea were developed, we might have to make changes. I have spoken at much greater length than I had intended, but the subject of defence is one in which I take a deep interest. I have ventured to elaborate my views, realizing the seriousness of the situation to Australia, and I hope that what I have said may possibly be of some service to the Government of the day, and assist them to solve this very difficult problem.

Mr. ROBINSON (Wannon).—I wish to commence my remarks by expressing my sense of the value of the most excellent speech of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. What many of us have been waiting for a considerable time to hear has been a complete, connected, and consistent exposition of a defence policy for the Commonwealth. In the speech to which we have just listened, and which secured the rapt attention of honorable members, a vast amount of information was given to us. It is a speech which I think ought to be reprinted; and I certainly hope that steps will be taken, either by the honorable member or by his friends, to see that copies of it are circulated through the country press. In listening to the Budget which the right honorable the Treasurer delivered last week, I could not help thinking of a prediction made by the present Chief Justice of Australia, Sir Samuel Griffith, that the finance question is likely to be the rock upon which this Federation would find it very difficult not to split. The speech of the right honorable gentleman seems to me to indicate that we are in danger of getting upon the financial rocks; or, if we ourselves avoid that danger, certainly we are in danger of getting some of the States upon the rocks. I regret that the right honorable gentleman should have dealt in such a casual way with what seems to me the great safeguard of the States under our Constitution—what is known as the Braddon section; and I gave expression to my astonishment by interjection when the Treasurer made his remarks.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There are other ways to protect the States, apart from the Braddon section.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The right honorable gentleman is reported at page 1217 of Hansard to have alluded to the matter as follows:—

I do not see that much good can result to the States by extending the duration of the Braddon provision.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—“To the States,” the honorable member sees.

Mr. ROBINSON.—

It may restrict the spending powers of this Parliament, but I cannot imagine that we shall do anything to injure the people of the States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—How long has the Treasurer been of that opinion?

Mr. ROBINSON.—The interjection of the honorable member for Parramatta is most pertinent. How long has the right honorable gentleman been of that opinion?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The sentence quoted by the honorable member follows after some other observations on the same subject.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am quite aware that the Treasurer said that protection to the States might be secured by giving them a fixed sum; but he also stated that in Canada, where that was done, the conditions were so different from those in Australia as to make the example of very little value to us.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In regard to the amount paid, I meant.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The States of Australia have regarded, and still regard, the Braddon section as the only one which secures to them a sufficiency of revenue to meet their annual obligations, and it seems to me that any proposal which impairs that safeguard without replacing it by some equally valuable one is most dangerous.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Hear, hear! I agree with that.

Mr. ROBINSON.—We are faced by the fact that by the year 1911 this Parliament, unless action be taken to the contrary, will be in a position to distribute the whole of the revenue received from Customs and Excise absolutely as it pleases. It is, therefore, imperative that those who desire the States of the Commonwealth to remain in a solvent, prosperous condition should see that steps are taken to safeguard their interests. There are three aspects of the Budget to which I wish to address myself. The first is the cost of Federation. Reference was made by the right honorable gentleman to the estimate of the cost of Federation given to the Adelaide Convention in 1897 by Mr.—now Sir Frederick—Holder, our present Speaker. The paper which was laid upon the table of the Convention, at his instance, estimated the total probable new Federal expenditure. We cannot look at that estimate and compare it with the estimates of expenditure for the current year without noticing that there is a constant tendency to increase, and that we are faced by the prospect of a considerable rise in the cost of the Federal Departments. For example, I find that the estimate of the cost of the Legislature and the Executive was about £123,000. That sum has already been exceeded by about £12,000 or £13,000. There is no likelihood of the increase being reduced, but rather of its being increased. The estimate for the expenditure of the Home Affairs Department, with which was included the cost of a High Commissioner, was £18,000. I find that the Department of Home Affairs is estimated for the present year to cost £42,000, exclusive of any provision for the High Commissioner. In every other Department one finds similar increases in Federal expenditure. The prospect held out to those who wish to see economical government, and a large amount of money returned to the States, is not a very pleasing one. The matter is further complicated by the introduction of the very difficult sugar bounties question. In connexion with this question, the Treasurer made a most extraordinary statement in the course of his Budget speech. The right honorable gentleman gave an estimate as to the cost of Federation, and proved to his own satisfaction that it was last year £312,000, the year before £342,000, and that it would this year be less than £300,000. When one examines the whole of the figures, one is forced to the conclusion that those who put that sum down as the cost of Federation must make use of a system of arithmetic peculiar to themselves.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—From what page is the honorable and learned member quoting?

Mr. ROBINSON.—From page 1208 of Hansard. The right honorable gentleman estimates "other" expenditure this year at £296,961, and there is a further estimate of expenditure of £589,081, and he says this:—

The amounts included in the £589,081 would have been expended if Federation had not been accomplished.

I deny that statement as vigorously as it is possible to do, because I find that one item included in the amount is an expenditure in connexion with sugar rebates, amounting to £151,670.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I clearly pointed that out.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That expenditure is a purely Commonwealth expenditure. If we take the State of Victoria for example by no possible means can it be shown that any portion of the sugar rebates would have had to be paid by Victoria, if it were not for the accomplishment of Federation. Before Federation, the revenue derived by Victoria from sugar amounted to £290,000 a year. This year the revenue of Victoria from sugar will come down to £150,000. We shall thus have lost about 50 per cent. of our revenue from sugar, whilst wholesale and retail consumers of sugar in Victoria will not get that commodity at a fraction of a penny cheaper than they got it before Federation. As a result of the policy adopted by the Federation, there has been no reduction in price, and the greater portion of the benefit derived from that policy is being reaped by one very wealthy company—a concern of a most profitable nature. In addition to the loss of revenue which we in Victoria suffer from the present sugar policy of the Commonwealth, our fruit-growing industry, which was a very flourishing and promising industry, is being slowly strangled by the operation of that policy.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—How will it be strangled?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I propose to show the right honorable gentleman. In dealing with the fruit industry, I can claim to speak with some little knowledge, because two brothers of mine were deluded into going into this industry some years ago. I think I can say that they sank about £2,000 in the industry, and they have been very glad to clear out of it at one-fifth of the amount which they put into it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There has always been a duty on sugar in Victoria.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I have had a statement prepared relating to the effects of the sugar policy of the Commonwealth, which has been checked by my relations, who have been engaged in the fruit industry, and also by the members of the Goulburn Valley Fruit-growers' Association. The statements I propose to make on the subject have been confirmed by experts in the trade. These men, who are earning their living from the industry, of their own knowledge assert that these statements are accurate and well founded. The fruit-growing and preserving industries are very large industries in Australia, and they would now be much larger only that, as I say, they are being strangled by the sugar policy adopted by the Commonwealth Parliament. I might here say that, although the fiscal question comes into the matter to some extent, I am prepared to sink my free-trade views, and to give a reasonable amount of assistance to growers of sugar by white labour, in order to secure, if we can, the triumph of the policy of a White Australia. But I do say that the policy that we have adopted in the past is a policy involving the most extravagant waste of public money, and one which is throttling what ought to be a very flourishing industry.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I said the same thing, and the honorable member for Moira denied it.

Mr. ROBINSON.—In dealing with this question of the effect of the sugar policy on the fruit-growing industry, honorable members should be informed that the whole of the fruit grown in an orchard is not used for fruit preserving or jam-making, and if we say that about one-half of it is so used, we shall be making a reasonable statement. I take the case of an orchard in which plums are grown. In the statement to which I have referred I find the following:—

Plums.—One acre is usually planted with 120 plum trees, the average produce of which is 1½ cases, equal to 60 lbs. The average yield per acre, therefore, is 7,200 lbs. of fruit, which, at ½d. per lb., the average return during this season, would give £15 per acre. To transfer this quantity of plums into jam, requires 7,200 lbs. of sugar, the duty on which, at £6 per ton, amounts to £18 5s. 8d.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why does not the honorable and learned member refer to the £3 Excise duty?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Permit me to deal with this matter in my own way, and I shall come to the Excise duty afterwards. I am now dealing with the case of a man who, in the first instance, pays duty in Victoria, and showing that those who use colonial sugar do not thereby get an advantage of more than a few shillings, the reduction made on colonial sugar being just sufficient to prevent other sugar coming into the market. Some sugar has, of course, to come in, because the local production is not sufficient.

The duty on the sugar actually amounts in this case to 128 per cent. of the value of the fruit, and sometimes more than the value of the land with its improvements, on which the fruit is grown.

Peaches.—The usual number of trees per acre is 100, each yielding on an average 80 lbs. of fruit, or 8,000 lbs. per acre. The average price paid to the grower is £7 per ton, equal to £25 per acre. Stoning reduces the weight of the fruit by 10 per cent., i.e., 7,200 lbs. An equal quantity of sugar being required to convert this into jam, the duty in this case amounts to £19 5s. 8d., or to 77 per cent. of the value of the fruit.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What was the tax before Federation?

Mr. ROBINSON. — Before Federation there was in Victoria a duty of £6 per ton on sugar from Queensland or any other part of the world, except beet sugar, and in respect of the sugar used by factories a rebate was granted.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Where, then, is the injury?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I hope the right honorable member will allow me to proceed in my own way, because I desire to show the difference between the two policies. I desire to show how, when the present policy comes to fruition, the whole of the damage will have been done; that, while the people of Australia will not receive a copper in revenue, the Colonial Sugar Refining Company will be made a present of about £1,000,000. The statement continues—

Apricots.—140 trees per acre, yielding 8,400 lbs. per acre. At the average value of £7 per ton, the grower would receive £26 5s. per acre. Stoning reduces the weight to 7,500 lbs. An equal quantity of sugar is necessary to make into jam, the duty on which, at £6 per ton, amounts to £20 5s., equal to 77 per cent. of the value of the fruit.

Quinces. — The yield averages 4 tons per acre, of an average value of £3 per ton. An equal quantity of sugar is required to convert these into jam, i.e., 4 tons of sugar. The duty, therefore, amounts to £24 per acre, equal to twice the value of the fruit.

To put these facts in another way:—

	Value of produce per acre.				Sugar duty per acre of fruit.
	£	s.	d.		£	s.	d.
Quinces	...	12	0 0	...	24	0	0
Plums	...	15	0 0	...	19	5	8
Apricots	...	26	5 0	...	20	5	0
Peaches	...	25	0 0	...	19	5	8

	Value of produce per ton.				Sugar duty per ton of fruit.
	£	s.	d.		£	s.	d.
Quinces	...	3	0 0	...	6	0	0
Plums	...	4	13 4	...	6	0	0
Apricots	...	7	0 0	...	5	8	0
Peaches	...	7	0 0	...	5	8	0

I repeat, for the purpose of allaying misapprehension, that it is not the whole of the orchard that is used with the object of fruit preserving or jam-making. The Treasurer has pointed out that locally-grown sugar cultivated by black labour pays only £3 per ton to the revenue, sugar cultivated by white labour paying £1 per ton only, as against £6 per ton paid on imported sugar; but the right honorable gentleman forgets that there are certain circumstances which must be taken into account. Prior to Federation, Queensland sugar was sold in Victoria at £13 per ton in bond; that is to say, it paid a duty of £6 per ton, and was then sold at £19 or £20 per ton. The fruit-preservers and jam-makers in Victoria could buy Queensland sugar in bond at the price I have named. The import duty on sugar in Queensland was inoperative in that State, as a duty on wool would be inoperative, seeing that far more is produced than is required for the local market. The whole of the sugar produced in Queensland was, therefore, sold at the world's price, which was about £13 per ton. At the present time a purchaser cannot obtain the A1 sugar of the Colonial Sugar Refining Company much under £24 per ton, less a certain small discount, though it is only fair to say that there has been a rise in the price of sugar all over the world, partly owing to the denunciation of beet sugar bounties. Owing to the causes I have indicated, there was an increase in the world's price of about £5 per ton; and in Queensland, of course, every sugar-grower benefited, just as the wool-growers of Australia would benefit by an increase in the world's price of wool. Before this rise took place, sugar from China, the Mauritius, or any of the Eastern ports was landed in Melbourne at £13 2s. 6d. a ton, whereas now it is about £18 7s. 6d. per ton. The A1 sugar of the Colonial Sugar Refining Company was formerly £20 per ton in Melbourne, whereas now it has gone up to about £23 per ton. It is most astonishing that Queensland sugar has always been cheaper in Melbourne than in any other part of the world, and prior to the rise in price that sugar in bond in Melbourne was £6 per ton more than the imported sugar, whereas after the rise the difference between the two was only £3 14s. That shows that the whole of the duty has been collected by the Colonial Sugar Refining Company; but, in fairness to that company, it must be said that it did not raise the price to the extreme limit to which it could have been raised in competition. However, the reasons for that policy were given by the chairman of directors of the company on the 28th October last—and those reasons are worth repeating—as follows:—

Unfortunately, we have not, except to a very moderate extent, been able to profit by the heavy advance in price, for the large production of sugar in Australia this season, unduly augmented by importations from various quarters, compels us to maintain our rates at a level which, while discouraging further importations, would insure the disposal of our supplies, and, as we have only recently raised our prices, last half-yearly accounts do not derive any benefit therefrom.

The "moderate extent" to which local sugar has so far benefited by the rise is, nevertheless, £2 17s. 6d. per ton.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What dividend was declared?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Last year I think a dividend of 15 per cent. was declared. This is a very well-managed company. The directors show only enough profit to pay good dividends, the balance being expended in wiping off imaginary depreciation and in ways of that kind—something like a company with which we are all familiar when we travel in the trams to Parliament House. The sugar industry flourished in Queensland when the price was £13 per ton, and the price is now £23 per ton. But out of that return, excise of £3 per ton has to be paid if the cane be grown by black labour, and £1 per ton if it be grown by white labour. Thus the net return to the producers, growers, and refiners, is about £7 to £9 per ton more than previously. If we take the lowest estimate, and say that the price is only £7 10s. higher, there were 150,000 tons produced last year, so that through the increased price caused by our present policy, and the rise in the world's price, the industry is receiving over £1,000,000 more than the profit which used to be derived from the same quantity of sugar prior to Federation. That, of course, does not represent all the burden that is placed on the shoulders of the users of sugar. There is not only this £1,000,000 paid to the people engaged in the industry, but the Government collects about £530,000 in revenue, after allowing, of course, for rebate or bounty. The total sum collected from the people in respect of the sugar industry is nearly £1,600,000, and only one-third of that goes into the Treasury. According to the Customs Tariff Act, when this policy in regard to sugar is completed, not only will the bonus and the excise cease, but the present duty is to be maintained, and if 180,000 tons represents the consumption of Australia, this company will be able to collect £5 or £6 a ton, or from £900,000 to £1,000,000 from the people, and the Treasury will not get a solitary sixpence of the amount. For some years past, the great bulk of the sugar has been produced by black labour, and the sugar-growers have received a very handsome bonus from the country. Prior to Federation, a large quantity of sugar was produced in New South Wales by white labour. Under the present policy, the sugar-growers in that State are very much better off than they used to be, since they get a bonus for doing something now which they used to do for nothing. They used to produce their sugar under a protection of £3 per ton. It seems an extraordinary policy. It must not be forgotten that one very important item in the Tariff which keeps the sugar market in subjection to one company is the fact that the import duty is £10 a ton on beet sugar and £6 a ton on cane sugar. The result is that beet sugar cannot possibly be shipped to Australia. If beet sugar were subject to the same duty as cane sugar, there would be a very great possibility of a large quantity of the former being landed here. But under the present system the possibility of keeping the local company in check is annihilated by the difference in duty on the two kinds of sugar. As I have said, I am prepared to make a sacrifice for the purpose of allowing this policy to be carried out, and assisting to make it successful if we can. But at the same time, I do not wish to see the large and abundant revenue which the States used to collect from this source imperilled. If the policy of the first Federal Parliament be carried out to its extreme degree it will land us in the position that not a fraction will come to the revenue from sugar, because, not only the bounty, but the excise duty is to cease, and the people of the Commonwealth will pay an increased price for their sugar by reason of the fact that one company controls the Australian market.

Mr. CONROY.—I beg to call attention to the state of the Committee. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. ROBINSON.—It means that the people of Australia will have to pay a very large tax to the persons engaged in this industry. It must not be forgotten that prior to Federation the sugar industry obtained a footing mainly on free-trade conditions, and that for all sugar exported from Queensland, the Colonial Sugar Refining Company had to accept the world's price, then about £13 per ton, and now considerably higher. If we were to reverse our policy and go to extreme free-trade, the sugar-grower in Queensland would be better off than he was before Federation was established. I do not ask honorable members to take that course, but I do suggest that there is a remedy to be found whereby the States would receive some revenue from this source, and the interests of the States' Treasurers would be considered. I think that by imposing an import duty of £5 or £6 a ton on sugar, it is possible to levy an excise duty on sugar, allowing a difference of £2 between the import and excise duties in favour of sugar grown by white labour, and of £1 only in favour of sugar grown by black labour. That would be a sufficient sum to allow to the sugar-growers, because then they would be £2 per ton better off than they were outside Queensland prior to Federation.

Mr. GROOM.—How about the internal market?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I cannot give expert testimony as to the fact; but I believe that prior to Federation the Colonial Sugar Refining Company sold its sugar in Queensland at the same rate as it did in Victoria in bond.

Mr. GROOM.—In fixing these prices, has the honorable and learned member taken into consideration the cost of production outside Queensland and in it?

Mr. ROBINSON.—No; what I have taken into consideration is the undoubted fact that prior to Federation the Colonial Sugar Refining Company sold its sugar in bond in Melbourne at £13 per ton. If we had complete free-trade established to-day, it would get a higher price than that. If sugar could be sold then at £13 a ton, certainly it could be sold at a profit when they would get £17 or £18 per ton. I do not ask any honorable member to agree to a policy so radical as that. If we were to impose an excise duty of £4 per ton and an import duty of £6 per ton a very large revenue would be derived from sugar; the Commonwealth would be better off, the industry in Queensland would be very handsomely treated compared with its condition prior to Federation, and the whole of the Commonwealth would gain by such a policy. This proposal is, I think, some violation of my free-trade principles, but I recognise that the industry is in a peculiar position. We have ordered the sugar-growers to reconstruct their business on a White Australia basis, and for that reason I think we should make a sacrifice of principle in the hope that we may bring that policy to a successful issue.

Mr. CONROY.—Why should we pay to keep in cultivation some of the best land in Queensland?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I believe it is rich land; but in the interests of Queensland I am prepared to make this sacrifice, so that its sugar-growers shall be unable to say that they were unfairly treated by this Parliament. If the present system be continued as proposed by the Treasurer, I feel convinced, as the honorable member for Maranoa interjected, that at the end of five years, we shall be asked to renew the bounty for another term of five or ten years, and every time we take that course we shall be throwing away a large amount of revenue. If the people of Queensland were to get the revenue which they would get from such a policy as I have indicated, they would not be in the position in which they now are as regards the Federal revenue generally. Queensland has been hit very severely by the Customs arrangements of the Federation. For a number of years past that State has not got back three-fourths of its contribution in Customs and Excise duties, and its Treasurers have been at their wits' ends because the returns made to them by the Commonwealth Treasurer have not been so large as, previous to Federation, it was anticipated that they would be.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—South Australia has suffered, too.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Yes; but Queensland has suffered more than any other State in this matter. It is not, however, my intention to devote more time to the question now. I can only hope that steps will be taken by this Parliament to secure to the taxpayers of the States some of the reward which will otherwise go to a very large company, which is very skilfully managed, and well engineered, and an extremely profitable concern to those who have the good fortune to be shareholders in it. I wish next to deal with a matter which I consider still more serious—the taking over by the Commonwealth of the debts of the States. I must again express astonishment at the attitude of the Treasurer. It is arguable whether the Braddon provision should be extended. That is a point on which I believe honorable members hold different opinions; but in view of the earnest manner in which the present Treasurer and his chief supported the provision at a Conference of Treasurers held in 1904, I am filled with amazement at the casual and offhand manner in which he dealt with it in his Budget speech. Last year the Prime Minister, when at the head of a former Government, with the then Treasurer and the present Treasurer, attended a Conference of States Treasurers, at which proposals were made for the transfer of the debts of the States to the Commonwealth, the Government agreeing, upon certain conditions, to an extension of the Braddon provision, though, of course, they could not bind this Parliament. The Treasurer supported that position, and yet in his Budget speech he made a statement which indicated that he was not in favour of extending it.

My honorable friends in the Labour corner had a conference a short time ago, and passed a resolution affirming that the Braddon provision should be knocked on the head at the first opportunity, and the Treasurer therefore now sings the same tune. I congratulate them upon their victory, upon having added his scalp to the trophies at their belt; and I hope, for their sakes, that the right honorable gentleman will be found as docile in the future as he appears to be now. But unless the debts question is to be settled effectively before 1911, the outlook for the people of Australia will be serious. We in Victoria are better off than are the other States, because our burden of debt per head of population is less than theirs.

Mr. CONROY.—Including shire and municipal debts?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Even including them, Victoria's burden of unproductive debt is lighter than that of any other State.

Mr. GROOM.—Victoria, unlike Queensland, has not had a large territory to develop.

Mr. TUDOR.—Nor so much public land to sell.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I thank the honorable member for Yarra for the interjection. In the Victorian Year-Book for 1904 the Government Statist says that loans to the amount of nearly £60,000,000 have to be redeemed within the next ten years, and to the amount of £106,000,000 within the succeeding ten years. Unless the bulk of the Customs revenue is secured to the States, I do not think we can successfully negotiate for the redemption or extension of those loans.

Mr. SPENCE.—Let the people of Victoria put on a good land tax.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The amount of revenue to be derived from direct taxation is not illimitable, and if the honorable member were Treasurer he would find that he could not raise enough by that means to settle this question. Over £200,000,000 of the indebtedness of the States, interest and principal, is under their loan Acts chargeable on their public revenue; and five-sixths of their loans were raised while their Customs and Excise revenue was entirely under their control, and the balance while the bulk of that revenue was still being returned to them by the Commonwealth. It therefore follows that if their returns of Customs and Excise revenue are diminished, or altogether cease, their position will be an unenviable one, because two-thirds of their revenue is obtained from that source. It may or may not have been a desirable thing, but it is an undeniable fact, that since the inauguration of responsible government in Australia the great bulk of our revenue has come from indirect taxation, and the loans which we have contracted have been practically charged on Customs and Excise receipts. Therefore, if the States are to meet their liabilities, the bulk of this revenue must be secured to them. If in 1911 the Commonwealth, by reason of this "let-slide" policy of the Treasurer, has obtained absolute control of the Customs and Excise revenue, the position of the States will be very serious. The statement contained in a resolution passed by a Conference of State Premiers in 1903 sums up the position more accurately than any words of mine would do—

That this Conference submits for the consideration of the Federal Government the following resolution:—"Having regard to the fact that the debts of the various States were incurred upon the security of the revenues of the State, and as the greater part of the revenues has been transferred to the Commonwealth in Customs and Excise duties, and having regard to the fact that the permanent financial stability of the States must depend upon either (a) the continuance of the application of the principal part of those revenues to the payment of interest of the debts; or (b) the imposition of very largely increased direct taxation in various States, it is resolved that in order to secure to the several State Governments the guarantee contemplated by the Constitution the provisions of the Constitution with respect to taking over by the Commonwealth of the debts of the States, or a proportion thereof, should be brought into operation as soon as possible."

Then they go on to say in words which, I think, no honorable member can successfully contest—

The experience of all constitutionally governed countries proves that an overflowing Treasury means a swelling expenditure. The only effective check upon an excessive expenditure of public money is the necessity of resting upon the spending body to provide ways and means by the imposition of additional charges upon the taxpayers. Where this necessity does not exist, or does not exist so far as the spending body is concerned, these manifold political forces tending to increase the public expenditure are left to work unchecked. To be effective the check must be direct and immediate, not indirect and merely consequential.

If the Treasurer's policy of letting things slide is to be pursued, the Federal Government will, in 1911, find itself in uncontrolled possession of an immense sum of money. There will be no obligation on their part to devise means to make charges on the taxpayers, and they will escape all punishment for their misdeeds, because the evil will have been done before retribution, at the hands of the people, can overtake them.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We shall have taken over the debts before that time.

Mr. ROBINSON.—In that case the Braddon clause will not worry the States, because if the debts of the States are taken over the tendency to extravagance on the part of the Federal Government will be effectually checked.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We shall assuredly have taken over the States' debts before that period is reached.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am very glad that ten days have brought about such a complete change in the views of the Treasurer.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There has been no change. I have said that from the beginning.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I agree with the view taken by the late Treasurer, and I believe also by the right honorable gentleman now occupying that position, that some protection must be afforded to the Commonwealth, that is to say, when the Commonwealth is renewing a loan or floating a new loan, it must not be possible for a State Treasurer to spoil the market by rushing in and endeavouring to raise money. I believe that that is a sound proposition, and that steps should be taken to prevent any clashing of borrowing in the London market. The States' Treasurers should, as far as possible, be limited to the local market for borrowing purposes, and the Commonwealth should have the sole power to borrow in London.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We are becoming more in agreement every minute.

Mr. ROBINSON.—If the right honorable gentleman will only carry out the suggestion made at the Treasurers' Conference in 1904, we shall be found working together, and the scalp which now adorns the belt of the honorable member for Bland will once more occupy its proper place. Three-fourths of the Customs and Excise revenue is undoubtedly insufficient to pay the interest on the States' debts. Therefore, the States' Governments must make up the deficiency in some way or other. It has been suggested that the Federal Treasurer should hold a floating lien over the railway revenues of the States. But strong objection had been urged to that idea, and, I think, rightly so, because railway policy is a matter of internal development that we should leave entirely in the hands of the States' Governments. Mr. Irvine, the late Premier of Victoria, has made what I conceive to be an excellent suggestion, namely, that each of the States should pass a special Act, appropriating revenue sufficient to meet any deficiency between the amount received from Customs duties and the sum necessary to pay the interest on their debts. He points out with considerable force that the only protection the bond-holder has at present is afforded by the special States' Acts, which appropriate part of the States' revenues towards the payment of the interest on the money borrowed. If the States give the Commonwealth a guarantee of a similar character, it should prove sufficient. The Constitution provides that the States must indemnify the Commonwealth for any debts that may be taken over, and Mr. Irvine, who is a well-known lawyer, holds the opinion that that provision could be enforced before the High Court, and that that tribunal could find an appropriate remedy, in the almost inconceivable event of a State failing to make good any deficiency. I also agree with the idea of the right honorable member for Balaclava that a sinking fund should be attached to every loan, whether it be floated in London or upon the local market. In this connexion we ought to consider the true indebtedness of Australia, and compare it with the indebtedness of the mother country. The true indebtedness of a country is to be measured by the amount of taxation the people are called upon to bear in order to pay the interest on their debts. In the event of a Government borrowing money and spending it upon a reproductive work, such as a railway, which returns a revenue sufficient, not only to meet the working expenses, but the interest on the debt, no burden is imposed upon the taxpayer; but if the work is not remunerative, and does not earn a sufficient amount to pay the interest the taxpayers have to make good the deficiency, and the debt thus becomes a real burden. The national debt of Great Britain has been incurred for the purpose of carrying on what are called unproductive enterprises—that is to say, in the defence and extension of the Empire—and to this fact the Commonwealth and other portions of the Empire owe their existence to-day. It will hardly be believed by honorable members that, in spite of the fact I have mentioned, the unproductive debt of Australia constitutes a heavier charge upon its citizens than does the national debt of Great Britain, which has accumulated during 200 years of struggle for existence as a world power. By "unproductive" debt I mean debt for which the people are taxed in order to pay interest. Upon page 694, of Coghlan, I find that for the year ended 30th June, 1904, the sum of £8,996,000 was required to pay interest and charges upon the public debt of the States of the Commonwealth. Of that sum, a total of £5,240,000 was raised from the works in which that money had been invested—from railways, water supply, harbor and sewerage works, interest upon advances to settlers, local bodies, and from the land settlement policy. That is to say, that about £3,750,000 has to be raised by taxation from the people of Australia in order to pay interest upon their indebtedness.

Mr. POYNTON.—Do they not receive an indirect benefit?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I shall deal with that aspect of the matter presently. It seems to me that the method of charging everything to posterity is one which is fraught with considerable danger. We pay about £3,750,000 yearly in interest upon unproductive debt. In other words, comparing our national indebtedness with that of Great Britain, it is, roughly speaking, about £100,000,000. We have to pay interest upon that amount out of taxation alone.

Mr. POYNTON.—We have an asset.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member does not follow me. I am taking the asset at its value. Of the whole of the works upon which money has been expended in Australia, interest is earned only upon £5,240,000. The balance of the interest has to be raised by taxation. Consequently, if we compare our indebtedness with that of the United Kingdom, we find that the latter does not constitute as heavy burden upon the people of the mother country as our debt does upon the taxpayers of Australia, notwithstanding that there is an indirect advantage received in both cases. The indirect advantage received here is the stimulus which has been imparted to the enterprise of the country. Whether that has not been too dearly purchased is open to question. In Australia, our unproductive debt represents about £25 per head of our population—in Great Britain it is considerably less. There, I believe, it is about £18 per head. The interest which has to be met by taxation in Australia represents about 18s. 6d. per head; in Great Britain it does not exceed 9s. 6d. It will be seen, therefore, that from the point of view of indebtedness, we have a lot of leeway to make up. That is why I think that the States debts question is the most pressing which confronts the Australian people.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But we cannot make the States anxious to transfer their debts.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The Treasurer must see that for the payment of interest upon their debts the States more than absorb all the revenue which they are likely to receive through the Customs. Consequently, they must rely upon the proceeds of direct taxation to pay interest upon future borrowings. That in itself will prove a very excellent check upon extravagant schemes for borrowing, either in Great Britain or elsewhere. In Great Britain, statesmanlike efforts are being made to extinguish the national indebtedness by the establishment of a sinking fund. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Ritchie, at the conclusion of the Boer War, provided that £27,000,000 per annum should be devoted to the redemption of the national debt. In the first year, £6,600,000 of that amount was expended in reducing the principal and the balance was devoted to paying the interest. Year after year a bigger proportion of that £27,000,000 will be applied in redemption of the capital, and, consequently, a diminishing proportion will be required to pay interest. Mr. Ritchie calculates that if Great Britain has the good fortune to avoid being involved in war during the next fifty years, the whole of her indebtedness will be extinguished. At our present rate of progress in Australia we shall be doing very good work if we wipe out our national indebtedness in about a thousand years.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable and learned member is assuming that our population will not increase.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I would point out to the honorable member that in other countries population grows very much more rapidly than it does here.

Mr. POYNTON.—Can the honorable and learned member name any country in which there is a greater growth?

Mr. ROBINSON.—There is a much quicker growth in Canada and the United States. These facts are of sufficient importance to impress upon the Government the necessity of adopting a firm policy as regards taking over the States debts. Those debts ought to be taken over, and we ought to provide a sinking fund in connexion with their redemption, and to limit future borrowings as much as possible. In America the people of the States have deliberately set checks upon the power of Parliament to borrow money. I find, in connexion with one loan floated in Western Australia, a sinking fund of 3 per cent. was established. I scarcely think that our present Treasurer could have been responsible for that.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am absolutely responsible for it. There was a sinking fund of 1 per cent. attached to all our loans.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I congratulate the right honorable gentleman. If he will adopt the same course now, he will confer a lasting benefit upon the people of Australia. The sinking fund to which I refer is in the hands of trustees, who are outside of political control, and consequently it is of a far more satisfactory character than is the sinking fund of any other State. If the right honorable the Treasurer is responsible for the creation of that fund, he has something of which he may be proud. I wish now to say a word or two upon what has been called the detraction question. A good deal has been said about the detraction of Australia, especially in regard to the representations which have been made concerning the Immigration Restriction Act. I hold in my hand a copy of the debates which took place upon that measure in September and October, 1901. Judging by the speech which was delivered at that time by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and the interjections of the honorable member for Bland, I conclude that the object of what is known as the contract labour provisions was of a two-fold character. The first object was to prevent men being imported into Australia during a strike, and the second was to prevent them being brought here under a misapprehension as to the wages conditions which obtained—upon the understanding that the wage was nominally small, whereas, in reality, it might be considerable. The object, in other words, was to prevent capitalists interfering in industrial strife, and to prevent men from being misled regarding the wages which were payable. With these objects—which are entirely worthy ones—I am thoroughly in accord. I cannot say, however, that the method of administration which is being adopted at present is a satisfactory way of dealing with the question. To some extent both these objects have been met by the passing of the Conciliation and Arbitration Act. In Victoria the provisions of Wages Boards apply to over forty industries, while in New South Wales there is a Conciliation and Arbitration Act applying to every industry. I am informed that the present Government of Queensland have a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill on the stocks, and I think I may safely say that there is a reasonable prospect of any misapprehension as to wages in the bulk of the industries of the country being settled by some tribunal. It would, however, seem to be necessary to secure the second of the objects to which I have referred by giving any man who is brought here under contract the right to sue, as soon as he lands, for the prevailing rate of wages in the trade in which he is engaged. Other action has been taken under this Act that must lead to a considerable degree of adverse comment in Great Britain and elsewhere. Take the case of the English groom, to which reference has been made to-day. So far as I understand the answers given by the Prime Minister to my questions—and I must confess that those answers were somewhat vague—exemption certificates are not usually issued in the case of Britishers, but are intended to be used in the case of foreigners who might be excluded from failing to pass the education test, or something of the sort. But we know that in the case immediately under notice a gentleman proposing to bring out certain horses from Suffolk required a groom to attend them on the voyage, and to accompany them to a station in New South Wales. The groom obtained an exemption certificate, but it is stated that the Agent-General acted wrongly in issuing that certificate. When I asked the Prime Minister to-day what was the policy to be adopted in regard to white labour coming to Australia under contract, he said that the contract should be sent to the Department of External Affairs. The issuing of exemption certificates may be a stupid policy, but it is far more expeditious than is that which the Prime Minister now suggests. If a man, requiring the services of an expert groom to travel with horses from a county in England to New South Wales, had to wait until the contract could be sent out to the Department of External Affairs, and returned to him, the groom's chances of landing in the Commonwealth would be very remote indeed.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Scores of men bringing horses to Australia are allowed to land here without any trouble.

Mr. ROBINSON.—But are they under contract?

Mr. KENNEDY.—They receive wages throughout the whole period of service.

Mr. ROBINSON.—If they are under contract, the employer commits a breach of the Act in landing them here.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No.

Mr. ROBINSON.—It is all very well for the honorable member to deny my statement, but the Act cannot be misread. It provides that no man engaged under contract to do manual labour shall be allowed to land in the Commonwealth, except certain conditions are complied with. When I asked the Prime Minister to-day what were those conditions, he said that the contract must be transmitted to the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—The contract might be a verbal one.

Mr. ROBINSON.—In that event the provisions of the Act might be easily evaded. Let us take the case of several Britishers engaged in England to do other than skilled labour in Australia, and who have taken the precaution to obtain a written contract. What are they to do? The Prime Minister says that they must first send their contracts to the Department of External Affairs. If the Agent-General has been blamed for issuing exemption certificates in such cases, he certainly has been wrongly condemned. The issue of exemption certificates enables an intending immigrant to at once ascertain if he will be allowed to land on reaching Australia. I think there also is a means of preserving the Act as it stands, and yet overcoming the difficulty in this respect. The object of the measure is to prevent men signing a contract to work in Australia while they are under a misapprehension as to the wages and conditions of labour prevailing here, and also to render it impossible for men to be brought here to defeat a strike. The statisticians of New South Wales and Victoria issue handbooks in which they state
